I am shocked at the lack of knowledge which, in a more crowded Chamber, would have been a further embarrassment to the Leader of the Opposition, that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) has displayed. She has not caught up with what has been going on. I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if, as well as replying to his debate, I put the hon. Lady on the right road.

Mrs. Dunwoody: How kind.

Mrs. Chalker: I would not want the hon. Lady to be under the illusion from which she is obviously suffering on this subject, in addition to all of her other illusions about transport. I shall not trade in political insults with her, but it would be wrong to let her comments go without correction.

We should all love consistency of journey time, but that matter does not necessarily rest in the hands of transport planners. Transport planning, no matter how good or bad, does not alter the consequences of drivers travelling too close together and having a bump. The real problem about journey time is the behaviour of motorists rather than road engineering.

During the past five years there has been a major effort to involve local people early in the planning of roads. That is especially true of the Department's schemes on main roads. The process is lengthy for bypasses, main roads and special junctions. Quite frequently, the whole route goes out for consultation, as happened with the A41 in Chester. We try to measure local views.

All of that occurs before the scheme is worked up into public orders which are then published for the preferred route. It is at that stage on most of the schemes that we have an opportunity to learn from local people.

The instance my hon. Friend cited tonight about mini-roundabouts in Newton Abbot is not one with which I am familiar because it is not a departmental scheme. I can assure him, however, that I will find out what is going on in Newton Abbot. I have seen a number of other road safety improvement schemes which have deployed mini-round-abouts and in the initial stages they have not always been easy to accept. This is because some other part of the planning which may have worked — and here I agree with every word he said—on the drawing board had not taken the fullest account of the well-imbued habits of the local population in taking short cuts and all the other moves they were accustomed to making in the town.

We have had a number of such instances where for very good reasons, particularly where accident black spots have occurred, mini-roundabouts have been very successful in reducing the number of accidents, particularly those which were simply car bashes and non-injury accidents. That is one of the reasons why we have sought, in the right places, to extend the use of mini-roundabouts. But if it is not working in an area, I hope that the county council will do exactly what the Department has done. If it finds, with a local community, that the scheme is over-stressed in terms of new traffic management, there could be meetings with the local population such as I have had in Reading and other areas round the country, to amend the scheme.

Patterns change in road traffic management as new roads are opened and as habits change, and the council should always be amenable to advice and discussion with the local community. I hope that will happen in Newton Abbot.

The schemes that operate in an area such as Newton Abbot, or anywhere else for that matter, sometimes involve a change of priorities. From time to time one can be critical of the insufficient signing of such a change, because people often drive their cars by instinct and habit, and if one does not strongly impress upon them a changed system of priorities one gets the sort of problems my hon. Friend has rightly described. That would not enhance road safety but might well add to the number of non-injury accidents.

I understand what my hon. Friend was saying about an incomplete system in Newton Abbot. It is right that, wherever possible, we should consult local people and local shopping communities as well as pedestrians and motorists. In most of those schemes that is the responsibility of the local authority, the highway authority, and not my Department.

The House and, indeed, the Government have been watching very carefully what has been going on in recent years in the national road programme. It has been my job for the last three or more years to try to sort out the transport policies and programmes submitted by the highway authorities to determine how much we could give them to assist with their chosen priorities, whether they were bypasses or other road improvements. As well as getting the local programme moving, we have for the whole period—I can vouch for this since I became a Minister at the Department in 1982—given attention to the three aspects of the road programme.

In our 1981 document, in the 1983 road review, the road White Paper and in the 1985 "National Roads England" report, our priority has always been to relieve residential areas, and those that do not need to take heavy traffic, by a full bypass programme. This is not a sudden conversion, as the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich suggested, and she needs to indulge in a little more reading——

Mrs. Dunwoody: Come, come.

Mrs. Chalker: It is all very well to say "Come, come", but the hon. Lady plainly does not know what she is talking about. Her comments on the bypass programme, motorways and roads renewal were all jumbled up together, and she plainly did not take account of the fact that in 1974 and 1975 the Labour Government completely slowed down renewal on the motorways, and in 1976 stopped it altogether. Yet since 1979, when this Government came to power, expenditure on roads had been extended by more than 30 per cent. in real terms. That is what the hon. Lady gets wrong when she says that we have not programmed the renewal. She talked about fitting it into the overall infrastructure, but in 1984 and 1985 we sought to balance that by agreeing to every capital investment scheme brought to us by British Rail.

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Lady has had her whack, and I wish to put her right. She also said that insufficient had been spent on renewal, but of more than £3·8 billion, £1 billion was spent on renewal. Even adjusted for inflation, that is far more than her Government ever spent. The remaining £2·8 billion has been spent on new construction in the last five or six years. To have completed 171 major schemes and added nearly 500 miles to the national network in response to the increasing, and still increasing, demand for personal road transport has been a feat on which my engineers and staff in the Department of Transport are to be congratulated. There are now more schemes in the programme that are capable of being carried through.

That programme will give the communities their bypasses and will build the roads that will lead to new industrial areas, which will result in economic regeneration. Over the next 10 years, the programme could total some £4 billion. If the hon. Lady is concerned about spending, I suggest that she takes a while to read this report, which details what is happening overall and what is happening scheme by scheme throughout the country.

When she intervened, I thought that she would plead the case of the A52 Barthomley link. That is a scheme that she has been very interested in, but I should like to have seen a little more energy expended by certain other people, because the fact that it is moving along is due to——

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mrs. Chalker: I will give way to the hon. Lady in a minute.

It is because we have pushed hard for that linkage from the M6 across to the hon. Lady's area that this has happened. I know, and she knows, that it was partly because of land difficulties, but that should tell her something. It is not enough to say, "We need a road between two places" and not to observe the great difficulty that can sometimes arise in assembling the land between one place and another before a scheme starts. That is the reason for the length of the programme and the time it takes. We now have a full preparation pool which is a reality, which is being worked upon and which we did not inherit in 1979.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I pay tribute to the hon. Lady's energy in pushing the Barthomley link against opposition from the local Conservative county councillors and one or two other people who were determined that we should not have this needy means of conveying goods from my constituency to the M6. But I refute absolutely any suggestion of lack of energy by any of the Labour councillors on Crewe and Nantwich borough council. If she is referring to the Duchy of Lancaster and her colleagues in the Government who have spent over six months talking about this without any obvious attempt to push it forward, I concur with that point of view. The Labour councillors and the Labour representatives on the county council were most anxious to proceed with it. It is unfortunate that others of a different political persuasion did their best to delay it.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Lady will make any point that she can latch upon in place of facts. It was on the regional annual consultative committee for the north-west, where the county councils from different areas were gathered together in 1982, that this issue was, first raised, not by Labour councillors but by Conservative councillors. We wanted to get on with it. It depended also on the Cheshire county council. While any chairman of highways will bring to my notice schemes that he wants to pursue, I can honestly say that most of the representations I have received in recent years have been from people of my party and of no party. They certainly have not come solely from the hon. Lady or from her party.

Whereas in 1982 we found that local authorities were traditionally underspending on their road programme, we have achieved, in the interest of people who need bypasses and new industrial links something which I did not believe was possible. In 1983-84, the outturn on the road programme was within 1 per cent. of the budget. I was very pleased but quite surprised. However, in 1984-85, we managed to spend to within 0·5 per cent. of the increased budget. Every scheme that is brought forward goes through the statutory processes. This frequently takes far longer than is at first envisaged, because people must have their say and objectors must be freely heard at a public inquiry through an independent inspector. Occasionally it has not been easy to ensure that available resources have been properly programmed and managed.

Those two figures refute the comment of the hon. Lady that the programme was not properly organised and managed. It is exceptional for any Government Department to stay so close to its budget. Another thing that makes me proud to be a Minister in the Department of Transport is that the increased investment which the Government have been able to allocate to road infrastructure and other aspects has been matched by an ever-improving performance from the construction industry. Competitive tendering and improved productivity, plus more effective programme management, have meant that not only have we secured better value for money but we have got a better deal for the taxpayer and the road user. Because the road programme is well developed to a total provision in 1985-86 of £824 million, with schemes ready and waiting to be brought in should any currently expected to start this year fall behind because of statutory procedures or for any other reason, we are doing exactly what is expected by spending £600 million on new construction, which is 5 per cent. in cash terms more than last year. Added to that is £224 million for reconstruction.

Road repairs affect motorists all over the country. The hon. Lady complained about resurfacing being done at this time of year. It was sad to hear the main Labour spokesman on transport show that she does not understand the optimum combination of times at which to do roadworks. It is important to have high night ambient temperatures to allow the materials used to set in the best way. It is necessary to utilise the long daylight hours to the best advantage. It is also necessary to do the work at a time when there may be less rain. That is why we do not proceed with schemes that are time-conscious in June, but leave them until July, when we seek to get them done before the holiday season starts.

The whole programme, whether of renewal of motorways, where we are beginning to catch up with the road renewal that was not done in the 1970s, or of new onstruction, whereby we shall add 100 miles of new road to the national network, of which 65 miles will be trunk road and only 35 miles motorway, mainly the M25, is, by any account, the right way to proceed with our ever car-conscious nation.

One cannot turn one's face against what the people want by way of new roads.

Mrs. Dunwoody: When are the Government going to start?

Mrs. Chalker: That is why we have 295 schemes in preparation. Whatever the hon. Lady may mutter, if we give better value for money and get more work done for the same budget I can only be pleased with the hard work put into the roads programme by the whole Department.

My hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge referred to the objectives of the policy. Our objectives have always been to serve the provision of roads in three ways. All hon. Members who have spoken have mentioned bypasses. A bypass removes traffic, especially lorries, from places where it has no business, improves the safety of roads and provides industry with more efficient communication. Those are the three objectives of the work.

We are keen to serve industrial needs but also to serve the nation with great sensitivity for the environment by making sure that people have the roads they need. In carrying out those aims we have reached a rate of return of about 11 per cent. on average. That is a highly profitable return for any construction industry.

We are doing well on volume, too. That is one of the better aspects of the improvement that we have managed to carry out over the last five years. I am not complacent. I do not think the programme is yet good enough. We can do more and we can do better.

If we are to provide the national road links for which the Department is responsible, I expect local authorities to abide by the codes of practice and the guidance that the Department has been developing with them. By that means we shall put right the problems at local level to which my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge referred. Those problems are not always understood by engineers who live a long way away. I cannot comment in detail upon the Devon county council scheme, but I shall find out about it and will write to my hon. Friend.

We can be proud of the improvement in the codes of practice. We announced three weeks ago six road schemes in the south-west. Consequently my hon. Friend's concern will be brought to our attention and also to the attention of the county council. As the highways authority, the county council plays a major role. It discusses its priorities with the Department and their links into the national road network.

I hope that I have explained to the satisfaction of my hon. Friend that the Department is fully aware of the "brother" programmes of the county councils. I hope, too, that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich has learnt tonight just a little about the roads programme. I recommend that she should read "National Roads England 1985". By the time she has finished reading it, she might find that she enjoyed it.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-six minutes past Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 5 July 1985

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Orders of the Day

Copyright (Computer Software) Amendment Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Lords amendment: No. 1, after clause 1, insert the following new clause:

" . References in the Copyright Act 1956 to the reduction of any work to a material form, or to the reproduction of any work in a material form, shall include references to the storage of that work in a computer."

9.35 am

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 2.

Mr. Powell: Perhaps it would not be inappropiate on this final day of consideration of private Members' legislation during this Session to say that it is an extraordinary and fascinating steeplechase which enables hon. Members who have won the ballot in November to emerge in July with a piece of legislation which, all being well, will be for the public good and which has achieved the support of both Houses. In bringing my Bill to this stage, I have been greatly assisted in the other place by my noble and learned Friend the Minister of State who efficiently and expeditiously handled the conduct of the Bill.

Discerning hon. Members will notice that these amendments bear a striking resemblance to those which were on the Order Paper in February. For tactical reasons, they were not dealt with on the Floor of the House or in Committee. I am grateful for the assistance that I have received from all parts of the House which enabled the Bill to jump the queue and get out of the way of some controversial private Members' legislation, and for the amendments that at one stage were contemplated being dealt with in this House to be dealt with in another place. In other words, today we are dealing with matters contemplated for this House, but which for tactical reasons were postponed to the other place.

The amendments are straightforward, especially the first one. Even if I tried, I could not take up much time speaking to it. There was a spelling error in the long title of the Bill when it passed its Second Reading on 22 February, which relates to the word "programme". Many hon. Members are rightly proud of traditional English spelling, and the original spelling of the word "programme" was in the English form. The other place has passed an amendment to change the spelling to the American form—without the second "m" and the final "e". Although many hon. Members may be reluctant to accept the amendment, there is a good reason in law why I ask the House to approve the amendment, which is that the American spelling, not only conforms with international usage, but is approved in our courts. If the House passed a Bill which conformed with traditional English spelling, there is a real risk that a clever lawyer —through my professional background, I know many such lawyers—will say that the Bill does not apply to computer software programs because the Bill does not talk about such programs.

I ask the House to agree to the first amendment because the courts have approved the American spelling in this connection.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I hear and understand the point that my hon. Friend is making. Like me, my hon. Friend is an absolute patriot and is devoted to the English language, its poetry, its quaintness and everything else. I understand my hon. Friend's concern, but with his knowledge of the courts and of legal procedure surely he will accept that we should have the English spelling. It is the English language, and this is England. This is the House of Commons of the British people, and it would seem appropriate to pass laws in which we enshrine our language rather than someone else's abuse of our language. Surely my hon. Friend would feel that, were we to go ahead as he initially intended, the courts are not an ass and would eventually settle down and understand that Parliament intended that the English language should be used in its full glory and should not be abused.

Mr. Powell: The protest registered by my hon. Friend is entirely appropriate, but I hope that he will be content with speaking for the instincts of most hon. Members present today and will not pursue the matter. I assure him that I have accepted the amendment only because I know that the spelling introduced by their Lordships is the correct spelling in law. I would not wish the Bill to run into technical difficulties. I ask my hon. Friend not to pursue the matter, but to be content with that robust and patriotic protest.

Try as I may, I would be hard put to outline usefully any further reasons for accepting the amendment, and I shall leave it there.

The other amendment relates to a more substantial matter. The House will recall that it was first raised in the House nearly a year ago by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) in a Bill that he introduced under the ten-minute rule. He was given leave to introduce the Bill, but it did not proceed to a Second Reading. When I had the good fortune to draw a place in the ballot for private Members' legislation, I decided to take up his Bill.

The Bill which I introduced and which was given a Second Reading on 22 February differed from my hon. and learned Friend's Bill in one important way. His Bill included a definition of the concept of "material form" in relation to computer programs. However, my Bill contained no such definition. Their Lordships decided to introduce what will in due course, assuming that the House approves the amendment, be section 2 of the statute.

The expression "material form" is a key concept in copyright law. It was used in the Copyright Act 1956 to define the acts restricted by copyright, which includes reproducing the work in any material form. That is found in section 2(5) of the Act. It is also used in section 49(4) to fix the time at which a copyright work is made and, therefore, to identify the author. It is defined as the time at which a work is first reduced to writing or to some other material form. However, the expression "material form" is not defined in the Copyright Act as it currently stands.

[Mr. Powell]

9.45 am

A potential problem arises where a computer program does not start its life in conventional written form. The difficulty is important in commercial terms, because computer programs are often keyed directly into a computer by typing in from a keyboard without first being written down in a conventional form. Therefore, the electrical signals formed in the computer's memory are, in practice, the program's first physical embodiment. Similarly, copying is often carried out by loading the contents of a disc, cassette or other permanent storage device directly into the computer's memory for further processing. However, a special characteristic of the electronic memory of most computers is that it is volatile in the sense that the memory is lost when the power supply is turned off.

It has been suggested that the electronic representation of a computer program such as that formed in the computer's memory or that displayed on a VDU screen is not sufficiently permanent to be a material form for the purposes of fixing the time at which the copyright work is made, or of establishing the existence of an infringing copyright.

I shall give the House some examples of the problems envisaged if uncertainty remained as to whether forms in which computer software may be stored or reproduced are not covered by the phrase "material form". First, a programmer creating a program without first writing it down might go out to lunch; a pirate might then come in and print out the program from the computer's memory. If electronic representation in the computer's memory is not a material form, the pirate would be the author for copyright purposes. Secondly, a program entered directly into a computer's memory that was not written down on paper or recorded on tape or disc might be transmitted through a computer network. If it is intercepted by a pirate who prints it out, the pirate might be treated as the original author for the purposes of copyright. Thirdly, an infringer might put a computer program on his own random access computer memory rather than copy it on to a disc or tape and, as a result, may not infringe the copyright.

The ten-minute Bill introduced by my hon. and learned Friend included a definition of "material form". Unfortunately, when I was preparing this legislation, the view of parliamentary counsel was that it would be impossible to include such a definition that was limited to computer programs without at the same time implying something negative in relation to other copyright work. Therefore, the matter became the subject of substantial negotiations between myself, the computer software industry, which has given me generous support in the preparation and passage of the Bill, and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I am delighted that both sides have reached an accommodation and that it is now possible to incorporate a definition of "material form" into what will become section 2. It will be:

> "References in the Copyright Act 1956 to the reduction of any work to a material form, or to the reproduction of any work in a material form, shall include references to the storage of that work in a computer."

The amendment was introduced in Committee in the other place on 5 June.

This is a somewhat technical explanation, but it is important to get it on record why it is necessary because it is not a matter that the House has had to discuss until now. We are now in line with the Green Paper recommendation and the Bill confirms that the act of loading a computer program or any other literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work into a computer without the copyright owner's consent will continue to be an infringement of copyright. The amendment will also confirm that any work, be it a computer program, novel or any other type of work that is written directly into a computer, will qualify for copyright protection at the moment of its creation within the computer.

It follows that clause 2 is intended to clarify that if any existing work is copied into a computer, of which an important example is the incorporation of an author's work in a computer database, this constitutes reproduction in a material form, requiring the copyright owner's consent. I hope that that will be regarded as a comprehensive statement of why the House should accept my suggestion that we should agree with the Lord's amendment.

We have reached this stage on 5 July. How long ago the Second Reading in February seems to be. This is the first of the private Members' Bills to be discussed today. There will be others later. I heard on the radio this morning my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) being ambitious and optimistic about the prospects of his Bill, which will be discussed later. The House is interested in the matter that I am introducing, but I hope that it will be possible to reach my hon. Friend's Bill in due course.

Mr. Marlow: I apologise for leaving the Chamber for part of my hon. Friend's speech, but I had an important and urgent telephone call to make. I am sure that my hon. Friend knows that these things happen and understands and forgives my temporary regrettable absence.

I have looked at the amendment, and while I was out my hon. Friend may have covered the point I am about to make about it. He explained earlier that his first amendment was about mutilating the English word "programme" and turning it into the American word "program". However, I do not see the word "program" in the first amendment. Will my hon. Friend briefly explain something to the House—I regret it if he has done so already—to satisfy my curiosity and my concern about the Bill? If he has not done so already, I should be grateful if he would connect the words of the amendment with his reluctant desire to inflict an injustice on the English language.

Mr. Powell: My hon. Friend is right about the first amendment. It refers to new clause 1. I apologise to my hon. Friend and I am certain that most of the House was able to follow me in what I said, but in giving my reasons for the two amendments I identified as the first amendment amendment No. 2 and as the second amendment amendment No. 1. I hope that there is not the slightest doubt about what I have been referring to. Not for the first time, I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing me down to earth and ensuring that we proceed in both an accurate and a common-sense way.

The House knows that I regard this as a very important measure for the future of the computer software industry. On Second Reading, I said that estimates show that losses through unlawful piracy and copying of software in 1983 totalled £150 million. In 1984, the sum was almost certainly greater than that. There is not the slightest doubt that the computer software industry has been heavily undermined by the growing practice of commercial piracy. Pending wider reform on copyright law which will come in due course, and which we hope to have the opportunity to discuss in a year or two, this Bill deals with a particularly bad practice that is undermining the industry.

I and those who have supported me on both sides of the House have not gone to the lengths that we have gone to to pass ineffective legislation. The Bill is intended to bite, and to bite hard into piracy. The House is aware of the existence of the Federation Against Software Theft, which represents virtually all sections of the computer software industry. It has set up a unit whose job it will be to prepare evidence and to bring to the attention of the police and any other public body occasions on which there have been any commercial infringements of this legislation.

I am delighted to be able to tell the House that a senior, experienced and efficient police officer of the rank of chief superintendent of the metropolitan police has been recruited. He will shortly be at work with a team which he will recruit to bring together all the evidence of piracy. The message must go from the House today to the pirates wherever they may be that their days are over and that hereafter they will face the consequences of their unlawful activities.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): I congratulate the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) on his Bill. There is nothing further that I can say about the Bill or the Lords amendments, which I support for the adequate reasons argued in the other place. I wish the hon. Gentleman luck in future ballots, but I have one remark to make to him. When one is getting a fair wind in this place, it is better not to remain at sea for longer than is absolutely necessary to complete the journey, for fear of delaying colleagues with other equally important business who have been less fortunate in the ballot and for fear of running into less fair weather.

Mr. Marlow: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) not only on bringing the Bill to Parliament and through Parliament but on the way that he has spoken. I intervened in his speech, and for the first time in my life had a positive effect on our proceedings in that I was able to help my hon. Friend I am grateful to him for the way that he dealt with my intervention.

This is an incredibly complex issue and people like myself who were at school before computers became part of our way of life feel that anything to do with computers and computing is of the utmost complexity that is best left to other people. My hon. Friend has taken upon himself the task of introducing this Bill and the amendment. It is a difficult but praiseworthy task which he has done exceptionally well. The House and the country should be grateful to him for dealing with this nuisance. The fact that he got his amendments muddled up is nothing, and simply goes to show how incredibly complex this issue is. It is an appalling state of affairs that after a person has done a great deal of work——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. While I am in a tolerant mood, I must remind the hon. Member that we are dealing with narrow amendments and that he must relate his remarks directly to the amendments.

10 am

Mr. Marlow: I am attempting to do that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I apologise if I am straining your patience; the complexity of the subject is to blame.

Amendment No. 2 deletes part of the title, so that it will read:

"An Act to amend the Copyright Act 1956 in its application to computer programs and computer storage."

My hon. Friend's purpose is so to define the title that protection which, sadly, has not been given to those working in computer software will be available to them in future. It is necessary for this protection to be provided in view of the great boom of computers to society. People may work all day and all night only to find that their work has been pirated or plagiarised. A lifetime's work can be rendered valueless.

Because it is important that that protection should be provided, so it is important that the title of the Bill should be clear, and I am pleased to note that not only will the title be clearer but that it will also be shorter. Anything that we can do to reduce the number of words in the written text — I was about to say that we might also try to shorten our speeches too—is of advantage.

I congratulate my hon. Friend. The House is indebted to him for the great service that he has performed in this complex and important sphere.

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I, too, have pleasure in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) on having introduced an important Bill which, I feel sure, will be speeded on its way today. I have taken part in a number of debates on this subject and am anxious that nothing should stand in the way of the Bill's progress.

My hon. Friend explained, in reply to an intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), that he had dealt with the amendments in the reverse order. I am not clear, however, why amendment No. 2 is worded in the way in which it appears on the Order Paper. I appreciate that it amends the title, but although amendment No. 2 begins:

"Line 1, leave out from",

I thought that the Bill commenced with the words:

"Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty".

In fact, the line 1 to which my hon. Friend is referring in amendment No. 2 begins:

"An Act to amend the Copyright Act 1956" which seems to begin before the numbering of lines in the Bill commences. I am anxious to ensure, before agreeing to amendment No. 2, that we are doing something that is valid and will not make nonsense of the measure. I am sure that my hon. Friend has taken the best advice from the Table. Will he enlighten me?

When my hon. Friend dealt with the spelling of the word "program", I was not sure whether he was saying that the High Court had determined that, in future in English law, the word should be spelt the American way or whether the High Court had been tolerant about the way in which the word could be spelt.

[Mr. Neil Thorne]

Mr. William Powell: In a High Court case a year or two ago, the Chancery Division approved the American spelling for computer programs only, not generally.

Mr. Thorne: I hope that the High Court will accept both spellings and not confine it in this case. I can think of a number of instances where words are spelt in a variety of ways. One need only think of the greatest literary architect, Shakespeare, to appreciate that a number of different spellings of the same word are normally accepted.

It would be unfortunate if we tied ourselves down to one narrow concept, although I would not stand in way of the Bill over that. I hope that we shall not be confined as a result of a High Court judgment and find that we are restricting our language to the American form.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I join hon. Members on both sides of the House in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) on steering his ship through the legislative waters, shortly to arrive at a safe haven.

As my hon. Friend explained, a large number of people in the computer industry at large, many computer users and software authors will heave a sigh of relief when the Bill reaches the statute book. It will be an important day because we shall eliminate the high possibility that has hitherto existed of software authors being rooked of their rightful rewards and of suffering from the attentions of the pirates.

The new clause adds an important new element to the Bill and, on behalf of the Government, I warmly support its insertion. I am pleased that the opportunity was taken in another place to improve what was already an excellent Bill by extending its effect in this way.

The Bill as it left this Chamber for another place some weeks ago was concerned only with the application of copyright law to computer programs. The new clause addresses, in an effective manner, another area of uncertainty that arises out of the interaction between copyright law and computers.

Despite its admirably concise form, the new clause removes two such uncertainties. It deals with two implications of the new technology on the way copyright law works. It is concerned both with the basic question of whether copyright protection is available to works created in computers, and with the no less important issue of whether the act of copying a copyright work into a computer requires the permission of the copyright owner.

It may help if I briefly remind the House how the Copyright Act 1956 is structured to provide protection to authors and other creators of original works, or to those who own or have interest in copyright by virtue, for example, of assignment or licence or of their position as employers of the creator. The Act defines copyright as the exclusive right to do, and to authorise others to do, certain acts—known as restricted acts—in relation to the work that is the subject of copyright. One has to look first, though, at the word "work" to determine whether copyright subsists in the first place.

The Act states that copyright shall subsist in every original literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work, subject to certain conditions as to matters such as the nationality and place of residence of the author and the country of first publication. This applies both to published and unpublished material. There are no formalities associated with the subsistence of copyright in the United Kingdom. Copyright protection exists from the moment of creation of the work, with no requirement of registration or of any copyright notice on the work itself. Right hon. and hon. Members will know that very commonly—indeed, almost universally in published material—a conventional copyright notice is affixed to works, consisting of a small "c" in a circle, the name of the copyright owner, and the year of publication. I should explain that such a notice does not have any function in establishing the subsistence of copyright in this country. It has two roles. First, it plays a part in relation to the subsistence of copyright in certain foreign countries, most notably the United States of America. Secondly, it provides a visible reminder to the world at large that copyright is being claimed in the work, and by whom it is claimed. Thus it has practical use in this country, but is not a legal prerequisite for copyright protection.

To return to the question of what constitutes a "work", or more strictly an "original work", the use of qualifications like "literary" or "artistic" does not imply that a work has to have what would conventionally be regarded as literary or artistic merit to attract copyright protection. Aesthetic excellence is not a necessary qualification.

The courts have long since established this principle, and there have over the years been many examples of works, and types of works, which have been afforded copyright protection as "literary works" without possessing, or indeed claiming to possess, any vestige of literary merit whatsoever. These have included calendars, directories, football coupons, mathematical tables and railway timetables, and many other equally mundane items. More recently, an injunction has been granted on the basis that the sequences of randomly selected letters used in newspaper bingo games are subject to copyright. The common key to the establishment of copyright in all these cases has been that substantial independent skill, creative labour or judgment has been exercised in the creation of the new work.

My reason for placing such emphasis on this point is to stress the wide range of material that comes within the ambit of copyright protection. When one thinks, for example, of databases — great stores of information brought together, often at great cost, and with great commercial potential for exploitation and dissemination —one can recognise the immense practical significance of the fact that copyright protection has long been regarded as appropriate to this general class of material, to collations of meaningful information. The impact of computer technology in this sector has been immense and revolutionary, and has raised central questions in relation to copyright that the new clause seeks to answer.

Dr. Bray: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I appreciate the support that the Government are giving the Bill, but is the Minister not going rather wide of the amendment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am listening carefully to the Minister. I hope that he will refer directly to the amendment.

Mr. Butcher: I was referring to the first of the two questions which the new clause will resolve. That question is, put simply, when someone creates an original new work—a work of the type that certainly qualifies as a "literary work" within the broad meaning of term that I have already discussed — and when that creation is carried out directly in a computer memory, has the work been "reduced to a material form", and does it therefore qualify for copyright protection? The question arises whenever a work is composed by someone typing directly into a computer keyboard. This is one of the key points to which my hon. Friend the Member for Corby addressed himself in moving the amendment. That work may mean a novelist or some other sort of writer typing an article or a chapter of a new book into a word processor, or it may, as I have aleady indicated, mean a scientist, an engineer or a statistician putting together data in a new manner in a computerised database.

The need for protection in such cases is I believe, obvious, and the principle that such protection should apply is every bit as sound when a computer is used as when precisely the same material is put down, much more laboriously and less flexibly, on paper. Nevertheless, the question whether protection does in fact subsist when a computer is used has not been resolved in the courts, and uncertainty therefore remains. It may be that present law would be found to give this protection already if the issues were tested, but as long as the legal uncertainty remains, creators of new material will lack confidence in such protection. Computer technology needs to be seen as a support to the author, not as a threat to the legal protection upon which his livelihood, and that of his employers, rests.

10.15 am

The need for clear protection for a new work while it still rests only in the essentially transient form of computer memory is clear. It is vulnerable, in that form, to misappropriation. This has already been forcefully argued by the noble Lord who introduced these measures in another place, using the example of the creator of new material who left his brainchild on his computer memory while he went out to lunch, to find on his return that someone else had printed it out and had thus undoubtedly "reduced it to material form". That the law as it now stands leaves any doubt at all about the true authorship of the work in these circumstances must clearly be wrong. Therefore, my hon. Friend, in bringing forward the amendment, is doing the House a great service in seeking to eliminate an area of uncertainty.

Mr. William Powell: My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) raised two issues to which I shall respond briefly. First, he asked whether the amendment, in referring to "Line 1", is directed to the long title. The amendment appears under "In the Title" and refers to the first line of the title rather than of the Bill. I take my hon. Friend's point about "program". I have explained why that form of spelling should be adopted in the Bill. I hope that my hon. Friends the Members for Ilford, South and for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) will not push the matter any further.

Question put and agreed to.

Hospital Complaints Procedure Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

HOSPITAL COMPLAINTS PROCEDURE

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 1, line 6, leave out "Regional Health Authority" and insert "health authority in England and Wales and to each Health Board in Scotland"

10.17 am

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 8.

Mrs. Currie: The prime mover of the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), first became interested in the complaints procedure in the National Health Service during his serious illness in 1984. This morning he is in hospital as an outpatient on a dialysis machine. I am sure that we all hope that he is feeling much better already and that before too long it will be possible to find a permanent solution for his illness. Meanwhile, I have been asked to move acceptance of the amendments. I feel honoured to have the opportunity to be associated with this important Bill.

As the Bill completed all its stages in the House without amendment on 22 February, and virtually without criticism, I should explain why we are prepared to accept all eight amendments. Without the amendments, the Bill will not do what it is intended to do. It would merely perpetuate the present somewhat unsatisfactory procedure for complaints. As the law stands, the Secretary of State, under section 17 of the National Health Service Act 1977, has the power to give directions to the health authorities, and they must comply. My right hon. Friends who have served as Secretary of State for Social Services over the years have taken this duty seriously.

The result is that we have a plethora of complaints procedures, none of which is entirely effective. The procedures were listed by Lord Colwyn in another place on 17 April. It would be appropriate to read them into the record. Lord Colwyn said:

> "They are: the civil law, with particular relevance to negligence, assault and defamation; the criminal law, with particular relevance to drugs legislation and certification; the General Medical Council and General Dental Council, concerned both with serious professional misconduct and fitness to practice; the ombudsman in matters other than clinical judgment; health circular No. (81)5, which deals with complaints regarding clinical judgments; HM(66)15, which is concerned with methods of dealing with complaints by patients; HM(61)112, which deals with matters concerning the hospital doctor's personal conduct, professional conduct and professional competence; HM(60)45, which is concerned with the prevention of harm to patients resulting from physical or mental disability of hospital staff.
>
> We have also the service committee and tribunal procedure which is concerned with the general practitioner's terms of service and under which he can be fined or excluded from providing general medical service. Finally, there are the inquiries set up by the Secretary of State under Section 84 of the National Health Service Act 1977.—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 April 1985; Vol. 462, c. 779.]

Recently, the Secretary of State has made use of the powers under that section in the inquiry into legionnaire's disease at Staffordshire hospital. However, my noble Friend missed out several procedures. It is amazing what one finds once one starts digging. There are also letters to the health authorities on complaints procedures of 9 December 1966 and 27 July 1970, health notice HN(78)39 of April 1978. I think that that is an exhaustive list, but I stand willing to be corrected.

[Mrs. Currie]

The main document in use is HC81(5), issued in April 1981, which makes it clear that it is a "memorandum of guidance" and therefore has no statutory power. If the Bill has any purpose and if these amendments have any value, that gap will be closed. It is vital that we should have, for the first time, a Bill that firmly states:

> "It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to give to each health authority in England and Wales and to each Health Board in Scotland such directions . . . as appear to him necessary" to achieve a proper complaints procedure.

I should like to examine the amendments in more detail. If we are to make the Bill work, we must accept all of them. Clause 1 lays a duty on a Secretary of State to exercise his existing power to give directions to health authorities so as to require the establishment and publicising of specified procedures for dealing with complaints in all NHS hospitals. The amendment extends the categories of authority to which such directions will have to be given to district health authorities in England and Wales, health boards in Scotland and special health authorities.

As previously drafted, the Bill covered only regional health authorities, and therefore applied only to England. There are no regional health authorities in Wales and Scotland, and the Bill is intended to apply in both areas. Regional health authorities in England are not the authorities directly responsible for the management of hospitals. The amendment ensures that the directions required by the Bill to be given are addressed to all authorities with hospital management responsibility. The other amendments follow from this proposed change which alters the Bill fundamentally and will make it much more effective.

Under clause 1, without the Lords amendments, there will be precious little improvement in the situation to which my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury drew attention on Second Reading. If the regional health authorities were responsible, nothing much would happen, even with the statutory obligations as laid down in the original Bill. It is worth remembering that my hon. Friend's horrendous experience—when he was treated at three different hospitals, none of which appeared to have a complaints procedure and certainly none of which informed him of one—occurred despite the plentiful supply of circulars and instructions which I outlined earlier. We must do better than that.

The key objective is to pin responsibility firmly on those bodies that run patients' services—the district health authorities. The regional health authorities are remote. In some regions, they cover thousands of square miles. They cover scores of hospitals.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I am listening carefully to my hon. Friend's argument. It was suggested in the original Bill that the matter should be looked after by regional health authorities, but it is now suggested that district health authorities should be responsible. What was in people's minds originally when they thought that this matter would be better dealt with at regional level? Will my hon. Friend tell the House why that is so, because there may be potent arguments in that direction?

Mrs. Currie: I believe that the case was that the regional health authorities were regarded as the prime movers in England and Wales and that my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury had not realised that there were no such bodies in Wales. The main contact between the Secretary of State and the health service in the country at large is through the accountability reviews that he exercises during the year with regional health authorities. The Secretary of State does not normally meet the district health authorities. I believe that that is why the regional health authorities were, before the other place scrutinised the Bill, regarded as the appropriate authorities. However, in my view and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury, they are not the appropriate authorities. I hope that the amendment will be accepted.

The regional health authorities may be funding certain activities—for example, regional specialties such as cardiology and kidney transplantation. However, the district health authorities carry the can for what goes on in the hospitals which they are responsible for running.

The Lords amendments to clause 1 have several other effects. They include special hospital authorities. These authorities are a legacy of the reorganisations of the NHS in 1974 and 1982. They mainly comprise certain teaching hospitals. There are eight postgraduate teaching hospital special health authorities, which were formerly run by boards of governors. They are the hospitals for sick children, the national hospitals for nervous diseases, Moorfields, the Bethlem Royal hospital and the Maudsley hospital, the national heart and chest hospitals, the Royal Marsden hospital, the Eastman dental hospital and Hammersmith hospital. There are various other special health authorities, including the Central Blood Laboratories Authority, the Health Service Supply Council, the National Health Service Training Authority, the Prescription Pricing Authority, the Rural Dispensing Committee, Rampton Hospital Review Board and the Mental Health Act Commission. Whether my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury realised that he had left all those out is a moot point, but they will now be included by these amendments.

Current DHSS guidance on complaints under HC81(5) applies to those special health authorities that provide a hospital service to NHS patients. The coverage of the Bill as amended would similarly include special health authorities that provide NHS hospital service.

Not all teaching hospitals are included in the group of special health authorities. The vast majority are run by district health authorities. I have had the privilege of being chairman of the Central Birmingham health authority which had seven teaching hospitals in the midlands, including the celebrated Queen Elizabeth hospital. The teaching hospitals in my area were not covered by special hospital authorities, although there was no technical difference between them. The postgraduate teaching at Queen Elizabeth hospital was similar to the postgraduate teaching at the hospitals to which I have referred.

It is of the utmost importance that our major teaching hospitals are not left out. When a person is acutely ill, when he has a rare condition that is difficult to diagnose or when he is an "interesting case" and liable to be discussed with students or written up as a research exercise, the gap between the patient and the NHS staff, especially doctors, frequently grows too wide. The apocryphal comment sometimes attributed to such centres of excellence is, "The operation was a great success but the patient died." I swear that that comment has been made to me in the teaching hospitals for which I was responsible. That is not good enough. It is essential that the Bill be extended to all such authorities. When the patient is in such circumstances, it is even more important that he knows how to complain, that his family know how to complain on his behalf and that others associated with his care, including his general practitioner, are able to take up the problems. It is essential that a proper complaints procedures should exist and be made available to the patient.

On Second Reading, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) said:

"It should be a requirement of every medical school that there is at least a significant period of formal training for young doctors as to how to approach the patient." — [Official Report, 22 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 1381.]

I completely agree. I found in the hospitals for which I was responsible that the people in a teaching hospital who benefited most from a properly conducted investigation of a complaint were the young doctors undergoing training. In the middle of all their studies — of anatomy, pharmacology, surgery, anaesthesia and the like—they are not taught well how to listen to their patients. The patient often knows best. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury said on Second Reading, he knew that he was allergic to penicillin. The doctors took absolutely no notice, and landed him in hospital for a further five weeks with a dangerous rash.

10.30 am

We all have constituents who have experienced similar difficulties of getting doctors, especially a young doctor, to take some notice of them and to take them seriously when they say where it hurts or what does not suit them, and how they can be better treated. If, by including special hospital authorities, we can take some small step towards avoiding those things happening, we will have done some little good.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I am following my hon. Friend's argument closely. She is right when she says that patients must be given all possible opportunities to air their complaints against hospitals. Happily, the number of complaints is not too great. Does she agree that, while we are correct to concentrate on ensuring that patients can have their grievances ventilated, we are equally right to stress from time to time that patients also have a responsibility towards the hospitals in which they are treated, and that that responsibility often includes turning up on time, on the right day and at the right place for operations and outpatient treatment? The NHS suffers from a considerable waste of time when patients do not fulfil those responsibilities. There is a social contract between the patient and the National Health Service which both sides should fulfil.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are in danger of getting back to a general debate on the Bill. We must concentrate on the Lords amendments which are before the House.

Mrs. Currie: I am glad to accede to what my hon. Friend says.

The third main effect of the amendment is to extend the Bill to Wales and Scotland. I was hoping that we would see some Scottish Members here this morning. It is a pity that there is none. It was always the Bill's intention that it should cover Wales, as clause 2(3) says. However, when my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury originally tabled the Bill, it referred to regional health authorities. It happens that there are no regional health authorities in Wales. The Principality is not covered by a single RHA which answers to the DHSS.

In England, there are 192 health districts organised into 14 regions. In Wales, there are nine health districts answerable directly to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. There is no regional tier. Therefore, 167 hospitals in Wales — that is the figure at 31 December 1983, and I should be surprised if the DHSS does not know of a few more since then — will be covered by the Bill if the amendment is accepted. It would clearly be unsatisfactory if we did not accept the amendment. We would then have two different systems —one for the English and one for everyone else.

Mr. Marlow: I take that point. There are ways in which Scottish law and administration are somewhat different from ours and there are good reasons for that. It suits the Scots, us and the Welsh. My hon. Friend has just said that there are 192 health districts in England. I am not sure how many regions there are; perhaps she can advise me. It seems to me a rather heavy job and responsibility for the Minister to have to contact each district. As he is getting in touch with them he has, to an extent, to supervise them to ensure that they are carrying out his instructions. If he makes that connection with the regions, he has a far narrower span of control which is more easily policed and effectively carried out. The regions should be allowed to do the job for which they are in place. My hon. Friend has not yet satisfied that argument.

Mrs. Currie: On the first part of my hon. Friend's question, there are 14 regions in England. As to the second part, that is what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services is in office for. I am sure that he recognises that he has that responsibility now, but it is not a statutory responsibility. That is what the Bill will make it. He may give directions, and HC(81)5 is a memorandum of guidance. The health authorities do not have to take any notice of it at all. The Bill, as amended, will insist that the Secretary of State gives those instructions and will then insist that the various health authorities take note.

The regional health authorities will not be excluded by the proposed amendment to clause 1. The Bill will simply refer to health authorities and therefore regional health authorities, district authorities and the other health authorities can be included.

Mr. John Patten: Is my hon. Friend aware that, as she said earlier, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and myself regularly meet the chairmen of the 14 regional health authorities to discuss Health Service matters? It is not correct to say that we stop our discussions at that level on complaints or any other related issue, but through regional health authority chairmen we relate to district health authority chairmen. From time to time we meet the various district health authority chairmen in the different regions. There are more than 190 of them. On those occasions we have the opportunity to discuss issues such as Health Service complaints procedures. It is important that the impression is not given that we talk only to the regional health authority chairmen on that point.

[Mr. John Patten]

Mrs. Currie: That is right. I had the privilege of meeting my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at such a meeting about three years ago.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) asked about Scotland. There is no good reason why Scotland should be excluded. There is every reason why Scotland should be part of the Bill. It was the intention of my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury on Second Reading. He is delighted to accept the Lords amendments which will extend the scope of the Bill to all parts of the United Kingdom. I understand that it is my right hon. Friend's intention to move Orders in Council that will make the Bill apply to Northern Ireland as well.

Mr. Marlow: I was not saying, forgive me, that Scotland should not be included. All I was saying was that sometimes Scottish legislation is different from that of England, for good reasons. My hon. Friend is beginning to frighten me. She said that there are 14 regions and 192 health districts. She is saying that the Minister will send out his diktat—let me put it more kindly than that: his ideas and instructions — to the districts and to the regions as to how the complaints procedure should be run. That seems like a recipe for chaos, because the chairman of the regional health authority and the general manager of the district health authority will both be waving their pieces of paper from the Minister. The region will be saying to the district, "We do not like the way in which you are doing it." The district will be saying to the region, "Ah, but I have it in tablets of stone from the Minister."

My hon. Friend should study any large organisation. The one that I know best from my background is the services. She will find that the general might tell the brigadier what to do, but it is up to the brigadier how he organises his colonels. If the generals start telling the colonels what to do, there is chaos.

Mrs. Currie: Far be it from me to answer for my hon. Friend the Minister, who I know wishes to intervene at some stage, but my understanding is that we will have a process of consultation after the Bill becomes law, if it receives the assent of both Houses. That will be an extensive process of consultation. The instructions that will be eventually issued by the DHSS to the health authorities in the Bill, as amended, will take into account comments that are made. I hope that they will produce something that is effective, and in view of the requirement for publicity, to which I shall come, will cope with all the problems identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury and the difficulties faced by many of our constituents when they are obliged to go into hospital.

As there are no Scottish Members present, I shall deal with the matters relating to Scotland in a little more detail. Without the amendments, we should not be able to extend the Bill to the Scottish Health Service, and that would clearly be unsatisfactory. There are 15 health boards in Scotland — 12 for the mainland and three island authorities for Orkney, Shetland and the Western Isles. There are no districts. One tier, the health board, is appointed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. The health boards are directly responsible to the Secretary of State for Scotland, and they cover 365 hospitals.

I have never been in a Scottish hospital. I hope that I never have need of one. My attitude is much the same to all hospitals in Scotland, England and Wales and everywhere else. Any Scottish colleagues who read the Official Report of today's proceedings should not feel discriminated against. The National Health Service owes an enormous debt to Scottish medicine, because there is no doubt that for many years Scottish teaching hospitals have been well ahead of many of their contemporaries elsewhere. Scottish medical schools have led the nation for a long time.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): My hon. Friend is treading on dangerous ground there.

Mrs. Currie: I have no doubt that my hon. Friend is about to tell us that teaching hospitals in Nottingham will stand with those of the rest of the nation.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Of course.

Mrs. Currie: As many of my constituents are treated there, I agree with him. However, we must recognise that under the Bill, without the amendments, Scottish hospitals would not be included. As the law stands, Scots people would not be assisted by the Bill, unless the House accepts the amendments that I have outlined. They would continue to have the benefit of only the 1977 law and the rather toothless circulars that were sent out as a result. They would continue to have a patchy service with regard to complaints, with some hospitals setting a high standard of producing leaflets telling people what to expect in hospital and how to take up matters that did not satisfy them, and some offering no advice whatsoever and continuing to act as though the patient were merely a case instead of a human being.

That is not satisfactory. By amending the Bill in this way, we shall ensure that patients in Scotland, along with those in Wales in the hospitals under the special hospital boards, as well as in England, will in future have a complaints procedure that is standard across the nation, compulsory and has statutory force. The procedure should ensure that events such as the horrific incidents described by my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury on Second Reading are investigated, put right and dealt with in a manner that can have the confidence and trust of all concerned.

England had 1,923 hospitals as at 31 December 1983. In total, therefore, 2,455 hospitals would be covered by the Bill if the amendments were accepted, 500 of them added by the amendments. Therefore, the amendments are of crucial significance to the many millions of people being treated in NHS hospitals.

An important element in the amended clause 1 would be subsection (1)(b). As amended, the clause will ensure that the Secretary of State will be obliged to require all health authorities to publicise their complaints procedure. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary said on 22 February:

> "A complaints procedure about which no one knows is of no use to anyone." — [Official Report, 22 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 1389.]

I heartily endorse that. This is the first time that health authorities are being told that they must inform patients about some features of hospital life. It is the first time that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have been obliged to lay that duty on them.

We should clarify one or two points about the amended clause. It does not give the patient the right to demand access to his files. It does not challenge hospital security on medical confidentiality. The British Medical Association had some reservations about that in the original Bill. Those matters are being fiercely debated elsewhere, not least later this morning. No doubt the Bill will add to that. However, that is not the purpose of the Bill and the subsection. It says that every health authority must tell patients in all the units for which they are responsible what to do if they are not happy with any aspect of the service that they receive. Up to now it has been said that they "should" tell the patients. Under the Bill as amended, that will be changed to "must". That is a major step forward. It will no longer be possible for the patient to be ignored. It is a most important part of the patients' charter which my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury published last September, and which attracted so many favourable comments at the time. In the circulars sent out under the previous legislation, the Secretary of State has suggested that each health authority should produce a leaflet. The appendix to HC(81)5 made some rather heavy-handed suggestions of what might be included. Paragraph 7 of the circular says:

"Information booklets should be given to hospital in-patients including, where possible at some suitable time, those admitted through accident and emergency services. These 'hospital booklets' should also be available to patients, on request, in hospital out-patient departments."

Note the word "should", not "must". We shall put in "must" as th Bill goes through both Houses and enters into law. Suggested paragraphs for use in the booklets for patients are contained in appendix 1 to memorandum HC(81)5, which reads:

"If you are seeking information when in hospital, the ward sister will generally be the person to speak to in the first instance"——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must relate her remarks to the amendments before the House and not go into a general discussion about the Bill.

10.45 am

Mrs. Currie: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to point out merely that, without the amendments, the Bill would not work. It would simply reiterate and re-establish the existing rather unsatisfactory procedure.

Mr. John Patten: Having been correctly called to order once before by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am fearful of being out of order again. I am sure that you will correct me immediately if I stray over the bounds.

The amendments relate to procedures south and north of the border, and my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) is speaking to them very clearly. Does she agree that one of the issues raised in the circular to which she referred is the most important issue of monitoring, which is covered in paragraph 8? Authorities will have to introduce, both north and south of the border, systematic and effective methods of reviewing complaints. It is no good just having leaflets available. It is important to have the complaints themselves monitored and reviewed systematically.

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Without such a monitoring system, the complaints procedure has no purpose. It will serve merely to air people's grievances and not correct the problems that led to the grievances in the first place.

My experience supports my hon. Friend in that. I was a member of the old Birmingham area health authority —a teaching authority, which has since been abolished — in the days when the circular to which my hon. Friend refers was published. We did our best to implement the circular, but, with the best will in the world, we had other priorities at the time, such as getting staff in post, particularly on the reorganisation of the Health Service. There are still hospitals in the group for which I was responsible that do not have such leaflets. It is worth emphasising the importance of ensuring that patients all over the country receive appropriate advice on how to complain. The amendment will ensure that that happens.

We had most fun at the Birmingham maternity hospital, a teaching hospital, where I had been a patient twice, in 1974 and 1977, when I had my two children. The hospital had an excellent leaflet. As a patient, I was able to make use of it. Subsequently, as chairman of the health authority responsible for the hospital, I was able to improve it, particularly by choosing better photographs. It may sound trivial to tell a pregnant girl to bring her toothbrush and some change for the telephone, but I assure the House that it felt like good advice when we woke up in the recovery room. We were grateful.

In future, as I understand it, failure to produce an appropriate leaflet will be grounds for complaint, too. I hope that the health authorities do not regard that as too much of an imposition. They should always remind themselves that they run the hospital not for the doctors, not for the convenience of the staff, not alone for the greater gains of medical research or for the reflected glory of being involved with Britain's best-loved institution, but for the patients. The patients are not a nuisance to be kept quiet—they are not a collection of statistics. That is an attitude that we must eradicate.

Amendment No. 4 is concerned with the Health Service commissioner—[Interruption.] There are eight amendments, and as the Bill had its Second Reading on the nod none of those matters was debated then. It is appropriate that we give proper consideration to them at this time. I hope that the House accepts that.

Amendment No. 4 improves clause 2 by ensuring that it extends to Scotland and thus covers the whole country. I accept that this is not the place to debate the role of the ombudsman — I do not intend to do so — but it is important that we do not hamper his work in any way. He was set up under the National Health Service Act 1977, and section 116 limits his powers in the following way:

"Except as hereafter provided, a Commissioner shall not conduct an investigation under this Part of this Act in respect of any of the following matters—

(a) any action in respect of which the person aggrieved has or had a right of appeal, reference or review to or before a tribunal constituted by or under any enactment or by virtue of Her Majesty's prerogative, or

(b) any action in respect of which the person aggrieved has or had a remedy by way of proceedings in any court of law".

That is very specific.

The ombudsman is a most important part of the overall complaints procedure. He deals with about 120 cases a year. He can take up any issue, whether it has a medical content or not. Having been on the receiving end, as a health authority chairman, I know the thoroughness and fairness of his work. He and his staff do a great service to the people and the NHS.

[Mrs. Currie]

Without the amendment, the ombudsman would be rendered helpless, especially in Scotland. He will effectively be out of a job if he is specifically precluded from operating when any other course of action is open to the complainant, whether through legal action, a tribunal, an appeals procedure or whatever. Over time, as the health authorities obey the instructions set out in clause 1 and introduce a complaints procedure and tell people about it, the ombudsman may be unable to take up cases because the Secretary of State and the health authorities have pre-empted him.

Mr. Marlow: I wonder whether my hon. Friend's constituency experience has been similar to my own. Aggrieved constituents have sought my assistance to put them in touch with the ombudsman but in practice he has been able to do very little for them. As often as not, the resolution of their worries has been outside his competence. That is why the Bill and the amendments are so important.

Mrs. Currie: Some of the difficulties of dealing with complaints and of getting people to complain correctly and adequately to the right person at the right time were dealt with in the debate in another place. My hon. Friend raises a most important point. Part of the problem is a matter of attitudes. It is surely possible to advise people of the complaints procedure before they go to hospital for planned surgery or treatment. They should receive a leaflet in advance including advice on what to do if they are unhappy or have questions to ask. That advice should cover not just the patient, but his family, his general practitioner, his other medical advisers, and so on. If the patient has that information before he goes to the hospital he is likely to ask the appropriate questions at the right time and the people treating him are more likely to regard him as a human being whose fears and anxieties have to be allayed, not ignored. We must make that point very firmly today.

As for the powers of the ombudsman, it is worth reflecting that more than 5 million outpatients and, I believe, more than 600,000 inpatients are treated every year. Under the guidance of the Ministers concerned, record numbers of patients are being treated, but there are only about 9,000 written complaints per year which have to be investigated, and the ombudsman deals with only 120.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady said that she did not intend to talk about the ombudsman's duties. She must deal with the amendments.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If the ombudsman is prevented from fulfilling the purpose for which he exists and from meeting the needs of complainants, the question whether the situation is best dealt with by the Minister issuing instructions to regional health authorities or directly to district health authorities would seem to be germane to the debate. To that extent——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is an interesting question, but it is not one for me. It is for the Chair to decide whether a matter is in or out of order.

Mrs. Currie: With regard to amendment No. 4, the law is a little hazy. It is not clear whether the ombudsman would be ruled out of court by the Bill as it stands, but we do not intend to find out the hard way. The clause is especially defective in relation to Scotland. In this context, we are pleased to note and to support their Lordships' amendments, which will ensure that the ombudsman's work in Scotland will continue on exactly the same basis as in the rest of the United Kingdom and that the benefits to which my hon. Friends have referred will be assured.

In my view, the Lords amendments greatly improve the Bill's effectiveness and are to be welcomed. Under the existing legislation it was possible for my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury to visit three different hospitals without being given any information about complaints procedures and to be a patient for months on end without realising that the Secretary of State had written to all health authorities years earlier advising them to set up a complaints procedure and to tell everyone about it. Indeed, other patients turned to him as a Member of Parliament to take up complaints on their behalf. In other words, the powers that be were able totally to ignore the myriad circulars sent out and the advice of the Secretary of State to the effect that they should have a complaints procedure. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury was surprised to read all those circulars and no doubt that was the basis of his determination to make the procedures statutory and mandatory so that no hospital could make the excuse that it did not have time and had not bothered to establish the necessary procedures.

This little Bill, with these important amendments, will be a step forward in patient care. My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury has asked me to thank all the staff at the DHSS for their assistance at all stages of the Bill. I also thank them for their very effective briefing to me in recent days. My hon. Friend has also asked me to thank all hon. Members who have assisted in the passage of the Bill in both this and the other House, especially the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) who must be singled out for special praise as he has taken a close personal interest in the Bill.

Finally, I am sure that the whole House will join me in thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury for bringing forward the Bill. We congratulate him on his success in the ballot and we recognise the courage and dignity with which he presented his case and with which he continues to combat his illness. We wish him good health and we hope that he will never have occasion to set in train the procedures that he has established in the Bill.

Mr. Marlow: The Bill is very welcome, but it is important that it should be coherent and that the amendments should be properly considered. As my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) has said, it is important to include Scotland and Wales —and potentially Northern Ireland as well—so that the whole United Kingdom can benefit from this boon.

At present, the Minister has power to issue instructions but is not required to do so. In the light of my experience of real constituency problems in this area, I am anxious that the Minister should give the instructions to the right people. The House is frequently concerned with human rights issues, but what happens in the Health Service is not just a question of human rights — sometimes it is a matter of life or death. Those who survive the sad death of a loved one are rightly deeply concerned about the circumstances. Sometimes, they fear that something which should have been done was not done or that the concerns of the bereaved have not been properly considered. A constituent whose mother died in a hospital outside the area sought an investigation into the circumstances in the belief that the right treatment had not been given. That may well have been so. The doctors do a tremendous job, but to err is human and mistakes happen. We must consider how complaints of that kind are best investigated in the light of the real burdens of sadness and distress that many of our constituents face.

Where do we go from here? Do we, as the Bill suggests, require the Minister to send to every one of the 192 district health authorities in England an elegantly phrased edict — knowing my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, it will be both elegant and eloquent —as to how they should proceed?

11 am

In Northampton, but not in my constituency, a young girl was recently misdiagnosed and, sadly, died of appendicitis. There was a great deal of publicity and anxiety about the case, and people feel that questions have not been answered.

Is my hon. Friend the Minister required, in regard to the complaints procedure, to pass his instructions to district health authorities or to regional health authorities? If he gives instructions to DHAs, that means that he is responsible for ensuring that they are carried out. If he gives his instructions to RHAs, he has a proper responsibility to ensure that they are carrying out his instructions, but there are 14 of them. Some of us have been in the Army, industry and management and have heard about something called the span of control. The ideal span or number under a chief is eight. I am aware that my hon. Friend is beyond the realms of normal human beings. He is a gifted and gracious man and I am sure that he could cope more than adequately with a span of control of 14. Nevertheless, I wonder whether, in his heart of hearts—for, despite his great skills, my hon. Friend is a modest man — he feels that he could administer and supervise 192 DHAs.

Mr. John Patten: I am naturally loth to intervene in this agreeable flood of compliments, and I hope that my hon. Friend will not feel that my intervention should cut him off from continuing in that vein. Does my hon. Friend agree, however, that there are great difficulties in Health Ministers involving themselves in detailed management, including management of complaints procedures, in 192 DHAs? Does he further agree that it is therefore important that we should issue general instructions to all health authorities, as my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) said, in so doing trying not to intervene unnecessarily beyond the span of control in the running of those 192 DHAs, or that we should approach the task through our regular contacts with the 14 RHAs?

Mr. Marlow: I am beginning to be reassured. Perhaps I might bore the House with my experiences in uniform. When I was in the Army, we had things called Defence Council instructions and Army Council instructions, which were sent throughout the service to every unit, however small, The War Office, as it then was, and the chiefs of staff were not directly responsible for or in control of each unit. I should be worried if I thought that my hon. Friend had to manage the 192 DHAs directly.

It is instinctive for a professional body to look after its own. Disasters are bound to occur in the Health Service, and when they do there is a closing of ranks. There is little controversy about that. If prime responsibility for dealing with the complaints procedure rests within the DHA, responsibility will lie precisely where the ranks will close. It could be advantageous for responsibility to be vested in the higher tier. With responsibility in the lower tier, internal politics and knowledge of individuals——

Mr. John Patten: I am a bit worried about what my hon. Friend is saying. Is he entirely ignoring the introduction of the new management structure, the appointment of the general manager, Mr. Victor Poge, general managers for RHAs and for DHAs and the appointment of managers at units of management level? Does my hon. Friend agree that that provides a line of management which will enable complaints procedures to be dealt with managerially and outwith any closing of ranks, which my hon. Friend suspects might happen?

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend says that I suspect it might happen. I am not suspecting anything in a nasty way; I am reflecting on human nature and how things happen in organisations and institutions. The new management structure is a tremendous step forward. Like him, I believe that it will be massively helpful for the Health Service as, at last, there will be somebody at each level with whom the buck will stop.

We have a police complaints procedure, and one of the criticisms of it is that it is in-house. The police are involved with people's civil liberties. The Health Service——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman tell me to which amendment he is addressing himself? I see no reference to these details in the amendments.

Mr. Marlow: The thrust of the amendments is the inclusion of all health authorities as opposed to just regional health authorities. I am seeking justification for my hon. Friend sending his instructions to each health authority rather than, as the Bill originally provided, to RHAs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must address himself to that argument. I have not heard it deployed yet.

Mr. Marlow: There is anxiety that the police complaints procedure is in-house. I am saying that we should be more careful in the Health Service because we are dealing with matters of life and death. As we are having a complaints procedure, we must ensure that it operates at the proper level. I feel instinctively that the main responsibility could quite properly lie with the RHA, although I accept that, as with Army Council instructions and Defence Council instructions, it is right for my hon. Friend to send his eloquent, elegant and well-written instructions to every health authority in the realm.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will have a good reply to that question. What is the best method for ensuring that my hon. Friend's instructions are carried through?

Mr. John Patten: Ultimate responsibility lies with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Social Services, for Wales and for Scotland. Responsibility for the complaints procedure therefore devolves downwards through the health authority network and management structure in the three different countries. I do not see that my hon. Friend has a point to make, because the line of responsibility goes up to the three Secretaries of State involved.

[Mr. John Patten]

Mr. Marlow: I respect my hon. Friend's point, and I am sure that later he will provide further details that will satisfy even my mind.

In the NHS my hon. Friend has a management structure, just as ICI, BP, Shell, and Guest, Keen and Nettlefold have a management structure. If, as a supplier or receiver of goods, one had a commercial complaint against any of those firms and wrote to the chairman or managing director, there would be a tendency within the firm concerned to close ranks. That is why we have consumer protection legislation. Splendid though the general managers in the Health Service are, if complaints are made relating to their area, are they the best people to operate the complaints procedure, or would it be better done at a higher level? That is the question that I leave with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: In case the crowded Benches in the House this morning should give the public at large the wrong impression, I should like to make a brief contribution in support of the Bill in general and the amendments in particular.

In the 17-line explanation of the purpose of the Bill there are 19 words that we are considering this morning to which the amendments are specifically addressed. Those words are:

"to establish and publicise, as respects each of the hospitals they are responsible for managing, a procedure for dealing with complaints made by, or on behalf of, patients at such hospitals."

Given that that is the kernel of the Bill, I do not think that anyone could reasonably suggest that the amendments do anything but emphasise and underscore those objectives. It is right and proper that we should have one law in the United Kingdom to deal with a hospital complaints procedure. Many of us — even after two years in this House—still cannot come to terms with the fact that we do everything three times — first for England and Wales, then for Scotland and then for Northern Ireland. The public must also be puzzled that we have to multiply our legislation in that way. If the Bill simplifies the procedure, I am sure that that is all for the good.

I do not think that the analogy of generals bypassing their brigadiers and talking to their colonels, in the manner suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is fair. Indeed, if that is how they operate, I can understand why the management structure of the services was in such a mess in the first world war. I think that the point that my hon. Friend was trying to make was that perhaps our worthy colleagues in the DHSS should talk only to the regions and not to the districts.

There are only 14 regional health authorities. My authority is Trent. They are vast organisations. The public might think it more appropriate that the Minister should write direct to the district councils, which are nearer to the grass roots and much more in contact with local people and local Members of Parliament. The Trent region stretches from Sheffield in the north to Leicester, or even further south. Those vast regional authorities employ thousands of staff.

Mr. John Patten: My hon. Friend is pressing me, as I have been pressed hard by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), on the question of devolved responsibility. Will my hon. Friend accept from me that it is our intention, should the Bill become law, that while all health authorities will be given identical instructions, we regard our relationship as being initially with regional health authorities on the general conduct of business, of which the complaints procedure is but one part, and thence onwards to the district authorities, as laid down by law?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I accept my hon. Friend's point without reservation. I am sure that the Bill will be accepted in its present form. I welcome and support it.

11.15 am

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): In the unavoidable absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), I confirm that the Opposition welcome the Bill as a step in the right direction.

Congratulations are due to the promoter, the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), who is not very well and cannot be here today, and to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). We must not only congratulate the hon. Lady but you, too, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for your forbearance during a speech lasting 40 minutes in which Scotland was referred to only half a dozen times, when every amendment relates to Scotland. I am not sure who deserves most congratulations—you for your forbearance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or the hon. Lady for getting away with it.

The hon. Lady also deserves congratulations for striking fear into the heart of the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). That is not an easy thing to do. Perhaps it is a forerunner of what may happen when we deal later with the Sexual Offences Bill.

The Hospital Complaints Procedure Bill is a step in the right direction and we commend its extension to Scotland. We do not need to have separate legislation for each part of the United Kingdom; that is neither necessary nor desirable. The fundamental argument is that there is a need for a proper complaints procedure in the NHS, and that it should extend to all parts of the United Kingdom.

It is regrettable that there is still no proper democratic system for running the NHS, and that matter needs to be examined carefully. From time to time I receive complaints which can be taken up with the area health authority or the regional health authority and I do not always receive satisfaction, despite the good intentions of those involved. In many cases there is no proper way in which to follow up complaints. I know that from time to time the Minister receives letters of complaint about the procedure and he must appreciate that it is not effective.

I should like to see the involvement of local councillors who are directly elected. I commend the efforts of Councillor Hugh Thompson in my own area. He has started the first advice surgeries for people with complaints about treatment in the NHS. They are held on a regular basis so that people have someone to whom they can air their grievances.

I shall be writing to the Minister in due course on another matter which does not fall under the legislation before the House. There are plans in Hammersmith, which is a special health authority area, to close seven wards for the month of August. I have already received several complaints from people who will not be able to enter hospital and will suffer extra pain because of the month's delay. The reason for closing the wards is simply to save £100,000. That is the nature of the problem, yet a few moments ago the Minister intervened to say how much the Government were spending on the NHS. The public recognise that there is a real undermining of the NHS taking place and a deterioration in the services provided.

The Bill is a small but important step towards a proper complaints procedure, and will put firmly on the statute book a recognition of the principle that some form of national complaints procedure is required. But sooner or later the House will have to examine in more detail the administration and control of the NHS on behalf of the people who make use of the services. We should also consider whether it should be separate from local government.

Mr. John Patten: Our interesting short debate has been notable for the fact that the affairs of Scotland and Wales have been debated without many hon. Members from those countries being present to consider the amendments.

I join the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) in paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson). I described him during Tuesday's debate on the NHS as our valiant hon. Friend —and valiant he is. I know that he wished to be here today, but is unable to be present because he is having hospital treatment. He certainly intends no discourtesy to the House by his absence. He has an adequate and elegant substitute in my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie).

The amendments have been fully examined. Most involve the extension of the Bill to other parts of the United Kingdom, though there are also important issues involving the Health Service Commissioners.

Clause 1 lays a duty on the Secretary of State to exercise his existing power to give directions to health authorities requiring the establishment and publicising of specified procedures for dealing with complaints in all NHS hospitals. Lords amendment No. 1 extends the list of authorities to which such directions will have to be given to district health authorities in England and Wales, health boards in Scotland and special health authorities wherever they are located. That provision greatly exercised the mind of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South went into the amendments in detail and I complimented her on her speech, which I followed with great care. We are sometimes a little too free with our compliments in the House, just as we are sometimes a little too free with our abuse of each other. When I read what I had said about the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) at the end of Tuesday's NHS debate, I was a little ashamed of myself. I referred to his possible future as a Front-Bench spokesman and used the words of a well-known first world war song to express my regrets that the hon. Gentleman might not be on the Opposition Front Bench in the future. Perhaps I went a little far and, therefore, perhaps I have been a little restrained in my compliments to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South.

As drafted, the Bill covered only regional health authorities and therefore applied only to England. There are no regional health authorities in Scotland or Wales and it is now intended that the Bill should apply in both those countries. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) complained about our legislative diversity, but the countries that make up the United Kingdom express that diversity in their organisation of the NHS and in other ways, and we have to make appropriate legislative provision for them. However, I understand why my hon. Friend feels that the process takes up much of our time.

Regional health authorities in England are not directly responsible for the management of hospitals. Lords amendment No. 1 will ensure that the directions to be given are addressed to all authorities that have hospital management responsibilities. I made that point two or three times during interventions in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North. I am grateful to him for having given way because we had a useful debate about the responsibilities of the various health authorities.

Lords amendment No. 1 extends the Bill to Wales and Scotland, but not to Northern Ireland. In an enjoyable and all too brief speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South told us his views on legislative diversity and said that he always liked to see one law for the United Kingdom. For two and a half years I was Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and I was often here at two o'clock or three o'clock in the morning debating Northern Ireland issues. I know that if the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) were here today, he would give a "Hear, hear" to the sentiments of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South.

The amendments are technical, but they are important to Wales and Scotland. They are designed to ensure that the Bill can have its intended effect, and the Government support them wholeheartedly. For my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to be able to make directions which will bite on the relevant authorities, the Bill must specify the authorities correctly. As originally drafted, it did not do so.

Clause 1 refers only to regional health authorities. As has been pointed out time and again in the debate, those authorities exist only in England. There is no regional tier of management alone in Scotland and Wales. Moreover, as my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North mentioned in his powerful speech, regional health authorities in England do not directly run hospitals. That is the job of district health authorities and of special health authorities to which my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South referred at length, though I should have liked her to develop her comments on special health authorities, because they are neglected bodies. I fear that all too often the public do not appreciate the relationship between district, special and regional health authorities, particularly in London.

In Wales, district health authorities are the relevant authorities, while in Scotland the health boards run hospitals. The amendment would include those authorities in the Bill. In addition, to the extent that regional authorities are responsible for elements of the management of hospitals, the Bill will bite on them. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North referred to that. I see that he has moved to the Opposition Front Bench; I hope that that is only a temporary aberration.

The Bill was originally intended to apply only to England and Wales, but the Government and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, who has had to give his assent, have agreed that it should apply north of the border as well. My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury has said that he wishes the Bill to be extended as widely as possible and the Government support that objective. There has been no dissenting voice from England, Scotland or Wales during the debate.

[Mr. John Patten]

Lords amendment No. 2, which is also a technical amendment, will include a necessary reference to the legislation governing health boards in Scotland. It will permit equivalent Scottish legislation to be applied in the issuing of directions to health boards north of the border. I commend the amendment.

11.30 am

It is important briefly to consider amendment No. 3, which provides for references to health boards in Scotland to be included in the Bill. It is consequent upon the previous two amendments and ensures that the Scottish health boards are referred to in the Bill where necessary. The Government support the amendment. The issue was of great concern to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, who, I am relieved to see, is now crossing the Floor, back to his rightful place below the Gangway on the Conservative side of the Chamber. I was worried to see him on the Labour Front Bench consulting the hon. Member for Hammersmith.

Amendment No. 4 is interesting and ensures that the Health Service Commissioners are not precluded from carrying out investigations, under part V of the National Health Service Act 1977, into cases that have been investigated under any procedures laid down in the directions to be made by the Secretary of State in pursuance of the duty conferred on him by the measure. Those directions should not in any way interfere with the work or the jurisdiction of the Health Service Commissioners. The amendment makes equivalent provision for Scotland, which the Government wholeheartedly support.

The offices of the Health Service Commissioners, which will be affected by the amendment, provide an important avenue for an independent review of complaints. Certain criteria must be met before the Commissioners can investigate, but they are not onerous and are intended to ensure that justice is done to both the complainant and those complained against. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South made that point, I am sure that the House regrets that she did not speak at greater length on it. The Bill is not intended to restrict the Commissioners' powers, and it is important that that is widely recognised.

A strict interpretation of the legislation governing the Commissioners' activities may well have caused problems. Therefore, section 116 of the National Health Service Act 1977 prevents any investigation of an action where the complainant has a right of appeal, reference or review by a tribunal constituted under any enactment. If the section were not specifically exempted, it might bite on the procedures to be laid down as a result of the Bill. That is not the intention of the Bill and, therefore, clear provision is made to allow the Commissioners to investigate complaints and to exempt the Commissioners' investigations both north and south of the Border.

Amendments Nos. 5 and 6 are technical amendments to ensure that the interpretations of the provisions applying to Scotland are included. Just as there are different legislative provisions north and south of the Border, so Scotland and England are at times divided by legal language. If my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) were present, he would say, "Hear, hear," to that, and stress that it was desirable. The amendments ensure that the Bill will be understood on both sides of the Border, and include necessary references to Scottish law. The Government support them.

Amendment No. 7 refers to clause 2(3) and deals with the extent of the Bill. It deletes references in the Bill which exclude Scotland. The amendments that we have so far discussed render redundant the exemption of Scotland from the Bill, and this amendment brings Scotland fully within the Bill's scope.

Amendment No. 8 deals with the long title, which it is important to get right. At present it refers only to regional health authorities, and the amendment provides for the inclusion of references to district and special health authorities in England and Wales, and health boards in Scotland. As drafted, the long title reflects the previously limited scope of the Bill, but thanks to the advocacy of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South we have extended that scope. The amendment ensures that the long title accurately reflects the amended Bill's contents, and parallels the wording that has been agreed for clause 1(1) in its references to health authorities in England and Wales and health boards in Scotland. We support the amendment.

I hope that the House will approve the amendment and that the Bill will pass into law. My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury, ably and strongly supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South, has advanced the rights of patients to have complaints against hospitals thoroughly investigated within and by the NHS. The Government wholeheartedly welcome the spirit in which the Bill was introduced in February, and hope that the measure will eventually pass into law.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 8 agreed to.

Local Government (Access to Information) Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

ACCESS TO MEETINGS AND DOCUMENTS OF CERTAIN AUTHORITIES, COMMITTEES AND SUB-COMMITTEES

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 14, leave out "other than the Data Protection Act 1984".

11.37 am

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 3, 7, and 9.

Mr. Squire: This is the final stage of a Bill which I am entitled to describe as major. It is major in size, in that it was six pages on Second Reading and is now 36 pages. That is a tribute in itself to the clarifying powers of both Chambers. It is major in effect because it will affect every local authority in England, Wales and Scotland. I pay my respects to and thank my noble Friend Baroness Carnegy of Lour, who gave sterling assistance in another place and enabled the Bill to return to this House. That was appreciated by both me and the Bill's supporters outside the House. I know that she would wish to join me in thanking both the umbrella freedom of information campaign and the community rights project, which have given us a great deal of assistance. Indeed, the Government's advisers have also been of enormous assistance in getting the wording into its correct and final form.

The effect of amendments Nos. 1, 3, 7 and 9 is that local authorities must not release information where disclosure is forbidden by other enactments. That principle, perhaps predictably, was already built into the Bill, but with one significant exception: the Bill overrode the Data Protection Act 1984. That Act mandatorily protects personal information which would enable an individual to be identified and which is held on computer or derived from computer data. While overriding the Act, the Bill sought in the schedule to give local authorities discretion to withhold personal information whether held on computer or by more traditional methods. Thus, all personal information held by local authorities was afforded similar discretionary protection.

However, in the light of discussions with appropriate Departments and with representatives of the Association of County Councils, the Association of District Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, we now all believe that the balance of advantage lies in removing the exception for three main reasons. Before I give them, I should pay tribute to the co-operation that I have received from representatives of the local authority associations, who have laboured long and hard to ensure that the Bill is workable by the local authorities.

The first reason is that the Data Protection Act responds to public anxiety in that it seeks to protect, as an intentional act of public policy, personal information held on computer or derived from data. It deliberately stops short of attempting to extend protection to personal information held in more traditional forms. Therefore, it would be difficult to defend according privacy mandatorily to all personal information held on a computer, or derived from computer data, except information in the hands of local authorities, which would have the aforementioned discretion.

Secondly, the law would be clearer and more readily comprehensible by local authorities and the general public if the prohibition in the Data Protection Act were maintained for local authorities.

Thirdly, in practice, a local authority which wishes to exercise discretion over the disclosure of personal information held on computer or derived from data would still be able to do so. It could register, for specified information, a data recipient as narrow or as wide as it wished, extending in the latter case to the general public.

Those reasons appear to outweigh the case for the exception that was included in the Bill. The local authority associations made it clear that they would prefer the exemption to be removed. Amendments deleting references in the Bill to the Data Protection Act were accordingly tabled and accepted on Report in the other place.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on his introduction of the Bill. It has been supported by the Opposition and by the freedom of information campaign, to which all hon. Members owe a debt. Indeed, the local authorities have supported it. It is a good step forward, and we welcome it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On behalf of the Liberal party, I wish to pay a similar compliment to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire). He picked up the Bill that others had tried to introduce in the two previous Sessions of Parliament. The trio of hon. Members consisted of one from each major party, which shows the all-party nature of the Bill. As last year's sponsor, I am happy that someone else did the work this year, and even happier that the Bill is likely to become law. It is a good Bill and the hon. Gentleman deserves congratulations on the effort that he has put into it. I hope that he will pass on our congratulations to all those who have helped him to get the Bill on to the statute book.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): I am happy to join those hon. Members who have congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on a good Bill, which has been made better by the consideration given to it here and in another place. I am grateful for the tribute that he paid to my officials. I add my thanks to them, because it is much easier to reduce the broad principles of legislation than to carry out the detailed and hard slog of drafting a Bill and of searching for the many other Acts which must be brought into line with it. I know that Mr. Douglas McCreadie and his colleagues, with whom my hon. Friend has worked closely, will be grateful for his kind words.

The Government welcome the Bill and hope that it reaches the statute book without a last-minute hitch. It demonstrates the Government's willingness to listen to and develop sensible proposals for greater freedom of information. I congratulate my hon. Friend on the sterling work that he has done.

[Mr. William Waldegrave]

Of course, we all know how the careers of those who begin their parliamentary careers by introducing legislation on this subject develop. I wish my hon. Friend the success that he deserves as a result of this work.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 9, leave out lines 5 to 15 and insert—

"

(a) specifying those powers of the council which, for the time being, are excercisable from time to time by officers of the council in pursuance of arrangements made under this Act or any other enactment for their discharge by those officers; and

(b) stating the title of the officer by whom each of the powers so specified is for the time being so excercisable;

but this subsection does not require a power to be specified in the list if the arrangements for its discharge by the officer are made for a specified period not exceeding six months."

11.45 am

Mr. Squire: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 8.

Mr. Squire: The amendments are simply drafting changes. Clauses 1 and 2 insert respectively into the Local Government Act 1972 and the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 new sections 100G(2) and 50G(2). They require that a register be maintained of powers exercisable on a contingency basis by officers on behalf of the council. Such amendments bring the provision into line with the wording of the 1972 and 1973 Acts, which refer not to delegation but to arrangements for the discharge of functions.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 3 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No 4, in page 12, line 10, at end insert—

"(f) a combined fire authority".

Mr. Squire: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 5, 6 and 15.

Mr. Squire: Amendment No. 4 extends the Bill to cover combined fire authorities, which may be constituted in England and Wales as bodies corporate under sections 5 and 6 of the Fire Services Act 1947. No such authorities exist at present, but they could be formed in the future to cover two or more counties. It seems sensible for the Bill to provide for this contingency and thus cover all fire authorities, existing and potential. It is consistent with the Bill's application to police authorities, which are all covered, including combined police authorities as bodies corporate under the Police Act 1964.

Amendments Nos. 5, 6 and 15 are consequential. Amendment No. 6 corrects a slight error in the Bill as it left the House of Commons. It removes the words "and the", which were inadvertently left hanging in the air in section 100G(1)(a), as applied by section 100J(4)(b). This provision requires the maintenance of a register of members of joint boards or joint committees.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 5 to 9 agreed to.

Schedule 1

EXEMPT INFORMATION

Lords amendment: No. 10 in page 27, line 16, leave out paragraph 13 and insert—

"13. Information which, if disclosed to the public, would reveal that the authority proposes -

(a) to give under any enactment a notice under or by virtue of which requirements are imposed on a person; or

(b) to make an order or direction under any enactment."

Mr. Squire: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 11, 12 and 14.

Mr. Squire: These are important amendments. Amendment No. 10 substitutes a new paragraph 13 in respect of part 1 of schedule 12A. Amendment No. 12 substitutes an identical new paragraph in respect of the equivalent Scottish provision, which is paragraph 13 of part I of schedule 7A. In each case, the paragraph is qualified by paragraph 6 of part II of the appropriate schedule.

As amended, paragraph 13 of schedules 12A and 7A classes as exempt information which, if disclosed to the public, would reveal that the authority proposes either to give under any enactment a notice under or by virtue of which requirements are imposed on a person; or to make an order or direction under an enactment.

The paragraph is subject to the new qualification in paragraph 6 of part II of schedules 12A and 7A. The purpose of paragraph 13 is to enable a local authority to consider the case for a notice, order or direction and reach a decision on the matter without the person who would be affected by it becoming aware of it in advance, in a case where that person might, as a result, be able to take steps to defeat the authority's purpose. The obvious example is of demolishing a building which was to be the subject of a building preservation notice. Hon. Members will accept that it would be wrong to allow a person who may be thus affected to frustrate the intentions of the authority, assuming that it took such a decision in an ordinary committee.

The amendment broadens paragraph 13 to include circumstances where the authority proposes to make an order or direction under any enactment. This is because the principle behind paragraph 13 can apply to the making of an order or direction as to the serving of a notice. Inclusion of the words in (a) has narrowed the term "notice". It is unnecessary to include within the provision notices that merely inform the recipient of some matter as distinct from requiring him to do, or not to do, something. For example, a notice served on an owner or occupier saying that a compulsory purchase order had been made would not be covered, because there would be no particular advantage in obtaining that information if one could do nothing with it in advance of the decision.

"under or by virtue of which requirements are imposed on a person"

Paragraph 13 does not confer new powers on the local authority to impose burdens or restrictions on citizens. It is merely designed to prevent existing powers being rendered potentially ineffective through premature disclosure as a result of the provisions of the Bill.

Amendments Nos. 11 and 14 substitute a new qualification in respect of paragraph 13 of part I of the schedule. The qualification provides that information falling within paragraph 13 of part I is exempt information if and so long as disclosure to the public might afford an opportunity to a person affected by the notice, order or direction to defeat the purposes, or one of the purposes, for which the notice, order or direction is to be given or made. The new qualification is in line with the principle behind new paragraph 13 of part I. It means that the local authority has discretion to close a meeting under paragraph 13 of part I only where premature disclosure of information to the public might afford an opportunity to the person affected to defeat the purpose of the notice, order or direction. The information will not be exempt once the notice, order or direction has been served or made.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 11 and 12 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 13, in page 31, line 29, leave out

"or the subject matter of the collective agreement"

Mr. Squire: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 16 and 17.

Mr. Squire: These are simply tidying-up amendments. Amendment No. 13 corrects a slight mistake in the Bill as it left the House of Commons. The words were, as the result of an amendment, left stranded at the end of a paragraph that no longer deals with labour relations matters. The amendment merely removes them. Amendments Nos. 16 and 17 are of a similar nature.

"or the subject matter of the collective agreement"

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 14, 15, 16 and 17 agreed to.

Sexual Offences Bill

Order for consideration of Lords amendments read.

11.53 am

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I beg to move, That further consideration of the Lords amendments be now adjourned.

I do so because this Bill, more than most private Members' Bills, embodies matters of great seriousness. It is a far more deep and detailed measure than most of the private Members' Bills with which we deal.

I raise this point of order because of the time that has been available. When the Bill was last in this House, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department properly said that he would arrange for a debate on importing into the Bill the concept of "persistently", such that it would not be an offence if something happened casually. Only if somebody were persistently pursuing a course of action contrary to the Bill would that be an offence. That debate was duly held in the other place and in Committee there, and it was decided that the Bill would be better with the concept of "persistently". That was the issue of principle debated and decided in the other place.

As a result, the rest of the Bill became somewhat incoherent. I do not mean any abuse by that, but the rest of the Bill did not run properly and therefore other amendments were needed. The other place tabled amendments on Third Reading. Its intention was to put the Bill in order, but at the same time another concept was introduced into the Bill, and that was "persistently" or by causing "annoyance" or "nuisance".

These new concepts in the Bill have not been debated in this place. This is a part of the law under which, if the wrong person is picked up, charged and given publicity, it will have the severest effects on his personal relationships, social life, job and reputation. Therefore, we should take the Bill seriously.

The other place debated the amendment last night and introduced the two new elements into the Bill. It concluded its debate at 33 minutes past 8 last night. This is a deep and important issue. It is a matter that touches closely on the civil liberties of many of our citizens. The Bill gives additional powers to the police. I am not saying that that is wrong, but, before the House agrees to this measure, it should have proper notice.

Many right hon. and hon. Members are concerned about this issue. Quite rightly, they are concerned to get the Bill on the statute book, but they are concerned also that the Bill does not put their constituents at risk. We may have the right amendments now, but, with the best will in the world, the other place deciding at 8.33 last night what to put in the Bill leaves no time for right hon. and hon. Members, first, to appraise themselves of what is happening, secondly to discuss it with their constituents, thirdly to take advice about what is happening and, fourthly, to prepare any argument that they might wish to bring before the House.

I plead with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that, in the constitutional interests of the House and in the interest of how we discuss legislation, whatever the rules of order may say, we should not proceed with the Bill until hon. Members are fully appraised of what is happening.

This is the last day for private Members' Bills. However, the Government have participated on this Bill.

[Mr. Tony Marlow]

I am sure that, as they have taken an interest, time could be made available for a debate to be held later on the subject so that the sensitive issues can be properly discussed. I plead with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and put that point to you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's submission, but I cannot accept the motion. We must get on with the business.

Clause 1

SOLICITING OF WOMEN FROM MOTOR VEHICLES FOR THE PURPOSE OF PROSTITUTION

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 1, line 6, leave out from "(1)" to end of line 7 and insert

"A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman (or different women) for the purpose of prostitution—"

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): I beg to move, That this House does agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 11, at end insert

"persistently or, subject to section 5(5A) below, in such manner or in such circumstances as to be likely to cause annoyance to the woman (or any of the women) solicited, or nuisance to other persons in the neighbourhood."

Amendments to the Lords amendment: (a), in line 1, leave out from 'persistently' to end of line 4.

(f), in line 4, after 'or', insert 'serious'.

Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 5.

Miss Fookes: As we are debating several amendments together, it may be for the convenience of the House if I read out the new form of the clause, assuming that all these Lords amendments are incorporated into it. It will read as follows:

"A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman (or different women) for the purpose of prostitution—

(a) from a motor vehicle while it is in a street or public place; or

(b) in a street or public place while in the immediate vicinity of a motor vehicle that he has just got out of or off, persistently or, subject to section 5(5A) below, in such manner or in such circumstances as to be likely to cause annoyance to the woman (or any of the women) solicited, or nuisance to other persons in the neighbourhood."

Contrary to what my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has just said, all these points about nuisance and annoyance were debated extensively in Committee here. My hon. Friend was not a member of that Committee, nor, so far as I know, did he seek to be a member of it. It is not correct, therefore, for him to say that this has in some way been sprung on the House of Commons in an injudicious or hasty fashion.

12 noon.

Mr. Marlow: I did not say that anything had been done hastily or injudiciously. Nor did I say anything which I thought would put the Bill in jeopardy. I do not mean to be critical or aggressive towards anybody today. My hon. Friend will realise that not every hon. Member is on every Committee. Hon. Members may have other activities to attend, or they may be on other Committees. It is not possible for all hon. Members to be on all Committees. Nor should it be possible for that to be the case.

I do not think my hon. Friend is saying that, because an hon. Member is not on a Committee—given that we all have constituency interests and are concerned for the welfare and civil rights of all our citizens—he should not take an interest in a matter. If, therefore, my hon. Friend was making an inference in what she said, I hope that she will withdraw it.

Will she, in explaining this group of amendments, say whether amendment No. 2 applies to subsection (1)(a) and (b) or only to (b)?

Miss Fookes: I was alluding only to what I believe are established facts. I meant no other inference.

Before dealing with points that hon. Members may wish to raise, I will outline the purpose of the Lords amendments, which I accept, and then deal with any queries arising out of them. Although the Lords amendments substantially change the original clause about kerb crawling, they still contain two points which were important to me from the outset.

First, there is a specific offence applying to those who use motor vehicles, as widely defined, for the soliciting of women for the purpose of prostitution. This is such a nuisance in certain areas of some big cities that it is important that that point should be at the heart of the Bill in clause 1.

Secondly, the principle—again, a principle to which I attach great importance—is maintained that, where a woman has a single approach made to her by a kerb crawler and is thereby upset and annoyed, she has redress under the clause.

The other place, however, attached two safeguards, which are alternative safeguards, and I hope that they will allay the misgivings that were expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House when the clause was presented in its original form.

The first is that one will have to show that the man was soliciting for the purposes of prostitution, which, in my view, is a severe test in any case. In addition, the word "persistently" is included—either one woman or more than one woman—and that deals effectively with the point made by those who felt that an innocent man—perhaps asking the way, which seems to be the classic example that we are given—might be accused, tried and perhaps convicted unjustly. I appreciate why, in forming a new criminal clause, hon. Members were seeking to safeguard the innocent. The element of persistence does so.

The second alternative test or safeguard reads:

"in such manner or in such circumstances as to be likely to cause annoyance to the woman . . . or nuisance to other persons in the neighbourhood."

Again, that deals effectively with the bitter grievances of residents who find that their ordinary lives are disrupted by kerb crawling by numbers of different men coming into the area. I hope that it will give much needed relief to areas such as Bedford hill, parts of Tooting, Southampton, parts of my constituency of Plymouth, Drake and other areas of the country. They have looked for redress for long enough. I hope that they will find it in the way in which the clause is now formulated.

Also of interest to the House—this also applies to the question of additional safeguards—is the addition that has been made in the other place about the Crown prosecution service. When we discussed the measure before it went to the other place, I pointed out that the independent prosecution service would afford an additional safeguard against over-zealous police prosecuting a man who might be innocent. I did not think that that was a great risk, but I accept that others thought otherwise.

The result of that matter being dealt with as part of this group of amendments is that the new service, which will be independent of the police, will have to be in operation before that part of clause 1 can be effective. I understand that it might come into operation at different places at different times, but the Minister will be able to give more authoritative information about that than I, a Back-Bencher, can do. This will provide a final and effective test and safeguard against any wrongful accusations or trials in court.

I will not delay the House by dealing with one amendment which is consequential on another.

Two amendments standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North have been included in this group. His amendments would toughen up the clause to such an extent that it would be almost impossible to bring any prosecution with any chance of success. To that extent they are unacceptable, but I will explain in more detail why that is the case.

My hon. Friend's first amendment suggests that in place of "nuisance" the term "serious nuisance" should be in the Bill. I gather that over the years there has been a clear understanding in the courts of what "nuisance" means and that it is not to be taken lightly. To import the additional adjective "serious" would, in my view, restrict the operation of the clause to such an extent as to make it unworkable. For that reason, I could not accept it, although I understand the reason for my hon. Friend wishing to introduce it.

I have explained why the annoyance or nuisance test is useful and why it meets the wishes of residents and women in particular areas who are subjct to the nuisance. To remove it would weaken the Bill unacceptably. Therefore, I must advise the House not to accept the two amendments standing in my hon. Friend's name.

The new package, to which their Lordships gave considerable time and effort, represents a reasonable compromise between those, like myself, who were anxious to see that an effective clause was in place to deal with the nuisance of kerb crawling and the objections of those who felt that innocent men might inadvertently be caught up in a new criminal offence.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend has eloquently set out the position. She will recall that I asked her whether amendment No. 2 covered both paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1).

Miss Fookes: The plain answer to my hon. Friend's question is yes, it does.

I think that I have covered adequately the various points of importance in their Lordships' amendments. I warmly commend them to the House.

Mr. Marlow: First of all, can I draw attention to the remarks of Lord Wigoder in another place? The Bill has gone through the other place, and we are all desperately trying to rewrite the whole of it. The point that I am making is that we have received from their Lordships—I make no complaint about this—a Bill that has been substantially changed. What we are here to debate is whether the changes are the right changes and whether or not they produce the right Bill.

Can I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on bringing this measure to the House and, despite alarms, scares and ups and downs, getting it to this stage? I think that we all agree that in some parts of the country there is a very severe nuisance caused and areas of considerable blight as a result of the habit of kerb crawling that has grown up. I wonder whether it would be appropriate to stress this by referring to some remarks made in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight). My hon. Friend drew attention to what it is like to live in a red light district. She went on to say that she was pleased to say that she had never had the misfortune to do so herself. However, it appears that she has received many complaints from constituents. She said:

> "When kerb crawlers have created a red light district it is as if a blight were over the whole area. I cite the example of a woman who was waiting outside her daughter's school to bring her home. She was accosted by two prostitutes who told her, in the foulest language imaginable, to get off their patch . . . That happens constantly in that sort of area. A young girl was called over to a car by a man who was kerb crawling. The driver exposed himself, which frightened the child and she ran away." —[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 27 February 1985, c. 72.]

These are the sort of things that happen in these areas. I have no doubt that in such areas other forms of crime thrive as well. If my hon. Friend's Bill will rid our country of this blight, I think that we should all be grateful to her.

There are areas where prostitution takes place. There is an element in Northampton but not so much in the area of the town that I represent. I do not think that it has reached the level that was described by my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston in Committee. I think that in those circumstances — the police will probably agree — the police have sufficient and adequate powers to deal with the problem. When the problem has reached the proportion that makes it a nuisance, under the existing law, they have managed to deal with that nuisance. However, there are other areas and those other areas do need, perhaps, the protection of the law; they do not need the protection of morals. I do not think that our constituents are asking us here to take a moral view. They are asking us to prevent abuse and nuisance. They are asking us to do it in such a way that we are not in danger of introducing injustices.

I know that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who is on the Opposition Front Bench, is quite rightly concerned about police powers. I know that he will be looking at the Bill as it is likely to be amended and as it has been amended by their Lordships to ensure that any additional powers that are given to the police are necessary powers.

[Mr. Marlow]

12.15 pm

This is an ambitious area for a Private Member's Bill. It is not an area that is completely devoid of controversy. Where we have an area that is not devoid of controversy, we must be very careful, obviously, how we proceed, particularly when a Private Member's measure is involved.

One thing that has obviously concerned me and my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) is the possibility of injustice taking place. In this particular area, it is not just a matter of somebody going to court and being found guilty when they are innocent. Of course, that is bad enough but that is not the injustice that we are basically concerned with. In this particularly sensitive area one is concerned about the possibility that an innocent man may be picked up, may be charged, may be brought to court and then found to be innocent. The fine that might have been involved would be as nothing compared with the effect of that charge, innocent though he be, on his reputation. It could have a catastrophic effect on a man's marriage. It could have a catastrophic effect on a man's family life.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am listening with great interest to the hon. Gentleman but he must relate his remarks to one of the amendments that is before the House. I invite the hon. Gentleman to do so.

Mr. Marlow: The amendment that I am referring to, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is Lords amendment No. 2, which introduces the concept of nuisance or annoyance. I seek leave to speak also to my amendments, which are (a) and (f). What we have in amendment No. 2 is that a man will commit an offence if from a motor vehicle or whatever he "persistently or . . . in such manner or in such circumstances as to be likely to cause annoyance to the woman (or any of the women) solicited, or nuisance to other persons in the neighbourhood."

We had a long debate in the Chamber—I think that a similar debate took place in Committee — about the inclusion of the word "persistently". My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State felt that to include the word "persistently" would be to weaken the Bill and to make it to that extent inoperable. However, he did agree that the problem had been debated in their Lordships' House. We are, of course, very grateful to them for that. Their Lordships have a great deal of expertise on this subject. There are many Law Lords and lawyers in another place who have been involved in the courts and know the problems that come from the courts. Their Lordships decided in Committee that "persistently" should be imported into the Bill.

The Bill then had problems, so further amendments had to be introduced. My hon. Friend the Member for Drake has said that the amendment that suits the purposes of the Bill is No. 2. We now not only have "persistently"—it is not "persistently and" but "persistently or". The "or" is "in such circumstances as to be likely to cause annoyance to the woman (or any of the women) solicited, or nuisance to any other persons in the neighbourhood."

I am concerned to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister precisely what is meant by that clause. I am particularly concerned about the safeguard

"subject to section 5(5A)".

I am sure that when my hon. Friend the Minister catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker he will have quite a lot to say about that.

The amendment reads:

"in such manner or in such circumstances as to be likely to cause annoyance to the woman (or any of the women)".

I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to tell the House why we have to include the words "to be likely" and why it cannot just be left "in such manner or in such circumstances as . . . to cause annoyance".

In other words, why cannot we have a provision that makes it an offence actually to cause annoyance?

What is likely to cause annoyance to one individual is quite different from that which is likely to cause annoyance to another individual. Some people are happy-go-lucky, carefree and relaxed. Some people are a little nervous, a little concerned and a little agitated. By their nature, they are more likely to feel an annoyance than others. What construction would the courts normally put on this? Do they expect a reasonable person in a reasonable state of mind to be reasonably annoyed? Some people, even with the best will in the world, are fairly fractious.

Amendment No. 2 states:

"or nuisance to other persons in the neighbourhood."

What is "nuisance"? My hon. Friend the Member for Drake told us that it was a well-known concept in the courts, but I am not a lawyer. How grave does a matter have to be for it to be a "nuisance"? If a dog fouls a pavement outside the gate of one's house, is that a nuisance? If someone drives a car slowly up the street in which one lives, is that a nuisance? If a man parks his car in one's drive and spends 15 minutes chatting up five prostitutes and making leery remarks, and the reactions between the man and the prostitutes are offensive to people in the neighbourhood, that is obviously a nuisance. If many people are bobbing around a district looking for prostitutes, jamming the streets, making noises and blowing petrol fumes around the place, that is a nuisance. Where does one draw the line?

I have tabled an amendment which refers to a "serious" nuisance, because I can understand that concept. A serious nuisance causes distress and inconvenience and is a factor that creates a blight in an area. I await the comments of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State with interest.

The Bill has been massively and properly amended by the other place. It is a sensitive issue. If the legislation has been wrongly drafted, the lives and reputations of innocent people could be blighted. The Bill is necessary, and I look forward to hearing the explanations of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): The first debate in Standing Committee was on my amendment No. 2 which would have inserted after the word "prostitution"

"in a manner likely to cause nuisance or offence."

The amendment was fully debated in Standing Committee, but I was not able to persuade hon. Members that it was a sensible improvement.

The next debate was on whether the element of persistence should be imported into the Bill. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr.

Howard) and I argued that it should be. We were unable to persuade the Standing Committee that that was the right change to make.

The House of Commons agreed to let the other place take another look at the matter, and it has done so. Their Lordships have imported into the Bill both the element of persistence and the element of likelihood to cause nuisance or offence. It would be churlish of me to say that that does not represent precisely the improvement that I wanted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is a little unhappy about the element of likelihood to cause nuisance or offence. I understand his fears, but we proposed the importation into the Bill of the element of persistence not because there was an inherent viciousness in persistence which could not attach to a single act but because a person, by being persistent, was more likely to cause nuisance or offence. If the element of persistence is included, there is less likelihood of an innocent person being prosecuted.

If it has to be shown that a person is causing nuisance or offence, that reduces the possibility of an innocent man being prosecuted. In that case, we must clearly define just what it is about persistence that we seek to proscribe. We seek to proscribe the offensive potential of persistence. Although I understand the point put by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, I do not object, for those reasons, to the importation of a likelihood to cause nuisance or offence or to the importation of the element of persistence.

Mr. Marlow: One tries to be careful in this place, and I do not think that I ever said that I was against the importation of a nuisance or annoyance. I was concerned about how this provision was made. The matter should be properly debated and given the safeguards of new section 5(5A). This is a matter on which I need significant reassurance from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. Although my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and some of my other colleagues are in the Chamber, many of our colleagues are not. It is up to us on their behalf to take an interest in what is happening.

Mr. Parris: My hon. Friend is right. We need reassurance on that point. If my hon. Friend's amendment (b) had been selected, I would have supported him, if necessary in the Division Lobby.

We might seek some reassurance on the likely prosecuting policy of the new prosecution service. I understand that there have been discussions as to the type of advice that might be given. I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State says on this matter. He might well offer my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North and me the reassurance that we seek.

I would not go as far as Lord Denning did in the other place on Third Reading when, referring to the Crown prosecutor, he said:

> "He will not prosecute an innocent man, or anything of that kind." — Official Report, House of Lords, 3 July 1985; Vol. 465, c. 1281.]

His contribution to the evolution of English jurisprudence has been immense — and I do not doubt that it will continue—but I think that he goes further than even the most radical of us would wish to go. I would not assume that, because the new Crown prosecutor prosecutes, the man involved is to be taken as guilty. I hope that the House does not assume that either.

We were unhappy about a number of aspects of the Bill in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading. We let the matter go to the other place for another consideration. Their Lordships have in large measure made the changes that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe and I sought. It is right to acknowledge that the Bill has been greatly improved in the other place, that these amendments are right and that, taken all in all, with these amendments the Bill will be a useful addition to the statute book.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) got into considerable trouble in Committee and elsewhere for pushing hard on the door that he has just said has opened a little. I was involved in putting forward amendments that referred to "nuisance". The hon. Gentleman got into a great deal of trouble while I did not — I suspect because I am a member of the official Opposition while he is a member of the unofficial opposition. This supports the old theory that one's opponents are in front and one's enemies are behind. We had the unedifying sight of the Conservative party attacking its own members for not sticking to the party line.

12.30 pm

In fairness, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West has pursued the issue determinedly and in a principled way. I stick by my initial position that I put on the Floor of the House and in Committee — that we are trying to reach the right balance between protecting the rights of individuals and minimising the risk of wrongful conviction with the rights of people in some parts of the country who suffer from men driving or walking around their areas trying to find women whom they think to be prostitutes. Those areas tend to have many prostitutes. It was recognised that that was a problem.

I still take the view, as I did when we began to discuss the Bill, that we are attempting to deal with a complex problem by dealing with only a small part of it. As I have said on a number of occasions, the problem is not one of prostitutes per se. All hon. Members know that it is not and never has been an offence to be a prostitute. It is an offence to solicit for prostitution in a public place.

We need a much more detailed programme to enable prostitutes to meet their clients without causing a public nuisance. That is the core of the problem that we still have not resolved. At the same time, I recognise, as Members on both sides of the House do, that there has been a problem in some limited parts of the United Kingdom.

One of my anxieties, which is shared by a number of my hon. Friends and one or two Conservative Members, including the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West, is that we are legislating for England and Wales as a whole on a problem that affects parts of the country only. That is always a danger that we should avoid if possible. I made suggestions in Committee and on the Floor of the House as to how we should deal with the matter, but it is not appropriate for me to go over that ground again.

The House of Lords has, to some extent, come to our rescue. We were struggling to find a form of words which introduced the concept of nuisance to people who lived in the areas that we were discussing. I put it to the Minister that I thought it possible to find a form of words which would enable residents who felt that there was a nuisance to give evidence to a court or, alternatively, some form of drafting which would enable that nuisance to be made explicit in the Bill. The House of Lords has managed to do that.

[Mr. Clive Soley]

In doing so, the House of Lords has introduced the concept of persistence. The Opposition have mixed views on the issue of persistence. There is a feeling that a person should not have to commit an act more than once for it to be an offence. If something is an offence, it is an offence on the first occasion. The act should not have to be committed two, three, four or more times to prove that it is an offence. That has always been an argument against persistence.

We have the problem because "persistence" was introduced in the concept of prostitution in the first instance. It is always instructive to bear in mind that that was done with good intentions, as so often in this place — to protect women, it was thought, from wrongful conviction. The idea was that a woman should be warned at least three times by the police before she could be charged with being a prostitute. That has resulted in women being taken before the courts and described as common prostitutes. To be described in court as a common prostitute, it was accepted that one had already been warned three times about one's behaviour. We are now introducing the concept of a "common kerb crawler". That is the problem that arises from using the word "persistent". It shows the difficulty of legislating on this matter coherently and consistently.

I believe that the Lords amendment improves the Bill, for many of the reasons given by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West. I am still not happy with it, for all the reasons that I have given previously, but I accept that it may be the only way we have of dealing with the problem in the parts of the country that have been mentioned.

I look forward to hearing the Minister — if I may have his attention for a moment while I refer to him. There is anxiety about whether the Bill will be used wrongfully. Perhaps the Minister will give the House a commitment that the figures showing the number of people arrested, charged and convicted will be made available to the House so that we can see how the Act works over a period.

I understand that the Minister is also prepared to give a commitment to the House about the guidance given to the prosecution service. With the Lords amendments and those commitments from the Minister, I do not wish to delay the Bill's passage.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): May I first say how grateful I am for the helpful way that hon. Members have addressed the task of considering the Lords amendments. I shall try to respond as fully and cogently as I can to the points that have been raised, because it is important that those matters are considered with care. As we all acknowledge, the House should never take lightly the creation of a new criminal offence. Given the careful consideration in both Houses, no one can say that it has been taken in anything other than a most careful way.

Before getting down to some of the details, I think that it would be churlish not to pay the warmest of tributes to my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) for the skill and determination with which she has taken the Bill through the House——

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): And a bit of luck.

Mr. Mellor: I was going to come to that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Drake has also kept in touch with the Bill's progress in the other place, where it was piloted through by a distinguished predecessor, Lady Vickers, who for many years was a most distinguished representative of the city of Plymouth, as my hon. Friend is now. I welcome the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) to his place because he has played a constructive role in the discussions. As he said, my hon. Friend also required a bit of luck, but a bit of luck in a good cause is something that we can all welcome. In the end, I suspect that one of the principal reasons why hon. Members wanted the Bill to go through was not simply that it addressed a serious problem in a serious way, but the respect and regard that they have for my hon. Friend and their wish that she should be gratified in her legitimate desire to change the law in this sensitive area.

When the Bill was conceived, it was designed to create three different offences. That followed careful examination by the Criminal Law Revision Committee of the present state of the law on sexual offences, particularly in relation to the harassment of women in public places. The committee took seven years to consider those matters. We recognise the difficulties that faced the committee in making judgments that are not just legal — I remember the point made by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar on that. It is not just a lawyers' paradise. We are making social judgments, too. It was in recognition of that that the Policy Advisory Committee on Sexual Offences was established, which consisted of people from social services and education, probation officers, psychiatrists, and so on, who were intended to broaden the ambit of the discussion and ensure that the legal discussion did not just fasten on the narrow lawyers' interest, but took account of the wider social implications.

I recognise the matter that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has been at pains to point out throughout the Bill — that, while the Criminal Law Revision Committee is considering the whole of the law on sexual offences, the Bill deals with only a narrow part of it. I understand why he and my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) have said on several occasions that it would have been better if the Bill had dealt across the board with the criminal law on sexual offences, particularly the vexed question of the extent to which prostitution may be permitted in today's society. In an ideal world, I feel sure that that is what we wanted to do. However, so difficult is the consideration of the law on prostitution that it has not even been possible yet for the Criminal Law Revision Committee to conclude its deliberations on that matter.

The difficult decision that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake had to take, and with which we in the Home Office assisted her, was whether the problem of kerb crawling and some of the associated difficulties had reached such a peak that it could not be left on the shelf to await the receipt of further advice. The inevitable difficulty, particularly in a congested Department such as the Home Office, is finding a place in the legislative programme for a major and full-scale reform.

I felt that there was an element of urgency about the matter, which was impressed on me by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who is not here but who has taken a great deal of interest in the matter as the hon. Member representing the Bedford hill area. In an Adjournment debate in February last year the hon. Gentleman raised the problem of kerb crawling in his and other areas in very strong terms. He said that, having banged on the door of just about every Minister at the Home Office, he believed that action could no longer be delayed. On that basis—rightly, as I am sure the House agrees—I asked the Criminal Law Revision Committee if it could bring forward its consideration of the kerb crawling aspect of the law on prostitution so that its report would be available in the summer of 1984. If any hon. Member was then minded to bring in a Bill on the subject, as my hon. Friend the Member for Drake subsequently was, the House would be able to pass a law on the matter far more quickly than would otherwise have been possible. I am very glad that the Criminal Law Revision Committee was able to do that and that its advice was set out in such straightforward terms.

My hon. Friend the Member for Drake then had to decide whether to follow the advice of the Criminal Law Revision Committee or whether to take a different approach to the problem. She was persuaded—like the Criminal Law Revision Committee and, I believe, the whole House—that the time had come to address the problem of kerb crawling and that one could no longer take the attitude taken in the 1957 report that the problem had not yet become so serious and commonplace as to justify making kerb crawling a criminal offence. The balance of convenience has plainly changed and the Criminal Law Revision Committee was right to recommend a change in the law.

The question which aroused controversy both here and in another place was how the law should be changed to strike the difficult balance between providing the relief from this problem that women in many areas undoubtedly need and taking account of the difficulties which arise in sensitive matters of this nature as we have done on previous occasions by introducing the concept of persistence into other statutes relating to sexual behaviour in recognition of the fact that the risk of a miscarriage of justice, which may arise under any criminal statute, is perhaps a greater risk in this area of the law.

My hon. Friend the Member for Drake elected to follow the advice of the Criminal Law Revision Committee and to create three offences. The first deals clearly and unequivocally with the problem of kerb crawling and makes it clear that if a man solicits a woman from a motor vehicle for the purpose of prostitution an offence is committed. That obviates the need to rely on the rusty old blunderbuss of the Justices of the Peace Act 1361 which, apart from many other drawbacks, can result only in binding over. The intention is not to jam the courts with kerb crawlers but to send out a clear message that kerb crawling is a criminal offence and thus to deter many people who might have indulged in the practice while it remained hedged about with equivocation.

It was recognised that in the case of offences occurring in the street but unrelated to kerb crawling by motor vehicles a requirement of persistence was appropriate, as is already the case in the parallel provisions relating to homosexual soliciting. The fact that persistence is required in the case of people on foot but not in the case of those soliciting from motor vehicles has struck some hon. Members on both sides of this House and in another place as rather odd and there has been legitimate and persistent debate on that aspect at every stage of the Bill. I make no complaint about that, and I know that others will make no complaint about the fact that I have a very firm view on the matter to which I still hold.

The revision committee then considered the more difficult problem of whether solicitation of women in a manner likely to cause fear, irrespective of whether it was related to prostitution in a street environment, should be an offence. It recommended that it should, and my hon. Friend the Member for Drake took up the matter. That was far and away the most difficult proposition among many difficulties in the Bill. It has been recognised generally here and in another place that, although the advice of the revision committee is worth while, we were not wholly persuaded that it would be appropriate to broaden the scope of the Bill to include cinemas and other places where, perhaps, the case for change is not so clear-cut.

Because of the extraordinary happenings on those two Fridays a couple of months ago when the Bill died and was revived, we did not take out clause 3. It was taken out in another place and we shall have an opportunity to give that our blessing later.

12.45 pm

I am glad that there was discussion of clause 4—the increase in penalties — in another place because the matter has not been subject to amendments, although some have been proposed. It is a grave and potentially dangerous anomaly that the penalty for indecent assault, which can be committed by a serious sex offender, is only two years. The courts have drawn attention to the fact that such a sentence is wholly inappropriate and that it could be in everybody's interests, including the offender, to confine an offender and to increase the penalty to 10 years.

The increase in the penalty for attempted rape from seven years to life imprisonment would, but for a proviso in the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, already be in place. That Act rightly took the view that, because the intention is always to commit the full offence, to be guilty of attempt, the intention must be more serious than the act. As the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar, who is nodding assent, knows, somebody can be convicted of murder if he intends to cause serious bodily harm but he cannot be convicted of attempted murder unless he intends to kill. On advice from the revision committee, the House took the view, in 1981, that the penalty for an attempt should always be the same as the penalty for the completed offence on the basis that that left the courts with proper discretion to sentence.

Attempted rape was left out of the 1981 Act because the revision committee was considering the merits of that offence. It was thought right to leave the matter as it was so that it could be taken up in a full-scale review of sexual offences, to which the hon. Member for Hammersmith looks forward. Time has passed and the pond has perhaps got a little murkier. It is not appropriate to leave this gap any longer. A dangerous sex maniac might not succeed in carrying out the full act of rape, but he might have such a history of offending that, having committed the rape, he would have been sentenced to life imprisonment.

As the Minister who deals with life sentence matters, I know that some of the most difficult cases on which to make a decision about release are not the homicide cases but the non-homicide cases in which people, when at liberty, have been driven to acts of ever-increasingly serious sexual misbehaviour. Without going into the matter in too much detail, it is surely an anomaly that in dealing with distinctions of millimetres on the question of when attempted rape becomes rape, the courts should have their hands tied. Therefore, I am sure that the changes that have been made will be widely welcomed.

[Mr. Mellor]

We are principally concerned with clauses 1 and 2. I have made clear my view that to import any consideration of persistence or of nuisance and annoyance would weaken the impact of the Bill. My views were accepted in this House but not in the other place, although I was glad to see that that most distinguished of common lawyers, Lord Denning, took the opportunity in the debate — as obviously one hoped that he and others like him would — to make clear his view that that was the right approach.

The process of legislation, particularly on private Members' Bills, involves each of us giving the best advice that we can to the House, but if others choose to disagree and their view prevails, it is then up to us all to make the best that we can of the new arrangements, and certainly not to stand in the way of the Bill proceeding because it does not represent what one would personally regard as the best arrangement.

Their Lordships, having taken their decision about persistence, then made certain amendments which enabled the Bill to be a workable Bill. Therefore, I am not grudging in my acceptance of it or in my recommendation that we should accept it. I am warm in my feelings towards the Bill, although I would have been positively steaming about it if I had had my way entirely. But that is life.

In the debate in the other place the issue of persistence was considered. Several peers took part in the debate, some with legal qualifications, others without. However, we do not want our debates to become blighted with apartheid in the sense of Members having or not having legal qualifications. After the debate, by a majority of 33 to 26, the decision was taken to insert the word "persistently."

After that there were deliberations in the other place and also outside. I was glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake played some part in those deliberations. We tried to see whether, the decision having been taken that the element of persistence was needed, there was a case for introducing a parallel offence which, in a very specific case, would not require the element of persistence. We wanted to ensure that the Bill would be workable and deal with the central problem that had been troubling all of us so much.

There are two competing problems with which we are concerned. The first is the blight upon an area where prostitutes operate openly in the streets and where there is kerb crawling by potential clients. The prostitutes are happy about that but, obviously, not the rest of the community. Several hon. Members, particularly my hon. Friends the Members for Derbyshire, West and Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), have had the quite legitimate concern that one single act could be misinterpreted by an over-zealous policeman. Inevitably, the prostitute herself would not be available to give evidence, being happy about the transaction, and it would be wrong to blight someone's prospects, career and future family life — matters to which my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North has referred eloquently today and on other occasions — on the basis of one equivocal incident. For that reason, it was felt necessary to have the clear safeguard that such an incident should have to happen twice.

However, having agreed with that view, their Lordships recognised in their intensive discussions that that would not deal with the other major problem that has caused us so much concern and led many people to want to change the law, which is the situation where the woman who is the object of the solicitation is not a prostitute, but an ordinary woman—one's sister or wife, or someone else's daughter—going home or to visit a friend and not dressed in a way that could be described as extravagant or sexually provocative.

Polls in Bedford hill and many other parts of the country showed that such women were regularly being propositioned, and their pleas for redress are every bit as intense as those of people who are embarrassed by the fact that their home street has become a haunt of known prostitutes.

If such a woman had been the subject of an unwarranted approach, probably in abusive and insulting terms, it would be wrong to require the same thing to happen to someone else before there were any means of redress. The recognition of that fact has united us. We have all been troubled about that matter, however we may differ about the ways of building in safeguards. I know that that aspect worries my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, and my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West put it well in Committee when he said:

"I can see that to embarrass a woman gravely or to inconvenience her seriously may be enough of a crime to warrant prosecution. Many women, particularly those who live in London and in the areas where the problem exists, are inured to such solicitation and are probably no longer put in fear by it, simply because it happens so often, but that does not mean that it does not offend or inconvenience them, or that those who solicit should not be prosecuted."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 20 February 1985; c. 7.]

There was common ground in their Lordships' consideration of finding a way whereby innocent women —our wives, sisters or mothers; the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) showed how catholic is the taste of some of these gentlemen when she recounted a personal experience of a kerb crawler—can be protected.

Equally, their Lordships wanted to be sure that vexatious and improper prosecutions would not arise. That is why the concept of nuisance and annoyance was exhumed, as so many parts of the Bill have been exhumed from time to time, and inserted in parallel with the concept of persistence, so that if nuisance is caused to persons in the neighbourhood or annoyance is caused to the woman, there is no reason why a criminal penalty should not ensue. That is the proposal which their Lordships ask us to accept.

There need to be safeguards. The fact that the words "nuisance" and "annoyance" have been inserted makes it virtually inevitable that there will have to be evidence from either the woman who was the victim of the solicitation or a local resident who clearly saw and heard what was going on. The safeguard is built in by the need to establish nuisance or annoyance and not merely the fact that the act of solicitation took place.

I appreciate that, as many hon. Members and noble Lords have said, perhaps we should take advantage of the recent creation, with all-party support, of an independent prosecution system to ensure that, even more than anyone could claim today, there is an objectivity in the decision to take a case to court, given all the implications that follow from that and about which my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North spoke so eloquently. There is a case for providing that only in the most exceptional circumstances should a case under the nuisance or annoyance provisions proceed without a non-police witness being available.

As my noble Friend Lord Glenarthur pointed out, the Director of Public Prosecutions is ready, if the House thinks it appropriate, to give guidance to Crown prosecutors about the operation of this part of clause 1. The guidance would be along the lines that where the charge alleges annoyance to the woman solicited or nuisance to other persons in the neighbourhood, it should, save in exceptional circumstances, be supported by the evidence of someone other than a police officer, and, wherever possible, by that of the woman herself. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North sees that as a step forward. It binds in to the point that I made clear to the hon. Member for Hammersmith when we last considered the Bill—that we shall monitor the number of cases that are put to the independent prosecution service as being worthy of prosecution, the number it decides to prosecute, and the number that result in conviction. Those three sensitive figures will show whether the Act is being properly applied.

1 pm

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North that we should not put innocent transactions, such as asking directions, in jeopardy. We have had to strike a balance between wanting to protect women and wanting to protect men from unreasonable prosecutions. After all our efforts, I believe that we have struck that balance, and obviously I hope that hon. Members agree.

Before I deal with some of the detailed points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, I wish to pay warm tribute, not merely to those in this Chamber who have helped to ensure the passage of the Bill, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West who, having recognised how much progress has been made, spoke warmly in support of the proposition today, but to those in the other place who have played a leading role in ensuring, at some difficulty to the procedures of the other place, that the Bill was debated two nights running this week so that it could return to this House in time.

Lord Denning gave the wise advice that one would expect from the foremost common lawyer of the century. There was considerable assistance from the Opposition Front Bench, especially Lord Mishcon, who was ably assisted by Lord Elystan-Morgan, who was the most reluctant to accept the arrangements, but in the end was willing to do so. I am grateful to him for that, as I am to Lord Houghton, for whom I have a particularly high regard because of our joint work on animal welfare and experimentation—issues with which my hon. Friend the Member for Drake is also intimately concerned. He was undoubtedly unhappy about some elements of the Bill, but he determined that sufficient had been done to change it to his satisfaction. I salute him for a typically courageous and principled approach to the matter, which has been echoed by my hon. Friends the Members for Derbyshire, West and for Northampton, North. Lord Harris, a former Minister of State, Home Office, Lord Wigoder, a distinguished practitioner in criminal law, and, last but not least, Lord Monson all took part in intensive discussions and helped to bring the Bill through to this stage.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North has properly asked telling questions about what exactly the Bill means. I want to deal with his important and valuable points. He reminded us that clause 1 will read as follows:

"A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman (or different women) for the purpose of prostitution (a) from a motor vehicle while it is in a street or public place; or

(b) in a street or public place while in the immediate vicinity of a motor vehicle that he has just got out of or off, persistently or, subject to section 5(5A) below, in such a manner or in such circumstances as to be likely to cause annoyance to the woman (or any of the women) solicited, or nuisance to other persons in the neighbourhood."

The first point that we must make about that is that it creates two alternative ways of bringing the offence. The second point that should be emphasised is that, to show that what we say about the role of the independent prosecution service is not just window dressing — I strongly commend this point to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North because it goes a long way to meeting his points about the innocent not suffering —clause 5(5A) states that this part of section 1 should not come into force until the independent prosecution service is operating in the area. Therefore, I have entered into a meaningful commitment today. There is no risk of the law being enforced for about 12 months in some cases, and possibly longer in others, by arrangements that are not in accordance with the new framework that we have established. That shows the good faith that we have been anxious to establish.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North asked me about nuisance. One reason why their Lordships were attracted to the proposition which, in its final form, emerged from discussions in which the lead was taken by Lord Denning and by First Parliamentary Counsel, was that we should distinguish between what must be proved in relation to the woman solicited and the neighbourhood, because their interests are different. For the woman, we wanted an offence of annoyance, and I shall come to my hon. Friend's pertinent questions about how that should be tested in a moment. As for the neighbourhood, we are talking about nuisance, not annoyance, because nuisance to a place is the commonly understood, familiar tool in the courts. It is much better to cleave to words which lawyers are accustomed to using in other contexts than to use new words.

My hon. Friend posed several carefully thought-out questions, and I do not believe that it is ducking the questions to say that it is impossible with this, as with any other issue of fact, to give a conclusive answer. Such issues of fact must be determined by the courts, which will consider the background to the alleged offence, basing their consideration on the way in which they approach nuisance in many other contexts. The word "nuisance" is found in civil and criminal law. Nuisance is a question of fact, and the court will investigate all the circumstances of the case: when it happened; the manner in which it happened; the effect of what happened; and whether all the circumstances lead to the conclusion — this is the key point—that the nuisance was material and substantial.

The damage — this is the reinforcement which my hon. Friend seeks — must not be merely sentimental, speculative, trifling, temporary, fleeting or evanescent. I have not dug that list of words out of "Roget's Thesaurus", they have come from cases in which the courts have said, based on the way in which they have dealt with the concept of nuisance, that it must be none of those things. The framework exists for a common-sense recognition of what nuisance is.

[Mr. Mellor]

We come to the equally difficult point of the objectivity of the complaint. My hon. Friend is troubled by the possibility of a woman being excessively worried by what would be regarded by others as perfectly normal approaches, and that that woman could wreak havoc with the career of a man who simply drove up to her and asked, "What is the way to the public house?" The woman could say that she had been approached in a way that gave her the right to complain under the offences contained in the Bill.

The key to this is the use of the words "likely to", which I know trouble my hon. Friend. I believe that the words "likely to" will ensure that a properly objective test is applied. We do not want a definition of nuisance or annoyance that varies with the length of the individual's foot. We want the courts to be able to say, "Would a person of reasonable firmness, placed in a similar position, be caused annoyance?" In other words, was it likely, and would a reasonable person in the offender's position know, that such an approach was likely to cause annoyance?

Mr. Marlow: The amendment says:
"likely to cause annoyance to the woman".
Does that imply a woman of reasonable firmness or the actual woman involved in the incident?

Mr. Mellor: That is a perceptive question. I believe that it means likely to cause annoyance to women. It does not mean that the court would take into account the particular circumstances of the woman, unless those circumstances were obvious. If the incident involved a woman with a white stick, the court would be entitled to take account of the fact that it is more likely that some words would cause annoyance to a disabled person, who in any event would be disoriented by any approach, than to a woman in full possession of her faculties.

I believe—and, what is more important, some of the distinguished people who have been mentioned as being involved in this believe—that an objective test is being established. It is proper and helpful for my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North to ascertain this. I agree that if the House were not satisfied that this was an objective test, it would be entitled to be sceptical, but there is an intention that there should be an objective test, and I think that that intention has been properly carried into effect with the wording.

Mr. Parris: Does my hon. Friend's argument work the other way? Suppose that a woman was not offended or annoyed, perhaps because she was a policewoman, although in plain clothes. If the solicitation was such that, had she been anyone other than a policewoman inured to this kind of thing, she would have been annoyed or offended, would the solicitation be likely to annoy or offend her?

Mr. Mellor: That would follow, but the element that is different, and that we have added by way of a safeguard, is that no longer are words of solicitation for the purpose of prostitution enough in themselves. They have also to be of a kind likely to cause annoyance. In other words, they have to go quite far.

A purely innocent member of the public might find that any words of solicitation were likely to cause annoyance, so the differences in some cases may not be great. However, it is important, because it gives a firm basis to the contention that lies at the heart of this matter—that there should, wherever possible — and only in exceptional circumstances not—be available a person who is not a police officer to give evidence. If these people are so offended that they look to us for redress, they have to be prepared to play a part in getting redress. They cannot slough off that responsibility on to others. We have achieved that, and changed the position.

I hope that what I have said satisfies my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North. I am happy to give way to him if I can be of any assistance to him on any other points.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his patience, his careful exposition of the position, and the way that he has taken account of the points that I have made. I feel that the safeguards that he has suggested stand a good chance of achieving what both he and I are seeking to do. I congratulate him on what he has done.

Mr. Mellor: That is a most handsome remark for my hon. Friend to make. I am extremely grateful. It has been no hardship to deal with these points because they are essential to our consideration of the Bill. It is right that these matters should be properly looked into. I have always been concerned to see that everyone recognises that in the end—I had to learn this lesson as much as anybody else—the process of getting the Bill right is one of give and take. All of us will come with different views, and we shall not get everything we want.

My hon. Friend has made it clear that he is anxious only to test whether the Bill meets the worries that he legitimately has. I am glad that he thinks that I have satisfied him, and I thank him for his useful contribution, now purged of any suggestion that it was based on malevolence towards the Bill's future. I thank him for the interest that he has shown on previous occasions. The Bill strikes a balance that all new criminal legislation would do well to achieve—a balance between effective controls of activities which the criminal law should address and effective safeguards for those whose activities should not be drawn within its scope.

1.15 pm

The message which I hope we are able to send out this morning is that the buying and selling of the services of a prostitute must not take place in and around the homes of ordinary people who wish to go about their daily lives without the nuisance and offence that is caused on an intolerable scale in many inner-city areas.

The message also goes out in the Bill that serious sexual offences will be adequately punished as a result of the increases in the maximum penalties which clause 3 effects. I consider both signals to be important and worth while.

Mr. Soley: I am sure that it was inadvertent, but given that the Minister is sending out a message, he might wish to reconsider the phrase he used about the buying and selling of the services of a prostitute "in and around" homes. The Bill does not apply within the home. He may wish to clarify that.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman is right. We are dealing with the public manifestation of the problem. I am grateful to him for following my remarks with care enough to correct me when I am incorrect.

We have managed to build in the safeguards that the House wanted, while doing what my hon. Friend the Member for Drake and I consider to be absolutely paramount—sending out the message that kerb crawling is an offence. The fact that the Bill covers one approach to a woman who is caused nuisance and annoyance—and which is shown by objective analysis to have been an offence—means that people cannot go kerb crawling thinking that they can have one bite of the cherry and that, so long as they get that right, there will be no problem.

We have been greatly assisted by the other place in our consideration of these matters. I commend to the House the amendments that their Lordships have suggested.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 and 3 agreed to.

Clause 3

SOLICITING A WOMAN IN A MANNER LIKELY TO CAUSE HER FEAR

Lords amendment: No. 4 leave out Clause 3.

Miss Fookes: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The purpose of the amendment is simplicity itself. It seeks to delete clause 3, the essential substance of which reads:

"A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear."

Their Lordships have been good enough to honour an undertaking given by me, in consultation with the Minister, to this House before their Lordships considered the Bill. It was felt that the clause could give rise to serious concerns and that perhaps it went too wide in what is essentially, I still think, a useful proceeding to ensure that a woman has redress when she is put in fear by approaches from a man for sexual purposes of whatever kind. We recognised that that was a worry and it was understood that we would not press it. This amendment achieves that, and I am grateful to their Lordships for making it.

There have been numerous excitements with the Bill, both here and in the other place. It may date me to refer to a splendid little wireless programme in the days of my childhood entitled "Dick Barton, Special Agent." From 6.45 pm to 7 pm this hero had the most exciting adventures. Sure enough, at half a minute to 7 o'clock he would be within an inch of losing his life. That happened every night. I felt like that myself when I had several narrow shaves with the Bill. Indeed, there were several this week.

When I say that I am grateful for the assistance that I have received, I am not reciting those words without feeling. I am intensely grateful for the assistance that I have received from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and others who have been helpful to me from the very beginning of the Bill's passage. Those others will know who they are. I am grateful also to those who were willing to sponsor the Bill. It is quite an undertaking for a private Member to carry forward such a measure, bearing in mind that it seeks to create more than one new criminal offence.

I am grateful, of course, to those who served as members of the Committee. I thank especially Lady Vickers, who had such a distinguished career in this place. Lady Vickers' part in the Bill's passage through both Houses involved her in a great deal of work and some anxiety. I am grateful to those of their Lordships who gave a great deal of their attention—many of them have great experience of criminal matters and matters of life generally—to the Bill.

I am happy that the Bill retains the essential features which it was my intention to embody in law from the beginning. I hope that the Bill will be satisfactory to the hard-pressed residents of red light areas who have suffered for many years from the increasing menace of kerb crawling.

During the Bill's passage through Parliament I have been impressed by the number of letters that I have received and by the meetings that I have had with residents' associations, especially those from Wandsworth. I learned a great deal in the course of the proceedings and it is with the greatest pleasure that I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Marlow: I hasten to say to my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) that I am not rising á la Dick Barton because I think that the amendment requires another 68 minutes of debate. I rise purely to say, as one whose activities might have implied some disagreement with some of her proposals earlier in the proceedings, how grateful the whole House is to her and how grateful the country will be that she has tackled this problem in the way that she has, and that she has brought forward a measure which I think the House now believes will deal with this problem, this blight, which affects many of our inner-city areas.

Although my hon. Friend might have been concerned about some of the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) and I were making, we were concerned purely to see that there was no danger, in a new criminal law, that innocent people could be brought before the courts and their reputations and lives blighted accordingly. I feel that we have now reached a stage when my hon. Friend's requirements have been met and the innocent are no longer in danger. I would like finally to say that I congratulate my hon. Friend on her courage and persistence and on getting it right.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 5 agreed to.

Licensing (Amendment) Bill [Lords]

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

1.24 pm

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third Time.

I should like to pay tribute both to Lord Harmar-Nicholls for bringing forward this measure in the other place and to my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) who formally moved the Second Reading and assisted the Bill through its Committee stage, which was not too controversial or arduous and lasted about 15 minutes. Because the Bill had slid through the House so quickly, you may be prepared, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to allow us to say a little more about it on Third Reading than would normally be the case.

This is a modest measure, but we must bear in mind the important part that the entertainment industry plays in our nation's economy. The contribution of hotels, restaurants, dance places, café entertainment and many public houses is significant and extremely valuable. In our balance of payments, the invisibles earned by these sectors are second only in total to those earned by banking.

In a limited number of those hotels, restaurants, dance halls cafés and public houses where entertainment and food are provided, it is possible under present legislation to apply to licensing magistrates and, having justified a need, to be granted special hours certificates or extended hours certificates, which result in those establishments being able to continue to sell liquor and part of the general entertainment between 12 midnight and 2 am, instead of finishing at midnight. The certificates extend business for only two hours. The applicants must demonstrate to the magistrates that there is a need. The certificates are available for 310 of the 365 days in the year, which leaves 55 days in which they cannot be obtained. Fifty, two of those days are Sundays, which leaves three days — Maundy Thursday, Good Friday and Easter Saturday. The Bill is concerned only with those three days. It will extend to those days the same privilege that is given to the other 310 days. We have all accepted that privilege. It is practised in Scotland. We are talking about another two hours of business on three days only, or another six hours of drinking a year. That is not very much.

The measure is important because alcohol consumption is such a controversial subject. Any discussion of liquor licensing and permitted hours inevitably returns to the Erroll Committee's report of 1972, Cmnd. 5154. Since then, there have been two attempts to pass a Bill providing more flexible hours — the first was introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and the second by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). Both attempted to extend the hours from 11 am to 11 pm, primarily to give flexibility. This is what the licensed trade has been reqesting for so long. The Bills attempted also to allow children under 14 in to pubs, and perhaps it was for that reason as much as any other that they failed.

Nevertheless, the debate about those Bills in the House and outside showed that there is anxiety over increasing alcohol consumption and pressure has been brought on the Government by various bodies, notably the National Union of Licensed Victuallers. I should declare an interest because I act as a parliamentary adviser to that organisation. I should, perhaps, also declare an interest as a licensee, although I am afraid that the Bill, as it stands, will not have much effect on public houses. Representatives of the tourist industry and the breweries have also made representations about making our licensing laws more flexible as has happened in Scotland.

"Drinking Sensibly", published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in 1981, recorded that there were indications that extended permitted hours and Sunday opening in Scotland had not resulted in any increase in total consumption.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Member should be careful. I do not wish to seem to be too intolerant, but he is aware that on Third Reading we are required to confine our remarks to what is in the Bill and not what might have been, compared with other legislation.

Mr. Colvin: I stand corrected, but I believe that the Bill should be viewed in the context of the wider licensing laws. That is why I think that you will find, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that everything that I say will have a direct bearing on the measure before us. I shall, however, keep my remarks as brief as possible.

The subject of flexible licensing hours is relevant to the Bill. The key points are, first, that the present licensing law was designed to meet the social and economic conditions prevailing shortly after the first world war. That is a long time ago, and the time has come for some reform.

Secondly, the circumstances are now dramatically different. There are new work patterns, greatly increased social expectations and a vastly increased public demand for up-to-date catering and leisure facilities. Those are, of course, growth industries. We are interested in jobs. Those are labour-intensive industries and should be encouraged.

Thirdly, the ability to provide better services to meet customers' requirements is generally inhibited by the present rigid system of permitted hours. That is another reason why I welcome the Bill. It will give customers further flexibility on at least three days a year.

Fourthly, the retailers most disadvantaged by the present system include over 78,000 small businesses— independently owned and tenanted public houses, restaurants and hotels.

Fifthly, in Scotland the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, which was introduced following the Clayson committee inquiry, introduced a wide measure of flexibility that has resulted in social and economic benefits.

Sixthly, many public houses in Scotland have changed their character since the new law. They now offer much more food, better services and general amenities.

That is an important point to bear in mind because under the Licensing Act 1964 the section that the Bill aims to amend limits the provision to catering outlets, hotels and other such establishments offering food and entertainment. In many cases, our public houses do neither. When passed, the Bill might be an incentive to our public houses to broaden the scope of the services that they offer. Many more now offer food, but to offer food and entertainment generally would not just widen the scope of their own businesses but would be good for the economy generally, and would enable them to benefit from the Bill's provisions.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument with great care. He knows that when he talks about a growth area, he is talking about increased sales. He knows that there is also a massive growth area in the problems associated with alcohol abuse. Therefore, can he say a little more about those problems and that growth area, and put it in the context of the growth area of employment, income and so on?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) will not be tempted down that road. I have been very flexible and tolerant so far. We have strayed a long way from what is in the Bill. I hope that we shall get back to it.

Mr. Colvin: I shall not reply directly to that question. I hope that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) will forgive me. Nevertheless, he has raised an important point. It is in the context of alcohol abuse that the debate on more flexible hours is being conducted. That is why the next point that I wish to make is relevant.

Government statistics have suggested that there has been a massive drop in drunkenness offences in Scotland since the new law was introduced, which must be partly as a result of the flexible hours system. A survey was carried out by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, and it is worth quoting the summary at the end, which says:

"The preliminary anaysis . . . has shown that an increase in alcohol consumption occurred in Scotland between 1976 and 1984, and that the increase was almost entirely contributed by women . . . Since consumption by men did not rise between 1976 and 1984 it seems unlikely that the increase in women's drinking is a direct consequence of the changes in licensing legislation, but rather that it results from a change in Scotland to a more relaxed attitude towards drinking in general, and in particular towards women's drinking. It is perhaps because of this more relaxed approach to drinking that more women now drink in public houses, and that the extensions to licensing hours brought about by the 1976 Act tend to be seen as having led to more sensible drinking, rather than as offering a temptation for people to drink more."

That is the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Soley: Keeping within the rules of order, I remind the hon. Gentleman that the research on that project, which I welcome, is not as complete as we should like. Surely one of the principal guides to which the hon. Gentleman should address himself is not charges of drunkenness, which are not a good indicator, but the number of cases of cirrhosis of the liver, which have increased, although only marginally.

Mr. Colvin: I do not think that I dare answer that question. You were lenient, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in allowing me to slip in a reply to the hon. Gentleman's previous question.

No doubt, if the Minister is so minded and has a word in the ear of the Home Secretary, we may see a Bill in the House before long during which we can debate in detail the matter that the hon. Member for Hammersmith raised.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Does my hon. Friend accept that only the most extreme temperance fanatic could argue that the passage of the Bill would lead to an increase in alcohol abuse? We are dealing with only three days out of the whole year.

Mr. Colvin: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is why none of the temperance fanatics are present today to argue against the Bill. They have read it and seen that it is modest in what it attempts to do. Therefore, they are happy to see it go on to the statute book.

We should like a system of licensing that is on more flexible lines. I look upon the Bill as the first step down that track. A more flexible system would enable premises retailing alcohol to adjust their trading arrangements to meet the needs of local communities. For example, the extensions granted for summer trading might be different from those granted for winter trading. The system should take account of the vastly different work patterns——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We had better stick to Good Friday, Maundy Thursday and Easter eve.

Mr. Colvin: The Bill seeks to begin to bring in a more flexible system on Good Fridays, Maunday Thursdays and Easter Saturdays. Our hotel and licensed trades are already renowned for the service that they give. The Bill will allow them to offer a better service on those three days. I am glad that the Government see no need to object to these modest proposals, but I must have a suspicious nature because I wonder whether, rather than regarding the Bill as the thin end of the wedge and the beginning of more flexible licensing hours, the Government hope that if they agree to these proposals they will manage to keep the licensed trade quiet for a few more years. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will confirm that the Government regard the Bill as the first step towards a more flexible system. Detailed analysis of the Scottish findings will provide the evidence required to support the introduction of a further Bill before long. It may be too late for the Queen's Speech this year, but perhaps in 1986——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must deal with the Bill before the House today and not with Bills which may be before the House at some future time.

Mr. Colvin: In conclusion, I believe that the House unanimously welcomes the Bill. We regard it as a first step, though unfortunately a tiny step, towards a more flexible licensing system and we very much hope that the Government see it in the same light and not merely as a way to keep the licensing lobby quiet for a few more years. There has been growing concern on both sides of the House about the need for a more flexible licensing system. All the evidence from law enforcement officers, doctors and the trades concerned is that a more flexible system would be beneficial. We shall, therefore, be justified in giving the Bill a Third Reading.

1.42 pm

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): To put the Bill into perspective we need briefly to consider existing licensing legislation. I say that en passant, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is amazing that although the common law imposed no restrictions at all on the sale of intoxicating liquor we now have a complicated and archaic web of legislation on permitted hours which vary in their application to public houses, restaurants and clubs.

Anyone who is unsure whether the Bill should receive a Third Reading has only to consider that Scotland, Ulster, the Channel islands and virtually every other country in Europe all have more tolerant and flexible licensing hours than we have. Most solicitors regard licensing law with dread. The 93rd edition of Paterson's "Licensing Acts" summarises the legislation relating to licensed premises and covers a large number of Acts of Parliament, including the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979, the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Acts and the Licensing Act 1964 which the Bill seeks to amend as well as various Weights and Measures Acts.

[Mr. Greg Knight]

I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) that the Bill is an extremely modest measure. Under the 1964 Act, a limited number of hotels, restaurants, dance halls and cafés where entertainment and food are provided can apply to the licensing magistrates for special extended hours certificates allowing them to continue to sell liquor as part of their general entertainment between midnight and 2 am. I gather that, in London, they can go on until 3 am. A growing number of people find such a provision most useful. Extensions for two hours are available for 310 out of the 365 days in the year. That leaves 55 days for which certificates cannot be applied for, of which 52 are Sundays. The Bill does not affect Sundays but merely deletes from the 1964 Act Maundy Thursday, Good Friday and Easter Saturday. If the Bill were accepted, the law in England and Wales would be in line with that in Scotland.

The Bill has been described as modest. That is something of an over-statement. It was said in another place that we should take care about what licensing provision we allow during Easter as it has special religious significance. Sections 70 and 76 of the 1964 Act should not apply to Easter, it was argued. Most people regard Easter as a holiday. Sporting events such as motor racing are permitted and we are entitled to ask why discotheques and restaurants which are allowed to stay open until 2 am at other times should not enjoy the same privilege during Easter.

The Bill does not amend general licensing hours and the 52 Sundays that I mentioned will not be affected. It merely irons out a quirk in our law, and I hope that the House supports it. In Committee, the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that he would not oppose it. I hope that the absence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) means that the House will pass this modest but welcome Bill.

1.48 pm

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): This is indeed a modest little Bill and I shall confine myself to making a small speech on it. It alters the law regarding Maundy Thursday, Good Friday and Easter eve only in respect of the limited number of licensed premises which benefit from an extended hours order or a special hours certificate. The Bill brings the law in respect of those three days into line with the rest of the year apart from Sundays.

This is a sensible tidying up and I do not object to it in principle. I shall certainly not press any objections to a Division, but I have some apprehensions about this being considered a crumb that can be thrown to licensees to stem the strong tide in favour of major reform of licensing laws, especially in respect of public houses.

It might be appropriate for me to declare—I have done so before—my interest in the licensed trade. I run a small company with five public houses, of which I am licensee. None of those houses is affected by the measure, because none of them has either an extended hours order or a special hours certificate. I am perhaps unique in the House in that I have personally managed a public house with an extended hours order. I did so for four years. I was encouraged by the police to take out a special order. They were objecting to the fact that I was regularly applying for special orders of exemption to extend my normal hours for the functions that I was then running in my public house.

There is a curious anomaly in the Licensing Act 1964 which excludes the three days—Good Friday, Maundy Thursday and Easter eve—with which we are concerned in the Bill. Therefore, I welcome the measure, which was introduced in the other place, because it will have a tidying-up effect. However, we shall have to be careful because there is clearly a need to look at the question in the round.

There is growing and increasing pressure upon Members of Parliament and the Government to introduce major legislation on licensing matters. I know that you have been extremely tolerant, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in allowing us to speak a little widely today on the measure. That is perhaps because we have too few opportunities in this House to speak on the need for the reform of licensing legislation.

I hope that the Minister, in replying to the debate, will also widen his remarks, because I am a member of an organisation which is known under the acronym of FLAG —Flexi-Law Action Group. It is a national organisation in which all the major trade interests are represented, from the National Union of Licensed Victuallers to the Brewers' Society, the National Association of Licensed House Managers and all sorts of people. We welcome all kinds of reform of the licensing law, and the Bill is one little piece of reform.

The measure will affect businesses other than public houses. Therefore, it is particularly relevant that FLAG should take an interest in the reform. We are keen to see major reforms and hope that we shall get them within the not too far distant future. We hope that the results of the review of the Scottish experiment, as it is called, will shortly be made known to us, and that there will be a positive reaction to the effect of the Scottish experiment, which was introduced following Dr. Clayson's report.

Special hours certificates and extended hours orders affect premises which provide musical entertainment—frequently live music and disco—and food at the same time, and those premises are frequented by the young. I understand the concern of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) about alcoholism, because it is the young who make most use of such premises, and they seem to have a good deal of money to spend on entertainment. They are perhaps the least responsible in the use of alcohol. Therefore, it is a proper matter for concern.

In supporting the measure, I look forward to major reforms coming before the House so that we may have a proper debate on licensing law reform and on permitted hours.

1.54 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I reiterate what I said in Committee. I shall not oppose the Bill, which is too small to have a dramatic effect. However, it involves flexibility of opening hours and the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) openly admitted that he saw it as a first step on the road to greater flexibility.

The problem with following that road is that all the evidence from around the world suggests that greater flexibility leads to greater abuse. My message to the House is that, although I am not against more flexibility in opening hours, I oppose tinkering with licensing hours in the absence of a national alcohol policy to deal with the problem of abuse. Conservative Members speak with great eloquence and at considerable length about the advantages of the Bill to the trade, but they do not take into account the consequences of the increased availability of alcohol.

Mr. Couchman: The hon. Gentleman shows a proper concern for alcoholism. However, does he agree that the book by Davies and Walsh called "Alcohol Problems and Alcohol Control in Europe" suggests that permitted hours are but a minor factor among the causes of alcohol abuse and alcoholism?

Mr. Soley: The overall evidence is that greater availability leads to more problems. The book says that there is evidence to suggest that greater flexibility can lead to more responsible drinking. I have said previously that that can happen. The problem is that when we tinker with one aspect, such as flexibility of opening hours, and use Bills as steps towards something more, without taking other necessary actions, we run risks.

If Conservative Members do not give greater attention to the problems caused by alcohol abuse — we are dealing with a major drug which has a far bigger effect than heroin on our society, in terms of the number of deaths and injuries, social problems and so on — they will run into considerable opposition from hon. Members who know about the problems caused by alcohol abuse.

Mr. Greg Knight: Is not the hon. Gentleman overstating his case? The Bill deals with only six hours in a year.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman could not have heard me when I said that I would not oppose the Bill because it was such a minor measure. I went on to pick up the comments of the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside, who said that the Bill was a step towards more flexible licensing hours. I said that that was not a bad thing in itself, but that it was a dangerous course to follow in the absence of an alcohol policy.

Mr. Colvin: The hon. Gentleman raises a fundamental and important point which the licensed trade views with great concern. He mentioned availability of liquor, but we are debating a Bill applying to outlets such as hotels, licensed entertainment establishments, cafes and public houses — all places where responsible proprietors supervise drinking.

The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind the enormous growth in the number of off-licences, which have increased by 11,000 to nearly 42,000 in the past 10 years. Perhaps many supermarkets are fairly responsible, but far too many off-licences — often they are little more than corner shops, and even garages are involved now — sell drink far too readily and often to children who are under age. That ought to be stamped out.

Mr. Soley: If it were in order I would treat the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside to a repeat of previous speeches in which I have emphasised that availability has become a major problem, primarily because of the introduction of supermarkets into the licensed business. My complaint against the licensed trade is not that it is unaware of the problem, but that it often deals with the problem by throwing out the people who are the problem. Not long ago the House passed legislation to give licensees the power to restrict access to people who have troubled them in the past. The trade tries to deal with the problem by keeping people with an alcohol problem outside licensed premises on the streets, where those people are a problem to other people. The trade must look at the matter more carefully.

I well understand why the trade calls for such a measure, and I do not intend to oppose it. However, the trade is not yet considering sufficiently seriously the problems caused by alcohol abuse, which, as the Minister knows, is increasing dramatically. The Scottish evidence is much more ambivalent than the hon. Gentleman made out. There is certainly a small increase in cirrhosis of the liver, which is one of the best indicators of an increase in alcohol abuse. In future the hon. Gentleman must pay greater attention to that problem, and to the various bodies which are far less well funded than the brewing industry, the Wine and Spirit Association and the Scotch Whisky Association, but which are expected to pick up the pieces of a major national problem.

2.1 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): Until this afternoon little has been said about the Bill during its passage, which has surprised me slightly because any measure which deals with entertainment on days of religious significance would normally be expected to meet with comment, if not opposition, from those anxious to preserve traditional respect for holy days. Perhaps it is a sign of the times that no such qualms have been voiced.

It has been said that the Bill is a modest measure, which is how many people will regard it; and it is also true that it will have only a limited effect. It relates to the hours during which certain licensed premises and registered private members' clubs can serve liquor and provide entertainment on the three days of the Easter weekend. Its effect would be to allow, but not require, licensed premises and registered clubs which provide entertainment and food to serve alcohol for the same hours on Maundy Thursday, Good Friday and Easter Saturday as apply on a normal weekday. Those premises, instead of closing their doors at midnight on Maundy Thursday and Easter Saturday and at 10.30 pm on Good Friday, would be permitted to remain open until 1 am, if they hold an extended hours order, or 2 am — 3 am in parts of London—with a special hours certificate.

The purpose of the liquor licensing legislation is to control and regulate the sale of alcohol. However, the particular restrictions which apply to late night opening over the Easter weekend, and which have the dual effect of prohibiting the sale of alcohol and the provision of entertainments, arise solely because of the religious significance of those days. Successive Governments have taken the line that it must be a matter for individual conscience, and the will of the House, whether restrictions relating to days of particular importance in the Christian calendar should be relaxed. I said in Standing Committee that the Government are neutral on this Bill and that we have no objection to its proceeding on to the statute book, if that is the will of the House, as it seems to be. That remains our position.

The proposals in the Bill will affect only the minority of premises licensed for the sale of alcohol. It can be argued that even this modest measure does no more than bring the licensing legislation into line with that governing other forms of entertainment. Neither the theatres nor the cinema licensing legislation, for example, imposes any restrictions on the opening of those premises on Maundy Thursday, Good Friday or Easter Saturday. Nor are there any specific restrictions relating to the Easter weekend on the opening of casinos. Thus, it is lawful for casinos to be open from 2 pm to 4 am every day, except on Saturday, when the terminal hour is 3 am in London and 2 am elsewhere in England and Wales. It cannot be said, therefore, that the relaxations on licensed premises in this Bill are inconsistent with other areas of licensing, for which the Government have overall responsibility.

[Mr. David Mellor]

There will be those in the House and outside who will criticise this minor legislation on the grounds that it does not go far enough and that we need more radical reform of the licensing law rather than a piecemeal approach affecting only some days—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] My tired old ears have picked up the odd "Hear, hear" from the Benches behind me. I have some sympathy with that argument, but it should not prevent us from considering minor amendments when they are shown to be desirable.

As to the more general reform of the law—I refer here to the much-debated issue of flexible licensing hours—hon. Members will be aware that it is currently under review. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has made it clear that, before reaching a decision, he will wish to consider carefully the reports of the surveys conducted by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys into the effects of the extension of permitted hours brought about in Scotland by the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, together with all relevant data on the indicators of alcohol abuse. The full report, which will include the results of a survey of public house licensees about their attitude to licensing legislation, will be published later in the year.

The Bill proposes modest relaxations for three days of the year, enabling those seeking entertainment to purchase alcohol for a few more hours, until 1 am or 2 am. As I said, the Government are neutral. Whether the restrictions on the supply of alcohol and the provision of entertainment should be relaxed is a matter for the individual choice of hon. Members, but if, as one suspects, this Bill gets its Third Reading today and becomes law, the Government will certainly not oppose it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed, without amendment.

Reform of the House of Lords Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.6 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I have it in Command from the Queen to acquaint the House that Her Majesty, having been informed of the purport of the Bill, has consented to place her prerogative and interest, so far as they are affected by the Bill, at the disposal of Parliament for the purposes of the Bill.

Dr. Marek: First, may I thank the Leader of the House for giving us the message from the Queen, and I apologise to him for detaining him in the House on what is now a procedural matter.

The reform of the House of Lords has been talked about for many decades, but nothing has been done. The last serious attempt to reform the House of Lords was with the Parliament Bill in the late 1960s, which was roundly defeated by a coalition across party lines. I should say that I do not believe it was a good measure.

However, it is inexcusable that, in what we call a democracy, one of the two main legislative Chambers is not an elected body. If one is born in the right bed, one can take part in the legislature of the country. If one is not born in the right bed—that includes everyone in this House and, except for about 1,500 people, everyone else in the country—one cannot take part in the legislative process. We must start to consider how to make Britain a true and total democracy. Unless we reform the House of Lords, we cannot call ourselves a complete democracy.

In "Vacher's", one sees a list of members of the House of Lords. There are three peers of blood royal, two archbishops and 25 dukes. I could spend much time talking about the 25 dukes, but I shall not. There are 28 marquesses and 157 earls and countesses. As far as I am aware, none of those people has any special— [Interruption.]

The thunderclap that we have just heard leads me to believe that I should tread carefully during the next few minutes.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Divine retribution.

Dr. Marek: None of those people has any special abilities to take part in our legislative process.

After that, we come, in order of seniority, to 104 viscounts, 24 bishops and 864 barons and baronesses. Well over 1,000 members of the other place are there because of fortuitous circumstances. The exceptions are the life peers and peeresses, who may be appointed because of some expertise or ability, or the help that they can give the Government of the day or, more rarely, the Opposition of the day, in running the business in the other place. This cannot be the right way to proceed in a democracy.

One has to pay a price for democracy. Members of the legislature have to be elected. One may end up with members who may not be the best that one could possibly have. However, in a democracy, election is the only way. This House is not perfect. I am not perfect and I do not think that any hon. Member would say that he was perfect, in command of all arguments and could give an unbiased and honest judgment on any matter. We all fall down on occasions. On the other hand, we have been elected, and we have the trust of the electorate that for one Parliament they will expect us to use our judgment to the best of our ability.

There are no electors to send anybody to the other place. It can introduce legislation, and change and impede legislation from this House. Out of the 1,000 Members in the other place, not many play a part. At the most, it is a couple of hundred, and not many are there day in and day out. I have been looking at the House of Lords Handards and I have found that two or three dozen Labour Members and five or six dozen from the Government Benches take a regular and active part in the proceedings there.

We can go two ways. Given that we want a democracy, and that there is something to be said for an elected system, should we abolish the House of Lords completely or should we try to make it an effective body? My party believes in total abolition of the House of Lords. If there were a Bill to that effect before the House, I would support it. However, it is not one of the major items of legislation that will be passing through the next Parliament under the next Labour Government. We can either make the House of Lords effective as a revising chamber, or we can abolish it completely.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): The hon. Gentleman has just said that his party's policy is to abolish the House of Lords, and if a Bill to that effect were introduced he would support it. How does he square that with an article that he wrote in the Western Mail on 22 February when he said, "Abolition will not do"?

Dr. Marek: The hon. Gentleman apprehends my next point. I can square my remark. Abolition will not do, for one reason. I should like to see an effective revising chamber and I should like more elected members of either House to keep control over the Executive. I do not believe that 650 Members of Parliament are sufficient to control the Executive in all the many decisions that are taken. I am not saying that the decisions are taken unaccountably, but they are taken without elected Members knowing about them unless a particular Member has an interest in something and happens to be in the right place at the right time to ask the question. An elected representative may then be able to influence a decision. By and large, however, we have the Civil Service, quangos, boards and nominated bodies which run the country and it is impossible for 650 MPs and between 100 and 200 of their Lordships to try to keep effective control over the Executive and the Civil Service.

My view, which should command thought in the House, is that we need greater numbers. To achieve that, we should reform, rather than abolish, the House of Lords, although I should be happy to agree to its abolition, simply because we do not have democracy there. Generally speaking, one must be born in the right bed to be a member of that place.

The House of Commons is the primary legislative Chamber, so that the House of Lords must be the reforming Chamber. Therefore, the Lords should not challenge this House, and for that reason the powers of the other place can remain roughly as they are, although I could be persuaded that the powers should be changed in either direction.

An important reason why this House keeps its primacy is that it is based on representation, on the single-Member constituency, and Members of the Commons have contact with their electors and are responsible to them.

If we wish to keep this House as the primary instrument for legislation, we must do something about elections to the House of Lords. One method would be to have large constituencies so that Members of the House of Lords could not be identified with any area. To achieve that, we would need a form of proportional representation. For that reason, the Bill suggests the single transferable vote for elections to the other place. PR is beloved of the alliance parties, and it is a pity that Liberal and SDP Members are not here to discuss this matter.

What will happen if the Bill is not placed on the statute book and nothing is done about the matter? Sooner or later there will be a Government with a sufficient majority to get their way. Such an Administration may go for total abolition. But if the House of Lords were not abolished, it might be changed in such a radical way that there would not be a general consensus in this House about its composition. It is likely in the future that a Government with such a majority will be in power.

I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House realise that the House of Lords needs reforming. We should do it by means of a consensus which would gain general acceptance from the people. We could do that even in a Parliament such as this, in which the Government have an enormous majority. If we do not do it, sooner or later —because it needs to be done—a Government with an enormous majority may do something which we do not like.

2.18 pm

Mr. Michael Portillo (Enfield, Southgate): I scarcely recognise the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), so brief has he been in his remarks today. I congratulate him on presenting his case in a few minutes. I was used to sitting opposite him in the Standing Committee on the Transport Bill, and in those deliberations we suffered long hours at his hands—or should I say at his mouth?—as he kept us in our places, sometimes entertained but sometimes less entertained.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn: What a dreadful thing to say of my hon. Friend.

Mr. Portillo: I congratulate the hon. Member for Wrexham on making such a brief contribution today, yet putting his points lucidly. I appreciate that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) wishes to speak, so I shall not detain the House for long because I am sure that the great British public are looking forward to hearing from him. I am sometimes perplexed how it is that the Labour party's first instinct when faced with a problem is to turn to constitutional reform. I fear that it does so with a disregard for the consequences. When the previous Labour Government found themselves in difficulty, constitutional reform was their immediate knee-jerk reaction.

There was disagreement over whether Britain should be in the EEC and the Labour Government's reaction was to hold a referendum. Although that was a constitutional innovation, that did not bother them, as it got them off the hook on which they found themselves. Subsequently, they had problems in maintaining a majority with their allies in the House. That meant that they were willing to contemplate setting up assemblies for Scotland and Wales and to hold more referendums. Again, they acted without regard to whether those actions would be good for the long-term constitutional health of the United Kingdom. They found a way of getting themselves out of a tight corner politically and they were willing to throw constitutional tradition and history to the winds in the interest of self-preservation.

[Mr. Portillo]

The Labour party is proposing once more either the abolition of the House of Lords—as I understand it, that would make the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) perfectly happy—or the reform that is proposed in the Bill, which amounts to abolition and the establishment of a different House.

Given the present state of the Labour party, it is interesting to look for clues in ascertaining what led it to devise such a scheme. The first clue is that the Bill proposes that the new House should be elected regularly every five years. We are moving from a position in which a Parliament has a maximum life to one in which elections fall regularly on a certain date. Why should the Labour party want that? I suspect that it knows that it will lose general election after general election and that it is looking for an opportunity in mid-term, when there are protest votes that we know about of a sort that I believe were displayed even yesterday, to have a different House elected and possibly to capitalise on the votes that may be swinging around. In effect, it is a call by the Labour party for a recount. If it loses a general election, it wants a second bash at it when it has a second House. I understand that the Labour party is keen on second bashes. I believe that it called for a recount in the Brecon and Radnor by-election but to no avail.

The second possible clue lies in the abolition of the metropolitan counties and the GLC. When these authorities are abolished, the Labour party will be deprived of great areas where a protest vote could be lodged between general elections. Areas of control were passed to the Labour party by those who wished to register their feelings in a mid-term contest. With the abolition of these authorities the Labour party is left wondering how it will be able to make mischief during the long periods when Labour Members have to sit on the Opposition Benches, the Labour party having lost the previous general election once again.

I find many features of the Bill surprising although I understand why the Labour party has embarked upon it. If the hon. Member for Wrexham wishes to intervene to explain what he means by the passage in the Bill which reads:

"the exercise of political power, much of it in secret, by those who do not derive their authority from the people",

I shall be willing to allow him do so. I cannot understand what that means. The House of Lords is, for the moment, the more public of the two Houses in this Parliament. It is the one which is now seen by those who watch television.

Dr. Marek: I shall intervene, only briefly as we have only seven minutes in which to debate the Bill. I am not suggesting that the House of Lords exercises power in secret. However, the Executive, the Civil Service and other bodies exercise their power in secret. That is the meaning of the preamble.

Mr. Portillo: I believe that the hon. Gentleman will think, on reflection, that the drafting of his Bill was slightly confusing on that point. I am grateful to him for setting us right.

I have spoken to many of my constituents since the proceedings of the House of Lords have been televised and many of them say that they realise now for the first time what a splendid place the House of Lords is as presently constituted. They realise for the first time that the other place has a residue of expertise to deploy on important issues.

That reminds me of the time when I was involved in the consideration of a patents Bill, which came before the House about nine years ago. It would not be unfair to hon. Members to say that at that time there were very few Members who had an understanding of the subject. However, in the House of Lords there happened to be two or three of the leading world experts on patents, who were able to bring their expertise to bear. They gave the Bill a much more mature and thorough consideration than it might otherwise have received. This is only a small example of what happens so often with their Lordships.

Of course, their Lordships do not attend every debate in the way that hon. Members do in the House and their interest in a particular subject is not always 100 per cent. Their Lordships are distinguished in different fields. The majority were given seats in the House of Lords because they had distinguished themselves. The Labour party continues to nominate people to that House on that basis — often because they have a political expertise and because, as working peers, they will help the Labour party and show the same talents and abilities that they showed either in this House or outside politics.

I think that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and I have the same desire at heart — to safeguard democracy. Those are the terms in which the hon. Gentleman couched his argument and I have taken his words at face value, something I find it hard to do. The Labour party is afraid of the independence of the House of Lords. During the past few years, Labour Members have seen that the House of Lords is willing to consider carefully and independently the legislation that comes from this House. Constitutional reform by the abolition of the House of Lords would merely be the prelude to a much more devastating constitutional reform. With the House of Lords out of the way, our ability to stop that devastating change would be that much more restricted.

2.26 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has introduced this Bill. The House should promote a public debate on the existence of the House of Lords. I am surprised that Conservative Members oppose the Bill. However, when the Leader of the House informed the House of the Queen's consent to the Bill, I detected some note of resignation in his voice, because the House of Lords has been more trouble to this Government than it has been to other Governments. But for the House of Lords, the local government abolition legislation might have travelled much further. That demonstrates not the democratic credentials of the other place or its desire to promote democracy but how reactionary the Government are with their majority in the House of Commons and how determined they are to force the destruction of democracy in so many aspects of life.

Mr. Cecil Franks (Barrow and Furness): Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the view that, in the absence of an effective Opposition to the Government in this Chamber, the House of Lords has assumed the mantle of a de facto Opposition?

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman has only just come into the Chamber, but he obviously has not had a chance to hear the results of the Brecon and Radnor by-election. I think that his party understands that there is enormous opposition both inside and outside Parliament to the Government.

When I show guests and people from overseas around the Houses of Parliament and explain to them how the House of Lords came into existence, they cannot believe that in a democratic society we hand legislation to people whose sole fortune in life has been to be born into a particular family or at a particular time. Even worse is the patronage that goes with the make-up of the House of Lords through the appointment of life peers. My guests say to me, "Why does your country, which prides itself on being so democratic and having a democratic parliamentary system, allow this ridiculous anachronism to continue?" To allow hereditary peers to have a say in the legislative process is a ridiculous anachronism. As far as I am aware, hardly any country allows a hereditary form of government. Why should we allow it here?

My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham has done us a great service in putting the Bill forward. I might have some disagreements with my hon. Friend on the methods of election of a second Chamber or on the justification for having a second Chamber. I very much agree with him, however, that we cannot justify in a democratic society allowing this undemocratic obstacle to be in our path.

Every time that there has been a major constitutional reform it has been as a result of the House of Lords' obstructionism, be it the people's Budget of 1910 or the other, later examples. It is important that that obstruction be removed. I firmly believe that a future Labour Government, elected as they will be at the next election, will be obstructed by the House of Lords, because the House of Lords represents economic and social interests that are fundamentally opposed to the interests that the Labour party represents and that a future Labour Government will represent after the general election.

I find it surprising that none of the——

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Tuesday 16 July.

STANDING CHARGES (ABOLITION) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 25 October.

COMPANIES (POLITICAL DONATIONS) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Second Reading what day? No day named.

POLITICAL PARTIES (INCOME AND EXPENDITURE) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

SOCIAL SECURITY (COLD CLIMATE ALLOWANCE) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

PLANNING AUTHORITIES (RESTRICTION OF LIABILITY) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

RECREATIONAL GARDENING BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 25 October.

GREATER EMPLOYEE INVOLVEMENT BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 25 October.

BUDGET BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

PEOPLE'S RIGHT TO FUEL BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (CHOICE OF ELECTORAL SYSTEMS) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

ROAD RACES (NORTHERN IRELAND) ORDER 1977 (AMENDMENT) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

MINIMUM WAGES ETC. BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

WORKING CONDITIONS OF GOVERNMENT TRAINEES BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

REFORM BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

COMPANIES (PROCEDURE) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the Bill has not been printed, I shall not propose the Question. Second Reading what day? No day named.

YOUNG PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

YOUTH CHARTER BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG PEOPLE BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

HANDICAPPED YOUNG PERSONS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (POLITICAL EXPENDITURE) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the Bill has not been printed, I shall not propose the Question. Second Reading what day? No day named.

HORSES AND PONIES BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.
Second Reading deferred till Friday 25 October.

MEDICAL ACT 1983 (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.
Second Reading deferred till Friday 25 October.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT (MINIMUM AGE) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.
Second Reading deferred till Friday 25 October.

PENSIONERS' HEATING AND COMMUNICATIONS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the Bill has not been printed, I shall not propose the Question.
Second Reading deferred till Friday 25 October.

CROWN IMMUNITY (REMOVAL FROM WORKPLACES) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the Bill has not been printed, I shall not propose the Question. Second Reading what day? No day named.

CONSUMER GUARANTEE PROTECTION BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the Bill has not been printed, I shall not propose the Question. Second Reading what day? No day named.

SALE OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES FROM GARAGE PREMISES BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputry Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

CO-OWNERSHIP OF FLATS BILL

Order for Second Rading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Bill has not been printed, so I shall not propose the Question. Second Reading what day? No day named.

TENANTS' PROTECTION (SCOTLAND) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.
Second Reading deferred till Friday 25 October.

WILDLIFE AND COUNTRYSIDE (SERVICE OF NOTICES) BILL

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House. —[Dr. David Clark.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must point out to the House that it is unusual to take a Committee stage immediately after Second Reading on a Friday.

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 58 (Third Reading), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION INFORMATION BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [26 April].

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Debate to be resumed what day? No day named.

PROTECTION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE ELDERLY IN HOME OWNERSHIP BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

MINERS' AMNESTY (GENERAL PARDON) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day?

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Friday 25 October.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman have the leave of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill?

Mr. Corbyn: Yes, Sir.

Second Reading deferred to Friday 25 October.

Exporters (Government Aid)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.37 pm

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): This debate is, in a sense, round three in the Conservative Back Benchers' attempt to kill off the Byatt report and to persuade the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to get his act together and produce an export strategy. Rounds one and two went to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior). As luck would have it, the timing of the debate may prove to be particularly apposite because the topic of the Government's help to exporters is reported to be on the Cabinet agenda, and at the beginning of the week we had the announcement of 200,000 new training places for our young people, which was particularly welcome. I should like a good number of those 200,000 young people to be in manufacturing industry and helping to improve our exports.

Seventeen years ago, before I came to the House, I wrote a pamphlet for the Bow Group, called "Helping the Exporter". Not a lot has changed since then, I am sorry to report. In that pamphlet we recommended changes in finance, targeting and organisation. As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, I have worked in the far east and I now regularly visit south-east Asia, my last visit, which was in January, being to Sri Lanka and Indonesia, with a brief stop-over in Malaysia.

I have seen business at the sharp end and I have the utmost praise for our people both in the private sector and in the diplomatic service. They all do a fantastic job in the steaming heat of the east. They have to contend with competition from France, Germany, Korea and Japan. The tragedy is that when they return home they seem to have to engage in endless hours of negotiation with the British Government.

The record of our three leading competitors gives a clear picture of what we are up against. In 1983 our aid programme was less than half that of France, Germany or Japan. We tied 54 per cent. of our aid to British manufactures while Japan tied 64 per cent., Germany 66 per cent. and France no less than 82 per cent. to their manufactures.

For years, we have believed in direct grants. Our competitors have sold on the basis of soft loans, thus making the money go further. We are very slow to learn. For example, our mission in Indonesia reported nine months ago that the Indonesian Government would accept only soft loans and not grant aid. We insisted on trying to put together a package of grant-aided work and lost the power project for which we were pitching. We have only just begun to respond to that clear message from the Indonesian Government. I hope and trust that Minister Habibi of Indonesia will be made especially welcome when he visits this country next week.

Our overall budget for soft loans is currently £66 million. I believe that China alone warrants £100 million. That is the kind of amount that our competitors are directing to that market. Against our £66 million, France and Germany have more than $1 billion available for soft loans and Japan has $2·5 billion. The contrast between those figures would be laughable if it were not so serious.

[Mr. Michael Morris]

Why do we always have to match our competitors? Why cannot we take the initiative for once and go for the business? I do not blame the Overseas Development Administration for that. It is not the ODA's area of expertise. It should be a function of the Department of Trade and Industry and the budget should be controlled by that Department.

The evidence given by the Export Credits Guarantee Department to the Public Accounts Committee, of which I am a member, suggested that management were being asked to achieve the impossible. They were told that they had to break even and to pay off old debt and yet be competitive with foreigners when interest rates in this country were at an all time high. I acknowledge that there is now a consensus rate but not everyone abides by it, especially for capital projects. When the ECGD increases its premium rate to particular countries—for example, Thailand, which is a category B market and thus has a good credit rating—the countries concerned may regard it as a slight. I doubt whether MITI, the Japanese equivalent or COFACE, the French equivalent, have to go through the procedures that beset the ECGD.

As for the British Overseas Trade Board, what other country would cut its main promotional arm just when it is achieving success? The Government may say that a 2 per cent. real cut is not a great deal, but converted to Singapore dollars when exchange rates are moving it becomes a great deal more significant.

Perhaps I might relate the sorry tale of a small exporter in Nether Heyford in my constituency. This chap was unemployed but set up business on his own. His company, Petalgold Ltd., provides golf equipment. Golf happens to be one of my hobbies, but the Japanese love their golf. My constituent showed initiative and exhibited in the sports show in Japan in 1985 and collected orders to the tune of just over £30,000. He applied to go on the 1986 fair and was told that it had been cancelled. We shall never succeed if we approach the matter on a one year in, one year out basis.

My hon. Friend the Minister has been helpful to the footwear industry. It is a difficult industry as it comprises many small firms. It normally shows at six trade fairs but, because of the cut in the British Overseas Trade Board, it has been told that it can show at only three. That is not fair treatment and it does not help British exporters.

Some people say that we cannot afford more, but I am a member of the Public Accounts Committee which investigates twice a week what has happened to public money. We have seen huge losses and examples of misspent money. We have received evidence about big crashes such as De Lorean, and await detail about medium-sized losses such as Lear Fan and unknown losses such as the Sinclair C5 vehicle. There are dozens of examples of public money going down the drain, a significant amount of it having come from the Department of Trade and Industry.

People in high places tell me that civil engineering contracts produce little benefit to the United Kingdom. I have asked for some detailed figures on a contract that arose out of some discussions that I had in Indonesia in January—the Marika Hydra project. It is a joint British-Swedish project. Its value is £321 million, of which the United Kingdom's share is £175 million. It falls into five categories—civil engineering of £108 million, of which the direct UK content is £75 million, mechanical and electricals of £51·5 million, of which the UK content is £44·6 million, design of £5 million, of which the United Kingdom content is £4·9 million, supervision of £6·5 million, which is all to the UK, and third-country purchases of £2 million. That produces a total UK content of £131 million out of £173 million—a ratio of 70:30. It will create employment in the UK but, on 13 May, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor wrote to the chairman of Heavy Electrical Machinery saying that, despite further evidence that that body had sent to the Chancellor about the benefit of follow-on orders, he had "asked my officials to study further the details you have presented but I fear my immediate reaction is that your evidence contains nothing to alter the approach we have adopted since the preparation of the Byatt report in 1982."

That response is not adequate.

The Treasury is bad, but the Department of Trade and Industry has also been dilatory since 1979. I dropped in on Sri Lanka in January and discussed the Samanala Wewa project. I raised the issue with the Foreign Office 18 months ago and again in January. The Prime Minister discussed it when she was in Sri Lanka and armed with detailed figures 12 weeks ago. There has still been no decision.

There might be people in high places who think that companies such as Balfour Beatty get an unfair share of ATP, but they are the companies with get up and go. Contracts are too often lost because that element is missing. They are also lost because of lack of funding. It is not enough to have the right goods in the right place at the right time. Hawker Siddeley has given evidence to the Department concerning five contracts that it has missed. I just hope that the Samanala Wewa project does not go the same way.

I realise that my hon. Friend will be restricted, not least as his right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade is away in south-east Asia. Normally, I would have fulsome praise for the activities of my right hon. Friend, but I cannot help but reflect that Ramadan has just finished, that there is now the "Eid" festival in that part of the world, and that trying to sell in south-east Asia now is like trying to sell in London during the Christmas recess.

It is time that the Government got their act together in areas such as south-east Asia. We need to recognise and understand the legitimate aspirations of the Association of South-East Asian Nations, and that quantum leaps in technology are being made in Indonesia and Malaysia. We must recognise the sheer size of trade with Singapore. As long as we have a system of five different decision-making bodies — the Department of Trade and Industry, the Treasury, the ODA, the Foreign Office and ECGD—we shall fail. We need to be single-minded.

We should set up, perhaps on a trial basis and perhaps just in south-east Asia, the post of trade commissioner for the region. The concept was originally used in the old Board of Trade, and it could be developed. I can envisage a senior man aged about 50, supported by an assistant and a secretary, at a cost of about £250,000. He or she, experienced in trade, could be responsible for establishing a strategy in a region and ensuring its implementation.

My hon. Friend has been tolerant, as always, and I hope that he will show a degree of understanding. I end with a quotation taken from a publication that I shall refer to shortly. It says:

"The Malayan market—great potentialities for British trade and manufacturers—it is the key position which if held and consolidated will ensure for the future a dominant position for British Commerce and Manufacture".

The source of the quotation is "The Crown Colonist" and the date is April 1931. Does nothing change in Britain?

2.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): The short answer is yes, it does. I hope to give my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), who has great expertise and enthusiasm in export matters, some reassurance that the Government are flexible in their approach to these questions, and that we are anxious to do whatever we can, within our budgetary constraints, to help to improve the performance of our exporters.

Before dealing with the specific points of my hon. Friend's speech, I should like to put it to him that we are talking today about a job creation programme. Much attention is being focused, within our national political debate, on the need to create more jobs in the United Kingdom, and I put it to the House that there is one job creation programme that has been singularly undiscussed over the past few months and years. It is that number of jobs which can be created by increasing our share of world trade.

We are told that the United Kingdom had about a 14 per cent. share of world trade in manufactures, goods and services in 1964, but by 1978 our share had gone down to 8 per cent. Each 1 per cent. represents a loss of about 250,000 jobs. Therefore, it can be argued that in a job loss programme during that period we exported 1·5 million British jobs. The Department of Trade and Industry and my hon. Friend have a common cause and should combine in trying to achieve one objective. We should recognise that the biggest job creation programme on which the United Kingdom can embark is that programme which, through increases in competitiveness, can help us to import back into the United Kingdom those 1·5 million British jobs. When the Government go on and on about competitiveness, they do so on the basis of a job creation programme.

My hon. Friend said that his remarks were topical. They are very topical in the political context. One of the more regrettable and unfortunate problems of timetabling in the House is that we have not had time in recent months to discuss this very important job creation programme.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this subject. Exporting and increasing our percentage of world trade are vital parts of the nation's economic activity. I know that, like my hon. Friend, many representatives of industry are concerned about the changes to some of the export services that are supervised by the British Overseas Trade Board. The debate provides the opportunity to reaffirm that the Government remain committed to a programme of export support and to explain clearly our policy approach.

Government support for exporters takes three main forms. The first comprises the export services under the guidance of the BOTB, and that is the area on which a major part of our debate is focused. The BOTB services offer a wide range of support. Some provide information; others, such as the trade fair and mission programmes, provide practical and financial help for companies seeking to establish themselves in overseas markets; others provide help in rather specialised areas such as foreign technical requirements and export documentation.

The other principal forms of Government support, which must not be forgotten, are the aid and trade provisions to which my hon. Friend referred and other support for major projects, along with the services of the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Let me spell out the main objectives and policies of the export promotion programme under the guidance of the BOTB. The main objective is to use the resources to stimulate additional exports — a point which is sometimes lost on some of the Department's client companies — which are exports that would not have come about without the export services and assistance offered by the Department and the BOTB.

A further aim is to cut the cost of breaking into new markets by providing companies with certain information and technical services that are most efficiently provided centrally and using the unique resources available to Government. The services are basically available to all companies and cover all overseas markets. We do not want to say, "Whitehall knows best where a firm should sell its goods or services." However, to be cost-effective, we must achieve some selectivity by type of firm, by market and by concentrating on the period when help is most needed. For example, there is, to a large extent, concentration on small and medium-sized firms.

Trade fair support is particularly attractive to smaller firms and nearly three quarters of users have fewer than 200 employees. It is also more effective to concentrate support on newcomers to markets, in the belief that, once companies are established in markets, the operation should not need a continuing subsidy from public funds.

My hon. Friend mentioned the example of a new, young and vigorous company going to Japan, taking part in a trade fair, but not being able to follow that up with a second visit. I understand that, although we have to look carefully at those who may make more than the number of visits that our budget can bear, our limit, which is interpreted fairly loosely, of about four visits comes close to satisfying our objective of giving firms a sufficient initial boost to allow them to work under their own devices and finances subsequently.

I have already said that some activities are more efficiently carried out centrally to exploit, for example, the unique information and assistance network provided by the commercial sections of our embassies and high commissions abroad. We aim not to compete with the private sector but to operate in other areas to achieve our objectives. For example, much of the detailed operation of the trade fair and mission programmes is handled by chambers of commerce and trade associations. Where export market research is needed, we contribute to the costs of professional research by the private sector. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office overseas posts are encouraged to make as much use as possible of banks, local chambers of commerce and British business groups.

On the question of organisation, when my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade returns to the United Kingdom I will draw his attention to the appropriate section in Hansard in which my hon. Friend described his interesting idea about regional trade commissioners. My hon. Friend will not expect me to give an instant answer to that proposal. Although the idea has been expressed before, it is certainly worth putting to my right hon. Friend, who will undoubtedly wish to reply at an opportune moment.

[Mr. John Butcher]

By way of emphasising the importance of the various forms of support, I wish to say that, given the rapid improvement in our performance as exporters, it is correct for the Government to see where they can best help those who most need help in this period of general improvement. It is surely correct for us to assess the targeting of our aid and its efficacy, and to take what we may discover from the monitoring of our measures and put it into any amendments we may wish to make in future.

In that regard, I shall now turn to soft loans, with which my hon. Friend dealt at some length, and aid and trade provision. The Government recognise that some countries may prefer loans to grants supplemented by export credits. We are discussing with the financial community what mechanisms might be devised for providing soft loans. I assure my hon. Friend that we are taking top flight advice from the City. We may wish to determine the role that the banks or capital markets can play in providing the funds that may be necessary, as already happens with ECGD-backed contracts, thereby reducing calls on public expenditure. As ever, there is a place for the private and public sectors to work in partnership. I can tell my hon. Friend that ATP support is now available for China, but at present only in the usual ATP grant form. Moreover, the funds available are limited within the present ATP provision.

On ECGD, my hon. Friend pointed out the risk of offending some nations if the league table, in terms of the classification of cover proffered, is presented clumsily. That is a serious point for the Department of Trade and Industry to consider, and I shall certainly draw it to my right hon. Friend's attention. It is a perfectly worthy point for my hon. Friend to make, as he is interested only in defending the interests of British exporters who may feel offended by downgrading or the proclamation of second division status. We shall certainly study that.

Let me stress that the Government have twin objectives. They are firmly committed both to promoting United Kingdom project interests, and to the need for greater international restraint and openness in the use of soft finance. The latter is inevitably a long-term objective. We recognise that in the meantime British companies pursuing project business on the international market must be protected against the practices of other Governments in softening the terms of finance. The projects and export policy division of the Department of Trade and Industry was set up with the specific purpose of focusing Government support for firms seeking worthwhile project business overseas. The main instruments of financial support in addition to the ATP are ECGD's fixed rate export finance scheme, and the overseas projects fund from which support can be provided on a repayable basis towards certain pre-contractual costs.

I began my speech by describing why improvement in our foreign trade performance is important for job creation. May I put on the record some data that have been scandalously under-reported during the past few weeks? Exports of goods and services were the fastest-growing component of United Kingdom output in 1984, together with fixed investment. They are forecast to continue to grow strongly in 1985. Exports of non-oil goods and manufactures—this is an area of current interest to the House—reached all-time highs in volume terms in the first few months of this year. Excluding oil and erratic items, the volume growth for exports of manufactures in 1984 was 10·5 per cent., and for the three months to May the volume was 11 per cent. up on the comparable period last year. Incidentally, on the same basis, the volume of imports has increased by only 5 per cent.

The House will agree that it would be helpful if those who comment on the trade figures pointed out that these dramatic figures are probably the biggest increases for 10 years. Of course, exporters have achieved those impressive figures, not the Government. Government support measures can contribute on the margin, and I should stress that our contribution is still useful, especially in helping small firms. Recent studies to examine the impact of several BOTB services suggest that companies using them in one year will win additional export business of more than £2 billion.

I have every reason to conclude on a positive note. I agree with my hon. Friend that increasing our share of world trade will help us to embark on the best possible job creation programme. I welcome my hon. Friend's positive suggestions. If he believes that there are some points to which I have not responded comprehensively this afternoon, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade will get in touch with him when he returns to the United Kingdom.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes past Three o'clock.

House of Commons

Monday 8 July 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

CAMBRIDGE CITY COUNCIL BILL

Read the third time, and passed.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Unemployment and Health

1. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what studies are available to him of the relationship between unemployment and health; what consideration he has given to them; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): My right hon. Friend and I are aware that a number of studies have considered whether there might be any relationship between unemployment and health. All have shown how difficult it is to isolate the factors which contribute to the need for health care. We are committed to targeting health care resources in response to needs, no matter how those needs arise.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Minister aware that at least 3,000 people have died because of unemployment, according to official data based on the 1971 census figures? Is he further aware that thousands more people have become chronically sick as a result of unemployment? How many more people have to die because of the Government's policies?

Mr. Roberts: I repeat that there is no direct proven causal connection between unemployment and ill health. I remind the hon. Lady that when she last alleged that connection in the Welsh Grand Committee in March, and I asked her for the material on which she based her view, she sent me an article from The Lancet, which simply reiterated what I have just said—that it is extremely difficult to prove any causal connection.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a close relationship between strike action, health and unemployment, in that many of the strikes that have been supported——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about unemployment and health.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: I was about to point out, Mr. Speaker, that strike action creates unemployment. Does not strike action in the Health Service lengthen the waiting lists for inpatients and outpatients? How did the strike action in 1981 affect those waiting lists?

Mr. Roberts: There is no doubt, because the figures prove it, that the strike action in the Health Service to which my hon. Friend referred lengthened the waiting lists.

Mr. Foot: Do not all the reports on the valley towns show the deepening crisis and the social consequences—no doubt partly due to mass unemployment, but also to other factors? Rather than making such complacent replies, why do the Minister and his right hon. Friend not go to the Cabinet to try to obtain the additional resources needed to fight the consequences of their policies?

Mr. Roberts: Of course there are reports from the valley towns, but, quite frankly, the reports to which the right hon. Gentleman referred and their conclusions are certainly not helped by, for example, strike action. There is a housing problem in the Cynon Valley, represented by the hon. Lady, but it was not improved by the coal strike.

Mr. Geraint Howells: May I ask——

Mr. Rowlands: What has the coal strike to do with it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must get back to unemployment and health.

Mr. Howells: Will the Minister tell us how many of those unemployed in the Health Service in Wales will be unemployed next year?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. Gentleman knows that there has been a tremendous increase in staffing in the NHS in Wales.

Mr. Coleman: How many?

Mr. Roberts: I shall answer the hon. Gentleman. There was a 15·6 per cent. increase in front-line staff in the NHS in Wales between 1979 and 1984.

On current pay awards, it is very much to be hoped that they can be contained within the increased allocations given to health authorities in Wales, with, perhaps, a certain amount more being saved by authorities.

Mr. Barry Jones: The Minister would do well to read today's Western Mail, in which Mr. Rodger Dobson's compelling and disturbing article relates the link between unemployment and bad health. Does the Minister understand that the Sneddon family, and tens of thousands like them throughout Wales, desperately need the hope of work? Was not the brutal message from Brecon that the people of Wales want more work and an end to unemployment?

Mr. Roberts: One of the messages of Brecon and Radnor was that the Labour party has little to crow about today. Of course we all want a decline in unemployment.

Labour Statistics

2. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to the percentage of workers in Wales employed in firms, industries, services or processes that have been established in Wales since 1965.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): Comprehensive information is not available.

However, new manufacturing units known to have opened in Wales since the end of 1965 and still in production directly provide some 72,000 manufacturing jobs, some 35 per cent. of the total number of employees in employment in manufacturing as at December 1984.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is it not clear that those figures do not give the whole picture? Should not the Government concentrate greater resources on promoting the growth of new jobs and new industries and not on attempting to arrest the necessary decline of some traditional industries?

Mr. Edwards: Although I agree that we should not attempt to arrest necessary decline, the introduction of new technology and the modernisation of existing industry is an important contribution to economic recovery. Some 400 manufacturing plants have opened since May 1979 and they already provide about 18,000 jobs. Many have only just started to take on employees and will provide considerably more jobs in due course.

Mr. Allan Rogers: I am aware that the Secretary of State and his Department have done much to attract new industries to south Wales, but will he devote the same attention to existing industries? When W. Ribbons in the Rhonnda wanted some help from the Department, the Secretary of State was swanning around Finland. What did he bring back from Finland?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman might be unaware that I went at the invitation of a company which directly employs 250 people in north Wales and which will provide 800 or 900 jobs in the forestry industry in Wales. I also visited a company which is the 50 per cent. shareholder of British Tissues, which employs many hundreds of people in south Wales. As the hon. Gentleman says, helping the development of existing industry is important. I hope that he will not belittle our efforts to ensure that those industries are strengthened and enlarged.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government have a creditable record in promoting new jobs since 1979, especially through overseas investment in Wales? Does he further agree that that record could be even better if it were not for the negative chorus from the Opposition, who revel in high unemployment and all things unattractive?

Mr. Edwards: Inward investment from overseas is undoubtedly an important contributory factor to the modernisation of Welsh industry, but we should not exaggerate. Of the 1,000 or so manufacturing units which still exist and have come into being during the past 20 years, only about 65 represent direct inward investment, whereas nearly half represent small companies starting up new businesses. That type of indigenous development is important for the future.

Mr. Barry Jones: The right hon. Gentleman is far too complacent. He has not told us, for example, about Inmos today. Does he realise that under his regime 103,000 manufacturing jobs have disappeared in Wales since he took office? Did not the Brecon electorate brutally dismiss his policies as wretched failures? Is it not the case that the policies must be changed or the endangered species behind him will lose their seats?

Mr. Edwards: I do not believe that anything that I said to the House about the changes necessary in industry showed complacency. What is undoubtedly a matter of congratulation is that we are attracting new jobs. Since last Question Time there has been the announcement from Control Data at Brynmawr of 100 new jobs, from Shopco (U.K.) Ltd of 100 new jobs and that NDN Aircraft is to manufacture new aircraft in Cardiff creating 100 new jobs. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the announcement by Seddons in the Delyn enterprise zone that it will take on about 250 people. I am not for one moment suggesting that we do not need a great deal more, but to suggest that that record of attracting new business and new industry smacks of complacency is absurd.

Secondary Schools (Expenditure)

3. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent per pupil in secondary schools in Wales in the most recent year for which figures are available; and how this compares with the figure for 1978-79, at constant prices.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Mr. John Stradling Thomas): At 1983-84 prices, spending per secondary school pupil in Wales was £905 in 1978-79 and £1,006 in 1983-84. That is an increase of 11 per cent.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend agree that those figures show satisfactory improvements since 1978-79? Do the Government intend to make more resources available for Welsh language education?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: The figures are satisfactory, yes, but I am never satisfied. The charge of complacency levelled against us on any issue is a parrot cry. The figures are a refutation of the parrot cry about cuts. There has been no cut. There has been an 11 per cent. increase. In reply to the second part of my hon. Friend's question, I have been giving careful consideration to calls for the establishment of a Welsh language education development body. When I met a deputation of six different Welsh language groups on that issue on 25 June——

Mr. Ray Powell: Come on. The hon. Gentleman is taking too long.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) has a genius for interruption, but makes little constructive contribution. At that meeting I made it clear that I would not hold out any false hopes, because I must consider resources for Welsh language education alongside all other competing calls, and reconcile my final decision within the overriding public expenditure constraints, which are essential if we are to maintain the economy on the right lines.

Mr. Rowlands: Will the hon. Gentleman give similar figures in relation to school books and school library expenditure? I do not know whether he has children attending Welsh secondary schools. We have, and we notice the dog-eared books that they are bringing home, the lack of books and the shared books. Will we return to the slate and the chalk under this Government?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: Capitation and the management of their resources is entirely a matter for the local authorities and not for central Government.

Mr. Grist: Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the other changes in secondary schools in Wales since 1979, as elsewhere in the United Kingdom, has been the sharp fall in the number of pupils, and that resources for pupils might be better employed were some authorities to consider school amalgamations.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker. I accept that local education authorities have a difficult task to perform against a background of falling rolls. I have asked them to come to see me so that we may discuss that matter constructively to see how best it can be resolved.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Does the Minister appreciate that the rosy picture that he is trying to paint is not borne out by the facts? For example, the teachers' dispute drags on, and without a contented labour force to take charge of the schools our children will be at a disadvantage. When will the Government provide the means to bring about a just settlement for the teachers?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: As the House will be aware, the Government's position has been made clear all along. There is no question of more money to fund an excessive public sector wages settlement. Furthermore, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that responsibility for the teachers' pay negotiations does not rest with me.

Labour Statistics

4. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the latest level of unemployment in North Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Current levels of unemployment remain high, but considerable progress continues to be made in developing the area and attracting new investment.

Mr. Parry: Is the Minister aware that, under this Government, unemployment in north Wales has nearly doubled? Is that not a disgrace? Does the Secretary of State accept that job losses in the steel and textile industries, particularly in the Flint area, affect regions such as Merseyside, which, over the weekend, saw another 700 jobs lost at the Plessey factory at Huyton? When does the Secretary of State expect the economy to upturn so that we can provide more jobs in north Wales and Merseyside?

Mr. Edwards: I am aware of the problems in north Wales and Merseyside. That is one of the reasons why the Government have spent some £350 million on roads and industrial infrastructure and enterprise zones in Clwyd since we came into office in 1979.

Mr. Raffan: I joined my right hon. Friend in welcoming last week's announcement that the garment manufacturer Seddons is to set up a new plant in Delyn enterprise zone, employing initially 140 people. Is he aware that Delyn borough council expects to make a further significant job announcement within the next month?

Mr. Edwards: I noticed Mr. Sharps doing a television broadcast recently in which he was optimistic about the prospects for that enterprise trust. I congratulate the local authority on the drive and energy that it has been putting behind the zone.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: When will the Secretary of State be in a position to make an announcement about the availability of EC aid in areas of rural north Wales which are not at the moment within assisted area zones?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we are still considering that matter. I cannot give him a firm date.

Mr. Barry Jones: The right hon. Gentleman is too serene in his ignorance. Is it not the case that in Clwyd and Gwynedd there are 37,000 jobless people and some 2,000 vacancies? Has he the guts to tell the Prime Minister to change her economic policy, or does he remain her lackey?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman should be aware, if he visits his constituency, of the considerable new investment there, and the fact that it is one of the most attractive areas in the whole of the United Kingdom for foreign investment and for new companies setting up. That should be a matter for pleasure and congratulation.

5. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest unemployment figures available for the Wrexham area and for Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Some 7,736 and 173,422 respectively.

Dr. Marek: The Secretary of State knows that he was unable to do anything about the Courtaulds closure. Dunlop is now proposing to close, and the Secretary of State, in an answer to me on Friday, was able to say only that he could take into account Clwyd's detailed proposals for allocation of planned resources. Will the Secretary of State do something to avert the closure at Dunlop? If he cannot, how long will he stay as Secretary of State, with the appalling level of unemployment in the Principality? The right hon. Gentleman should either do something about it or resign.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman should remember that in the past 12 months, in the Wrexham area, Laura Ashley, Metal Box, F.W. Bender, TetraPak and Sharp Corporation have announced new or major expansion projects. I have already pointed out that the Government have spent at least £350 million on industrial measures in Clwyd, and we shall continue to use every means at our disposal to attract new investment to the area.

Mr. Abse: Given the fruitless hard work that the Secretary of State for Wales recently put into the Brecon and Radnor by-election, and as unemployment was one of the main issues at Brecon, what statement will the right hon. Gentleman make on the by-election result? Does he not think that he owes to Wales, now that it has given its verdict on his employment policy, a full statement as to what new steps are to be taken? Will he merely repeat the old lessons and tell Wales that under this Government it must endure the same sort of unemployment as we have seen in the past few years? Has the Minister no comment to make on the Brecon and Radnor result?

Mr. Edwards: All political parties should consider carefully the results of by-elections. I shall do so. The Labour party will no doubt also consider the complete panic of the electorate when it suddenly realised that it might elect a Labour Member of Parliament. When one watches and listens to the performance of the hon. Gentleman, who can blame it?

Sir Anthony Meyer: Just which of the policies being advanced by the Opposition does my right hon. Friend consider would be most productive in bringing fresh jobs into Wales?

Mr. Edwards: One feature of the Brecon and Radnor by-election was that the Opposition parties did not advance any policies, and that they were careful not to do so. The only close ally and supporter of the Labour party who advanced any policies was Mr. Scargill. He was the gentleman whom everybody on the Opposition Benches supported throughout the strike but who was so destructive of Welsh industry and Welsh employment.

Mr. Anderson: How would the Secretary of State explain to the man on the top deck of the Brecon omnibus the logic of falling regional aid at a time of rising unemployment? Does the new "middle way" include a rethink of regional policy?

Mr. Edwards: I know enough about Brecon and Radnor to know that they do not have double-decker buses there.

Mr. Ray Powell: Despite the arrogance of the Secretary of State in his replies to some of the questions, particularly about unemployment in Wales and the Brecon and Radnor by-election, is he prepared to offer the House and the country an apology for his statement regarding disabled people when he referred to the Brecon and Radnor by-election?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is very wide of this question, which deals with unemployment.

Mr. Edwards: None the less, Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say that I have already written to a number of people expressing my regret and apologies for a carelessly phrased off-the-cuff remark that I should not have made. As someone who has introduced a major measure for the improvement of the care of the mentally handicapped and who has a close relative who is mentally handicapped, the last thing that I should wish to do would be to cause offence. Of course I apologise.

Mr. Anderson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take points of order later. We are running behind time.

Vale of Glamorgan (Road Traffic)

6. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what recent complaints and reports he has received of excessive traffic of heavy vehicles on roads for which he is responsible within the area of the Vale of Glamorgan; what discussions he has had with the highway authority on the matter; and what steps are contemplated to reduce or divert such traffic.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I am responsible only for trunk roads within the Vale of Glamorgan area, but I am aware of the problems that have arisen on county roads and have received representations from my hon. Friend and others about the heavy lorries travelling through Dinas Powys, Llysworney and Colwinston. I hope that the matter can be resolved in the very near future.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is my hon. Friend aware that the excessive traffic of heavy vehicles on some of these roads has underlined the need for bypasses of Dinas Powys, Aberthin Llysworney and Colwinston? The county council asserts that the lack of capital funds limits its ability to carry out these projects. Will my hon. Friend discuss these matters with the county council?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: My officials are in touch with the county council and I know that it has traffic management proposals in mind for the immediate future. It has in mind proposals for a bypass of Dinas Powys and in addition is considering the possibility of traffic management measures. I am also informed that the county council is considering whether to include in its programme the proposed bypass of Llysworney. However, I must remind the House that the priority given to any of these road improvement schemes and to any scheme at Colwinston is a matter for the county council.

Labour Statistics

8. Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales are jobless; how many were jobless in May 1979; by how much the total has increased as a figure and as a percentage; and what is the current figure of long-term unemployed.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 13 June 1985 there were 173,422 unemployed claimants in Wales. The increase over the estimated equivalent figure of 77,200 in May 1979 is 96,222 or 124·6 per cent. The latest figure for the long-term unemployed relates to April 1985, when 75,573 had been unemloyed in Wales for over one year.

Mr. Jones: Given those frightening figures, why cannot Wales benefit from a major change in economic policy? Does the right hon. Gentleman not understand that the Welsh people want their welfare state strengthened and unemployment tackled with urgency? Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that the rejection at Brecon and Radnor of his personal nominee, Mr. Butler, who was an adviser of the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman, represents a crushing vote of no confidence in Welsh Office Ministers?

Mr. Edwards: I agree that the Brecon and Radnor electorate want the welfare state to be strengthened. That aim will continue to be the Government's policy. The economic growth that is taking place provides the best guarantee for future employment. I very much welcome the recent statements by the CBI Welsh Council, which show the growing optimism of those in industry for economic activity in Wales.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is there not much evidence throughout the Western world that politicians and other people are most anxious that economic recovery should lead to a reduction in unemployment? Is it not nonsense to pretend that there are people in this country who want high unemployment?

Mr. Edwards: Yes, Sir.

Mr. James Callaghan: Whatever is happening in the rest of the Western world, can the right hon. Gentleman give my constituents any reassurance about the proposed closure of the Cardiff veterinary investigation centre, with the halving of staff numbers, and the possible loss of 200 staff in the Export Credits Guarantee Department? This morning I received representations from two constituents who are worried about their future employment.

Mr. Edwards: The right hon. Gentleman knows that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food put forward a consultative paper on the future of the veterinary service. We are considering representations on that matter. On the ECGD, I understand that the management has put forward some proposals for future re-organisation within the ECGD. At present, no details of the manpower consequences are available. This matter is at an early stage of consultation.

Mr. Raffan: Will my right hon. Friend remind the Labour party that last year Wales obtained nearly a quarter of the total jobs created by inward investment in the United Kingdom — four times as many as Labour's feeble Welsh Office team created during the Labour Government's last year of office?

Mr. Edwards: That is true. We have had that remarkable record for a part of the United Kingdom that represents 5 per cent. of the population. I am glad to say that, of the 1,000 or so manufacturing units in Wales that are known to have opened during the past 20 years, about 400—40 per cent.—have opened since May 1979.

Mr. Coleman: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the unemployment percentages that he cited in answer to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) will be further increased by redundancies at BP Llandarcy and Star Wrought Products at Briton Ferry? One thousand jobs have been lost during the past three months in the borough of Neath. When will the right hon. Gentleman change his regional policies? Does he not realise that, because of the policies pursued by the Labour Government, when he came to office unemployment in Neath was much lower than it is now? When will the right hon. Gentleman do something about this? Why does he not get out?

Mr. Edwards: I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would at least welcome the decrease of about 5,000 in unemployment in Wales compared with last month and the considerable relative improvement in Neath's position. That improvement was introduced during the last regional policy review.

M4 (Coryton Junction)

9. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he now expects to carry out repairs to the area of badly pitted road surface on the westbound carriageway of the M4 at a point about three and a half miles east of the Coryton junction.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I am pleased to say that repair work was completed on 24 June.

Mr. Wardell: On 14 February the Minister told me that remedial work would take place as soon as weather conditions improved. As it has taken a considerable time to remedy the position, will the hon. Gentleman look seriously at the possibility of lighting the whole of the M4 in Wales? When repairs are needed, potential accident spots occur. Better lighting would reduce risks and the danger to lives when people are travelling on the motorway.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: The hon. Gentleman is quite right that I advised him on 14 February last that remedial works would take place as soon as weather conditions permitted, because repairs of this nature are best carried out in favourable weather. The point about lighting is quite outwith the terms of the question, but I shall consider the matter. I give no undertaking.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: As the road in question is located in my constituency, may I urge my hon. Friend to squash flat any notion that the M4 is a disincentive in attracting people to come to Cardiff, as has happened with the way in which the Severn bridge has been hyped up out of all proportion by the media and by Opposition Members?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I am in complete sympathy with the point of view of my hon. Friend. I believe that a disservice has been done by exaggerating any difficulties that may have occurred at the Severn bridge or anywhere else on the M4.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Is it not time that the Welsh Office took more interest in what is happening on the M4? For instance, can the hon. Gentleman tell the House what steps have been taken by his Department to notify the disabled of their right to travel free over the Severn bridge, particularly bearing in mind the exorbitant increases that are in operation?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I will, of course, look into the matter to see exactly what steps have been taken, and will let the hon. Gentleman know. I totally reject any suggestion that my Department has not been very closely involved in anything to do with the M4 in relation to its importance to the south Wales economy.

Sheepmeat Regime

10. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he is satisfied with the operation of the European Economic Community's sheepmeat regime in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Yes, Sir. The sheepmeat regime has brought substantial benefits to Welsh sheep producers, who have a guaranteed price for fat lambs under the sheep variable premium scheme. Breeders also benefit from an annual premium on ewes and the breeding flock has been increasing by 2 to 3 per cent. a year. In the last full marketing year, 1983-84, the regime resulted in payments of £56·8 million to Welsh sheep producers.

Mr. Thomas: How can the Secretary of State be satisfied with the operation of a regime which is now being used to penalise sheepmeat producers in the United Kingdom, and in Wales in particular? Is he satisfied with the present gap operating in the premia and what is his view of the future of the premium? Will it be phased out by the Community?

Mr. Edwards: We have fought resolutely for the sheepmeat regime, which this Government introduced, and which has led to the substantial increase in the flock in Wales. I believe that it has made an enormous contribution to the rural economy. As the hon. Gentleman knows, it was not possible to secure entirely satisfactory modifications to the clawback arrangements, to which I think he was referring. However, we shall continue to press for changes to alleviate the difficulties caused by clawback. The exemption from clawback for our exports outside the Community has been renewed to the end of 1987.

Mr. Barry Jones: Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that the industry wants him to make a better fight for the sheep farmer than he did for the small dairy farmer?

Mr. Edwards: As I pointed out, we are talking about the sheepmeat regime, which was introduced by this Government in 1980 and which has been the biggest boost to the sheep industry in Wales that there has ever been.

Labour Statistics

11. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for unemployment in (a) Ogmore, (b) Mid-Glamorgan and (c) Wales; what were the equivalent figures in May 1979; and what is the percentage increase in each case.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 13 June 1985 the number of unemployed claimants were 4,545, 34,657 and 173,422 respectively. In Wales the comparable figure is 77,200 in May 1979, representing an increase of 124·6 per cent. A comparable claimant-based figure for 1979 in Ogmore and Mid-Glamorgan is not available.

Mr. Ray Powell: Does the Secretary of State realise that the 124 per cent. increase since 1979 about which he talks means, so far as Ogmore is concerned, that, with the closure of St. John's colliery, as a result of which 830 miners have lost their jobs, the percentage increase could rise to such an extent that 45 per cent. of male people in Maesteg will be seeking employment? Does he not think it is time that the Government, as a result of their defeat in the Brecon and Radnor by-election, changed their economic and social policies, and looked seriously at communities such as Maesteg, which suffer so badly when a colliery is closed?

Mr. Edwards: I understand the problems of communities such as Maesteg, but during the past year projects from Invacare, Acrian, Align Rite, Biomet and the Chronar Corporation have been announced in the Bridgend area and promise about 1,200 new jobs. There are problems among the older industries, but we are succeeding in attracting many of the new technologies and new industries to the area.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the statements of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) would sound rather more convincing if he had not supported the miners' strike, despite the fact that 70 per cent. of the miners in his constituency voted against it? However, we are all concerned about unemployment and I should like to know whether my right hon. Friend has any news about future employment prospects at Borg Warner at Kenvig Hill, which are extremely important to my constituency?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend will know that about 600 jobs at Borg Warner have been under threat for a considerable time. It was with a good deal of pleasure that we heard that the company is proposing a new use for the factory and has applied for selective financial assistance, which is being considered by the Welsh Industrial Development Advisory Board. I am deeply concerned that the proposals that the Borg Warner management has put to the work force appear to have been rejected. I hope that the members of the work force will consider carefully the future of the plant. It would be tragic if the prospect of 600 secure jobs were put at risk by a careless and irresponsible approach to a serious proposition from the management.

PAYMASTER GENERAL

Government Expenditure

20. Mr. Chapman asked the Paymaster-General how many staff in his Department have the responsibility for providing the Treasury with up-to-date information on central Government expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

The Paymaster-General (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): One member of my Department's staff, a senior executive officer, is responsible for providing the Treasury with details of the amounts being paid out to meet the claims arising against central Government accounts during the course of the day's banking operations. In addition, three times each month computer tapes containing detailed analyses of voted expenditure authorised by Government Departments during the previous month are sent to the Treasury. These are produced by a computer system maintained by 13 clerical and technical staff.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. In view of the deserved reputation that his Department has in its efficient role in acting as the Government's banker, will he tell us whether he has received any representations or complaints about his role? Does he accept that it would be a good idea if the responsibilities of his Department were extended so that the Department acted as the banker for local authorities, bearing in mind the continual overshoot of local councils, which are responsible for about a quarter of all public expenditure?

Mr. Gummer: I am happy to tell my hon. Friend that my staff in the Paymaster General's office have a deserved reputation for carrying out the Department's role as the Government's banker extremely efficiently. If that role were to be extended, that would be a matter for the Treasury. There is no doubt that the staff do an extremely good job.

Mr. Winnick: Would it not be useful if the hon. Gentleman, as Paymaster General and chairman of the Conservative party, informed the Cabinet that there is no enthusiasm throughout the country for further public spending cuts? Surely that is the No. 1 lesson from the result of the Brecon and Radnor by-election. Why do Ministers go on about the presentation of policy when what is at issue is the policy itself?

Mr. Gummer: If the hon. Gentleman had bothered to examine the facts he would have learnt that Government expenditure cuts in the National Health Service, for example, amounted to considerable increases in spending in real terms. The Government are now spending more per child in school than at any time in our history, again in real terms. The hon. Gentleman would do better to check his facts before speaking in the House. If he did that, he would never speak.

Mr. Stokes: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the way in which he has some say in looking after the nation's finances with such a minute staff. Does he realise that not everyone shares the desire of the Opposition for greater public expenditure? Does he further realise that if public expenditure is to be reduced, even his small staff could become smaller still?

Mr. Gummer: We should boast about the expansion of public expenditure where that is a good thing, and provide better services and boast, too, about the cutting of public expenditure when that reduces the waste that was so much a mark of the Labour Government.

Mr. James Callaghan: Is it the Government's policy to make cuts and represent them as increases, or to make increases and represent them as cuts?

Mr. Gummer: It is the Government's policy not to find themselves going to the International Monetary Fund as a debtor nation, but to continue to be a nation respected throughout the world for financial probity, which was not the mark of the Government when the right hon. Gentleman was Prime Minister.

Mr. Knox: Will my hon. Friend ensure that none of the civil servants at present concerned with the administration of pensions will be transferred to providing other statistics for the Treasury?

Mr. Gummer: That certainly would not be a good thing, because since 1984 there have been only two complaints from Members of Parliament about the administration of pensions, although we provide 1·1 million pensioners with their pensions every year. That is a very good comment about my staff, in this, their 150th anniversary year.

Mr. Rowlands: As chairman of the Conservative party, does the hon. Gentleman support the view that the disastrous decline of the Conservative vote in Brecon and Radnor is due entirely to presentation, not policies?

Mr. Speaker: A bit wide, I think.

Mr. Gummer: The question asked by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has little to do with my responsibilities as Paymaster General, but I am willing to answer it in my role as chairman of the Conservative party. The answer is simply this——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Two wrongs will not make it right. We should stick to the Paymaster General's responsibilities.

Mr. Gummer: I shall answer as Paymaster General. We monitor Government expenditure, and we see clearly that the Government are spending more money in the areas that matter and less where it would be wasted.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Bearing in mind that my hon. Friend acts as the Government's banker, is he satisfied that his 840 members of staff are monitoring properly and most carefully the payment of all cheques coming out of the Crawley offices? Will my hon. Friend confirm that it is his aim not only to reduce the number of cheques being paid but to reduce public expenditure, something of which the Conservative party should be proud?

Mr. Gummer: I adhere to the principle that this nation should reduce the proportion of its wealth that is spent by the Government and continue to increase the proportion of its wealth that is spent by the people who make it. That must be the principle of government. It is also the principle of government to ensure that those in need are effectively helped. For that reason we have increased Government expenditure in the areas where it provides decent homes, schools, Health Service facilities and pensions. I am proud of our record in all those areas.

Mr. Anderson: On the principle of spending more money where it matters and less where it goes to waste, is the Paymaster General proud of the fact that since 1979 expenditure on overseas aid has decreased by 18 per cent. and is now at the lowest level ever?

Mr. Gummer: I am proud of the fact that in a period of extreme difficulty we have a better record on overseas aid than almost any other country in the world.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Paymaster General aware that, in spite of the hard work of the staff in his Department, Ministers, including the Chancellor, who does not seem to know whether he has found a "middle way" on public spending, have made confused and conflicting statements about the role of public spending? How many staff in his Department will be transferred from providing information to providing public relations, in a belated effort, following the Brecon disaster, to soften the Government's hard-nosed image on public spending? Will not that PR in itself be a substitute for any effort to restore public spending cuts?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Lady seems to have failed to remember that the disaster of Brecon and Radnor was the fact that her leader placed his own personal reputation on the line — [Interruption.] — and three quarters of her right hon. and hon. Friends went down to show that he did. The fact of Brecon and Radnor was this: once the people there feared that they might have a Labour Member of Parliament they did everything in their power to make sure that Labour's candidate did not win.

WALES

Llanwern Steelworks

12. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has had any recent discussions with the chairman of the British Steel Corporation concerning the future of Llanwern steelworks.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I met the chairman in May and in June for wide-ranging discussions.

Mr. Hughes: How much longer is the haggling, which is doing untold harm to the steelworks, to go on? Why do the Government not resolve to reaffirm the stand taken by the Secretary of State for the Environment in December 1982, which was that the five integrated plants should remain? Why do they not also announce the Concast scheme for Llanwern?

Mr. Edwards: In a debate in which the hon. Gentleman took part, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry said that the corporate plan would be presented to the Government by the end of July. In the light of that, I have nothing further to add, except to repeat that I am confident about the future of Llanwern.

Mr. Foot: Will the Secretary of State finally bring this matter to a conclusion? Can he not tell the country and the House that Llanwern will go ahead, and that it has a wonderful record? Will he finally make his mind up on the matter?

Mr. Edwards: I have made my position and my confidence in the future of Llanwern absolutely clear. The right hon. Gentleman, who has had experience of the closure of steelworks while in government, will know that there are many difficult issues to be resolved about the future capacity and plans of the industry. The proper way for the Government to proceed is to wait for the proposals of the British Steel Corporation in its corporate plan, and then to take decisions on them.

Sir Raymond Gower: Do not the splendid performances of both management and employees at the works at Llanwern and Port Talbot entitle them to some assurance that both these works will continue for a long time?

Mr. Edwards: On many occasions I have said that the splendid performance of the workers at those two steel plants is by far the best guarantee of their future. As I have said, at present we are making a massive investment in Port Talbot, and I have great confidence in the future of Llanwern. While I have been in government I have, fortunately, never had to consider any proposal from the BSC for the closure of Llanwern. Therefore, some of the threats and allegations made have been purely hypothetical.

THE ARTS

Mr. Freud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take points of order afterwards. Otherwise, it will take time out of the hon. Gentleman's question, which is No. 21.

Mr. Freud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the point of order afterwards. Otherwise it will take time out of this short question period.

Mr. Freud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point of order is on the arts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take it afterwards. Does the hon. Gentleman want to ask question 21?

Mr. Freud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no authority to allow injury time for questions. Does the hon. Gentleman want to ask question 21?

Mr. Freud: Yes.

Objects in Lieu of Tax

21. Mr. Freud asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what recent representations the Minister for the Arts has received concerning the allocation for acceptance of works of art in lieu of tax; and whether he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): My noble Friend is advised on the allocation of acceptance-in-lieu offers by the Museums and Galleries Commission. He occasionally receives other representations from interested parties.

Mr. Freud: While we have great respect for the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), who is answering, does he accept that already nobody answers for the arts in this House, and that we are now being presented with the monkey twice removed from the organ grinder?

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that we are in danger of losing our heritage because of the wholly unacceptable position that pertains to works of art which are accepted in lieu of tax. Will he bear in mind that the Government make good money from the arts market? Will he also bear in mind the Government's promise to look at tax incentives for the arts? We have them for the live arts. Will he please extend those incentives to the arts in respect of pictures and museums?

Sir George Young: On the first point, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Environment, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), wrote to the hon. Gentleman explaining that he had to be in Helsinki from 7 to 10 July to lead the United Kingdom delegation to the international convention on long-range transboundary air pollution. On the substantive question, the hon. Gentleman knows that the Government are reviewing arrangements for funding acceptance-in-lieu transactions. My noble Friend hopes to make an announcement at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Alan Howarth: While I welcome what my hon. Friend said, does he agree that if the system is to fulfil its purpose it will not be satisfactory simply to lift the amount available for acceptance-in-lieu transactions from £2 million to some other arbitrary ceiling? Does he agree that we should unequivocally commit ourselves to ensuring that it will be possible to retain a strictly limited category of pre-eminent items for our heritage?

Sir George Young: I can tell my hon. Friend that the more fundamental issues that he just mentioned are covered by the review. I shall ensure that my noble Friend is made aware of my hon. Friend's strong views.

Mr. Sheldon: Will the hon. Gentleman relate to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment who usually answers questions on the arts in this Chamber the dissatisfaction of the House that he is away dealing not with the arts but with something different? That is unsatisfactory, because his first duty should be to the House. Will the Minister bear in mind the fact that the Getty money and the large sums that are available for the purchase of works of art mean that the Treasury will have to reconsider these matters? It has lost some good opportunities for obtaining bargains. We look forward to a further consideration of such matters by the Treasury, guided by the Minister for the Arts.

Sir George Young: As the right hon. Gentleman will know, the Treasury is an important partner in this review. The points that he has just made will be considered by all those who take part in it. I hope that my noble Friend will be able to announce the conclusion of the review before long.

Mr. Faulds: Does the Minister agree that there has been a quite unacceptable delay in rescinding this ludicrous ceiling on the in lieu arrangements? Does he realise that all of us in this House back the Minister in his wish to smash this ceiling and ensure the retention of these treasures in Britain? Will he manage to prevail upon his hon. and noble Friend—or whatever the fellow is called —to get the Treasury to pull its costive finger out on this issue?

Sir George Young: I cannot accept the allegation that there has been undue delay. On 24 April my noble Friend announced that the review would take place, and I have just said that he hopes to make an announcement on its conclusions in the very near future. That is not too long a period for a review on such an important subject.

National Heritage Memorial Fund

22. Mr. Chapman asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts how many persons employed in the Office of Arts and Libraries have direct or indirect responsibility in connection with the administration of the National Heritage Memorial Fund; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The National Heritage Memorial Fund is an autonomous body and its administration is undertaken by its staff. However, a small percentage of the time of three Office of Arts and Libraries staff is given to administrative issues associated with the fund.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. Although I appreciate that the fund is an autonomous body, does my hon. Friend accept that when the fund receives special applications for grants to save what, by any criteria, are important examples of Britain's great architectural heritage, the Department should sympathetically consider continuing to provide extra financial assistance to the fund so that it may discharge its duties for the benefit of our people?

Sir George Young: As my hon. Friend knows, the Government made a special allocation of £25 million earlier this year to enable the fund to help to ensure the future of Weston Park, Kedleston and Nostell Priory. The fund's negotiations on those three major properties are well advanced. As to my hon. Friend's broader point, the fund's annual report states:

"We have good reason for confidence not only in this Government's commitment to the objectives of conservation, but in their willingness to provide adequate funds to achieve those objectives."

Mr. Latham: Is one of those three officials responsible for monitoring section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980? If so, will he sort out the nonsense that has arisen over the indemnity arrangements for the Kessler art exhibition?

Sir George Young: I have seen the letter which my hon. Friend wrote to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on 2 July. I am sorry that the Tate gallery had apparently re-interpreted some rules which previously applied. We are in discussions with the Tate gallery, and I hope that the matter can be satisfactorily resolved.

Funding

23. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if the Minister for the Arts has any plans to meet North-West Arts to discuss provision for the overall funding of the arts in the context of the Government's plans to abolish the metropolitan counties; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My noble Friend met the director of North-West Arts and the directors of a number of other regional arts associations on 7 June and had a very useful discussion on post-abolition funding for the arts.

Mr. Lloyd: Is the Minister aware that we in the north-west believe that the amount of centrally allocated money that will be made available should the metropolitan authorities be abolished is grossly inadequate? Does he also recognise that the Arts Council is not considered to be an unbiased allocator of funds, especially to areas such as the north-west? In those circumstances, will he use the same principles as were used in the Priestley report to guarantee that the funding announced by central Government will go to the north-west to ensure that the Royal Exchange, the Halle orchestra and other such organisations of national importance receive the money that they need to allow them to continue?

Sir George Young: I am slightly surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman say that the Arts Council is biased in the regional distribution of funds, because this year's total allocation to North-West Arts represented a 17 per cent. increase on last year's grant. The Royal Exchange has received more funding from the Arts Council than has any other regional theatre. With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I think that the Arts Council has discharged its obligation to the north-west as fairly as it can.

Mr. Jessel : May we have an assurance that the financial grants and targets will be adjusted to make it possible for Manchester and Liverpool — both great cities—to make some contribution to the arts, as they obviously wish to do?

Sir George Young: As my hon. Friend knows, my noble Friend was able to set aside £34 million in replacement of metropolitan county spending, of which £16 million went to the Arts Council, £1 million to the British Film Institute and £17 million to museums and galleries. The districts will be spared the task of having to raise the precept to hand on to the top tier authorities once they are abolished. That should give them the freedom to support worthwhile artistic institutions in their localities.

Mr. Jim Callaghan: In view of the Arts Council's estimate that if and when the GLC and the six metropolitan counties are abolished there will be a shortfall of £46 million, and since the Arts Council is to be funded to the tune of £16 million, may we have a categorical assurance that the shortfall to North-West Arts of £790,000 will be met in full?

Sir George Young: The Arts Council will be seeing my noble Friend shortly to discuss provisions for the 1986-87 budget, as is normal at this time of the year. I am sure that that will be one of the matters that it will wish to raise with him.

Mr. Buchan: Is it not unfortunate that the Minister is deputy to a deputy? He might have been warned that in the last month there was a £30 million shortfall below estimate for all the arts, including North-West Arts. Is it not a fact that no guarantee has been forthcoming for the north-west or for other areas? Next year there will be £30 million short for a start. Will the Government replace that money, or not?

Sir George Young: I must make it clear that the Government do not accept the Arts Council's estimate of the shortfall, which includes provision for some capital items which the GLC and the metropolitan counties have not provided, and a number of other items which fall more appropriately to the district councils. I cannot accept the premise. Of course, my hon. friend the Member for Bristol, West would have answered the question better than I, but at least my answers have been shorn of the Latin and Greek analogies, which I understand adorn his remarks.

Parliamentary Questions (Stratford-on-Avon)

3.33 pm

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Question No. 28 begins

"Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon):"

The hon. Gentleman, who is a very admirable and likeable Member, has the privilege of representing myself, my wife, my daughter and my two grandsons and some dozen thousand others. He is wrong, or the Table Office is wrong, in giving to that historic and distinguished town the name of "Stratford-on-Avon". There is no such place. It is called "Stratford-upon-Avon".

Mr. Speaker: It is probably an abbreviation.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This matter has been the subject of a long-running discussion over many years. Any hope of resolving the issue this afternoon requires more courage than the history of the controversy justifies.

Later—

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Continuing my campaign against the boundary commissioners, not against their chairman, I was most perturbed to hear that a mistake had been made in the name of Stratford-upon-Avon. Will you, as Chairman, keep an eye on the boundary commissioners as they are so daft that they will rename it at the drop of a hat?

Mr. Speaker: I, too, feel very strongly about constituency names. I shall keep a careful eye on the matter.

Secretary of State for Wales (Statement)

3.34 pm

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You were kind enough to listen to my point of order a week ago concerning the occasion when my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) asked the Prime Minister about the statement by the Secretary of State for Wales, in which he compared the opposition in the Brecon and Radnor by-election to a mixture of the Mafia and the mentally handicapped, on the ground that neither candidate was allowed out without a minder. The Prime Minister denied that her Secretary of State for Wales would make such a statement. You, Mr. Speaker, said that it was not a point of order. Is it now a point of order? Will you request the Prime Minister, who made a false declaration to the House of Commons, to apologise? We have received an apology from the Secretary of State, but I thought that I should raise the issue at Question Time so that the Secretary of State can apologise not only to the House and the nation but particularly to the people whom he tried to debase——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that I have got the drift. It was not a point of order for me when the hon. Gentleman first raised it and it is not a point of order for me now. I heard what the Secretary of State said and I hope that honour is now satisfied.

Later—

Mr. Ray Powell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your further advice and guidance. If you cannot make a ruling on the matter, although the Prime Minister deliberately misled the nation and the House, can the Leader of the House advise us when he will ask the Prime Minister to make a statement to the House on the issue that I have raised?

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the House is in the Chamber.

Arts Question Time

3.36 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will accept that Question Time gives Members the opportunity to question a Minister who has specific responsibilities. You will also know that the subject of the arts is allocated 10 minutes every three weeks. I hope that you will make a ruling on this. As the Minister responsible is already far removed from us and has a junior Minister answering for him, what is the point in having questions answered by yet another Minister, even further removed from the relevant responsibility, as happened today?

Mr. Speaker: It is not a matter for me which Minister answers questions. That is clearly not one of my responsibilities.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. We all recognise that this is not your direct responsibility, but you are the guardian of the interests of the House and especially of Back Benchers. For nearly two years we have suffered the disadvantage of having to deal with the deputy of a deputy. As the distinguished hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) put it, it is not even the organ grinder's monkey but the monkey's monkey. The deputy has been absent from the House in connection with a totally different matter. If we cannot have more than 10 minutes in three weeks, there should be some guarantee that the questions are answered by a Minister with some direct involvement in and responsibility for the arts. I accept the comment of the deputy's deputy that his answers were at least devoid of Latin tags, but the Latin tag was usually the best part of the answer. I hope that something can be said through you, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that safeguarding the interests of the house should have some precedence in the mind of the First Lord of the Treasury.

Mr. Speaker: So far as I am concerned, this House should always have priority. The Leader of the House is here. No doubt he has heard what has been said. I cannot pursue the matter further, as it is not my responsibility.

Board and Lodging Regulations

3.38 pm

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is this a different point of order?

Mr. Boyes: It is a completely different point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Good.

Mr. Boyes: You and I share a common concern, Mr. Speaker, when Ministers make announcements to the press and not to Members of Parliament. This weekend the Minister for Social Security informed us through The Observer newspaper that Ernst and Whinney is to carry out an inquiry into provisions on residential care in relation to the new board and lodging regulations. I seek your advice on how best to go about getting the Minister into the Chamber to inform Members of Parliament of his intentions so that we can question him. More importantly, as the board and lodging regulations have been proved to be flawed, as shown by the fact that the Government have already had to change them, and as Ernst and Whinney was involved in determining the level of payment to youngsters, would not the Government do better to listen to what the Opposition have to say about the regulations so that we can help to get them correct? I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker, on how to get the Minister into the Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: It is true that the hon. Gentleman and I share a concern about these matters, but it is not a matter for me whether statements are made outside the House. The hon. Gentleman may have his opportunity during DHSS questions on 16 July.

Local Government Bill

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a fellow keeper of law and order in debating chambers, may I crave your indulgence—especially as the Leader of the House is present—on an important matter relating to the business on which we are about to embark? Until Thursday, hon. Members were unaware of its timetabling, which has clearly left hon. Members on both sides of the House insufficient time to consider the reasoned amendments made by their Lordships in another place.

The complication arises because, I assume, it was organised some time ago that the Scottish Grand Committee should meet this morning at the Crown Office buildings in Regent road, Edinburgh. How is it possible for hon. Members in this Chamber so to delay the commencement of the next piece of business that it will allow a number of concerned Scottish Members to get back to the House to vote?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman shares with me an extremely difficult task, but I do not think that he would expect me to advise him on tactics, any more than he would advise his members in county hall on the tactics that they might use.

Local Government Bill (Allocation of Time)

3.42 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): I beg to move, That the Order of the House [11th February] be supplemented as follows:—

LORDS AMENDMENTS

1.—(1) The proceedings on Consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting. Those Amendments shall be taken in the order shown in the Table set out below, and, subject to the provisions of the Order of 11th February, each part of those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in the second column of that Table.

Table

Lords Amendments	Time for conclusion
Nos. 1 to 3	6.00 p.m.
Nos. 4 to 8	7.45 p.m.
Nos. 9 to 12	8.45 p.m.
Nos. 13 to 42	9.15 p.m.
Nos. 43 to 47	10.00 p.m.
Nos. 48, 92 to 94, 49 to 91 and 95 to 98	Midnight

(2) Paragraph (1) of the Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings for two hours after Ten o'clock.

2.—(1) For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above:—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the amendment of a Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment of the said Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion moved by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment, or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment, as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege, and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment, or, as the case may be, in their Amendment as amended;

(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;

(iii) put forthwith with respect to each Amendment designated by Mr. Speaker which has not been disposed of, the Question That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Amendment; and

(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

(2) Proceeding under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

Stages subsequent to first Consideration of Lords Amendments

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of the proceedings.

4. For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

[The Secretary of State for the Environment]

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining items in the Lords Message as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;

(ii) in the case of each remaining item designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Proposal; and

(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplemental

5. — (1) In this paragraph 'the proceedings' means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of the Message or, as the case may be, for the appointment and quorum of the Committee.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which they are appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

As last week, so today the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has made a great fuss about the fact that we are debating the Bill and that we intended to move this motion. I would have more sympathy if the GLC and the metropolitan counties had not obviously devoted all their energies between then and now to putting advertisements in the press rather than tabling amendments to the House, but that is exactly their priority, and it has been their priority throughout.

We shall be debating amendments that have come to this Chamber from another place. I am astonished that, if the issues are so serious, the Opposition actually want to spend time debating the timetable motion. I would have been quite happy to move the motion and take it on the nod so that we could get on to the substantive issues.

No one can now claim that the Bill has not had adequate time for debate. Despite the guillotine in this House, the time spent was over 200 hours. That was double the time spent on the 1963 London Government Bill, and nearly as much as on the 1972 Local Government Bill—almost twice the length of this Bill and covering the whole of England and Wales.

So it was also in another place. There was a long day's debate on Second reading, with a formidable list of speakers. There were 10 days of Committee stage discussion stretching late into the night on virtually every occasion. There were then six days on Report and a full day's debate on Third Reading—all in all, almost 120 hours of debate altogether in the other place. Lord Buckmaster calculated that that amounted to over a million words.

The principles of the Bill have been widely supported in both Houses of Parliament. The Bill received a Second Reading in this House by a majority of 135 and a Third Reading by a majority of 155. In another place the reasoned amendment moved on Second Reading was rejected by a majority of 126—a majority of more than two to one in the Government's favour. On some issues, notably the so-called "Voice for London" issue, the votes in another place came a trifle closer — that I shall concede—but always the proposal was rejected. I might remind the House that when that issue was debated on Report in this House the proposal was rejected by 335 votes to 193—a majority of 142.

The other place has returned the Bill to us with 98 amendments—far fewer than the 280 Lords amendments on the London Government Bill. Of these 98, 76 are straightforward and the Government will invite the House to accept them as they stand or with minor drafting changes. Worthy of note are the amendments which provide for a committee of councillors from the London boroughs to consider planning issues in place of the London Planning Commission originally proposed in the Bill, the amendment calling for a report on countryside matters, the amendment deleting the order-making power to break up the Inner London Education Authority, and the amendments providing for the continuity of a number of specialist services.

The two issues of substance on which the Government will invite the House to take a different view from their Lordships concern highways and road traffic and waste disposal.

There is plenty of time to debate those issues. Although I recognise that the Opposition and some of my hon. Friends want to add to or amend some of the Lords amendments, as far as I can see they all concern issues which have already been argued fully in this House and in another place at earlier stages of the Bill. Although it is perfectly right to return to those matters now, we consider that the proposed time is reasonable.

I understand that the Opposition will oppose the timetable motion. Are they really saying that the whole day, extending, as the motion provides, until midnight, is too little time to debate these issues fully? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] Opposition Members have had but one tactic throughout this legislation — to delay it just as long as they can. They failed to win the case on its merits. They had hoped to emasculate the Bill in another place, but they failed there too. It is now right and proper that we bring debate on the Bill to a conclusion and get on with the job. That is the purpose of this motion, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The Question is, The Local Government Bill allocation of time motion. Mr. Tony Banks.

3.47 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) wish to speak first?

Mr. Straw: Yes. I defer, as always, to the chairman of the Greater London council, but I hope that he will not mind, if, this time, I speak before him, with, of course, his permission.

My good and hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) is unavoidably absent today. Nothing would have given him greater pleasure than to be here to lead the fight.

We oppose the motion because it is constitutionally unacceptable that seven major debates on issues central to the operation of the Bill should be crammed into no more than six hours of debate today. For the Government to suggest that we should not have taken the one hour to discuss general principles is verging on the hypocritical because, had they thought that the principles were important enough to be discussed, they could have allowed more time.

The Bill would implement the Conservative party's manifesto commitment of June 1983, which said:

"The Metropolitan Councils and the Greater London Council have been shown to be a wasteful and unnecessary tier of government. We shall abolish them and return most of their functions to the boroughs and the districts."

The White Paper — the so-called "Streamlining the Cities" White Paper — tried to expand on those aims. We were told that the Bill would do three things: transfer most functions to the lower tier, remove an unnecessary tier of government and achieve major savings. The electorate was told before June 1983 that £120 million would be saved.

Another reason why we need much more time to debate the Bill is that, even if it is passed in its present form, it will be a failure when set against the aims which the Government have set for it. The Secretary of State said the Bill had not been emasculated. He has obviously not read or listened to what happened to the Bill in this House and in the other place. It does not transfer most functions to lower-tier authorities. Of 42 major functions currently operated by the GLC or the metropolitan counties, 32, that is 75 per cent., are to be transferred wholly or substantially to countywide bodies, including fire, police, almost certainly waste disposal, passenger transport, financial services and waste management. In case the Secretary of State has missed this, since the White Paper, thanks to the effectiveness of the opposition in this House and outside, 25 functions have been substantially altered to provide now for countywide control.

Secondly, this measure does not remove an unnecessary tier of government. Indeed, progress on the Bill has confirmed the unavoidable need for countywide services, but what the Bill has removed is democratically elected control of those countywide services. If anybody denies that, let the Secretary of State contradict the figures which show that in the Greater London area 60 per cent. of the spending will still be undertaken by countywide bodies. In the metropolitan areas, it will be 90 per cent. of spending.

Thirdly, this measure will not produce the savings which were so wildly claimed for it at the general election. That claim of £120 million is in today's prices worth £140 million. It was scaled down in the explanatory memorandum to the Bill when it was first published at the end of last November, and it is an issue on which Ministers are coy, to say the least. We have had a succession of Ministers from other Departments, such as the Minister of State, Department of Transport, saying, "Wherever that £100 million is coming from, it is not coming from passenger transport." The Minister of State, Home Office is saying, "Wherever that £100 million is coming from, it is not coming from the fire service or the police or from civil defence."

In the Secretary of State's speech, not a word was said about the great claim that this measure would save £120 million. The Public Accounts Committee will find him out after others have seen to his demise from his present high office. However much creative accounting it goes in for, the Public Accounts Committee will find that this measure will not save money, but will increase costs. The Coopers and Lybrand studies, which the Minister has never sought to contradict, show that for marginal recurrent savings there had to be set against one-off savings of between £272 million and £407 million.

Another reason why we need more time to debate this measure is that it will in no way streamline the cities, because in the place of seven great authorities there will be 62 quangos, joint boards and joint committees and five Government Departments with enhanced powers. Did any Conservative Members in supporting the manifestos in 1979 and 1983, take account of the fact that it would be a matter of voting for more quangos, more joint boards and more centralised control? That will be the result of the Bill.

The Bill has never been anything more than an unprincipled, spiteful and vindictive attack on seven great local authorities for no reason other than that they are Labour. Many Ministers, including the Minister of State, have had to eat their hats, and to eat their former words in support of the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

Will the Secretary of State seek the Prime Minister's approval to release the letter which the Prime Minister sent after the Marshall inquiry to Mr. Cutler when he was leader of the Greater London council? We have not heard of that letter before, I understand on the very best of authority that after the Marshall inquiry Mr. Cutler wrote to the Prime Minister who was then Leader of the Opposition, asking her whether she wanted a further statutory inquiry. As I understand it, the right hon. Lady replied that she did not wish for a further statutory inquiry into the GLC, but wished to see the GLC preserved and said that the GLC was

"the jewel in the crown of Conservative local government."

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that if his party were ever returned to government it would not bring back the GLC and the metropolitan counties in their present form? I emphasise "in their present form".

Mr. Straw: We should bring back a strategic authority for London in a better form. I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has today released a letter which contains a categorical assurance that we shall reinstate democratic and directly elected control of countrywide services in every area to which the Bill applies.

We should be grateful for the fact that in piloting the measure through the House the Secretary of State has greatly contributed to the decline in the Government's popular support. There is no doubt that the Government forced this measure into their manifesto because they thought that it would increase their popularity, but, thanks to the opposition in the House and outside, it is one of the main reasons why the Government suffered a humiliating defeat last week and why they will suffer further such humiliating defeats next May in the local elections.

[Mr. Straw]

The Secretary of State claims to have won a series of votes. We are aware of the supine nature of the Government's supporters. We are aware that we may lose votes today, but we fight to win. Whatever votes we may lose, the Labour party has overwhelmingly won the arguments about this mean and nasty Bill, which will result in worse services, staff uncertainty, administrative chaos and increased costs for ratepayers and taxpayers. Above all, the Bill reduces the rights of 13 million electors to have a proper say about the services which directly affect them.

We shall fight the measure now. We shall continue to fight it in the future. At the next election, we shall be pledged to its repeal. Not least because of that pledge to repeal, when we are elected to power in 1987, we shall make the repeal of this measure one of the next Labour Government's first acts.

3.56 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): During the debates on the Bill I have often found myself in agreement with the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), but not today. I strongly support the timetable motion, in general, because I believe that Bills should be timetabled—a good Bill should not need 170 hours of debate—but in particular, because the sooner we get rid of this unfortunate Bill, this embarrassment for the Government, the sooner it is out of the way, the sooner will most people forget it and the better therefore will be the future chance of a Conservative Government.

I am one of that band, which has been small up to now, of Conservative Members who consistently over the past year or two have done their best to persuade the Government to desist from flinging down banana skins upon which they then slip. Unfortunately, the failure of my powers of persuasion were demonstrated with painful clarity by last Thursday's events. In future, I shall have to try harder and, I hope, with more support from my hon. Friends.

I should not be arguing for a quick end to the debate if there were a snowball's chance in hell of the Government listening to what was said, but with a severe attack of political deafness and a majority as large as it is, mere words are useless. I should argue differently if the majority were a more normal 40 or 50. If it had been, I doubt whether we would ever have had the Bill. Even if we had, such a majority would have ensured that we could have knocked more sense into the Bill.

I had high hopes of the other place. It has improved the Bill, and my hopes were raised when I saw it reported that my noble Friend Lord Whitelaw was against it. With his great political experience, that was not the least surprising. Sadly, however, even he and his colleagues were mostly, with honourable and noble exceptions, in the end whipped into line. The sooner we are done with this Bill the better. But though it may be forgotten by the majority, its ill effect will live with all those who live in London and the metropolitan counties. In the metropolitan areas a mass of districts, mostly controlled by the Left of the Labour party, will replace a mere six Labour metropolitan councils. That is hardly a good Conservative recipe for administration.

In London, the powers of the GLC will be administered partly by the London boroughs, mostly controlled by Labour, partly by an elected ILEA, but sure always to be controlled by Labour, partly by a residuary body, which has the benefit of an excellent chairman, and partly, and increasingly in my judgment, by Whitehall, as will become steadily clearer. The change-over will be chaotic and the cost very high. That will hardly please the electorate, nor will it uphold the old classical Tory belief in the maximum distribution of power. I trust that a general election will come before the chaos becomes too obvious. All this is to satisfy a sudden and ill-thought-out whim. It is a strange world in which we live, but it is time that a little more common sense was introduced into it.

4 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) is clearly the voice of reason within the Conservative party. It is an echo that we have heard gathering strength throughout the passage of the Bill but it has still not convinced the Conservative Front Bench, particularly the person who inhabits No. 10 Downing Street. The hon. Gentleman has expressed fears that are clearly held by many reasonable Conservative Members.

The Government's guillotining of this latest stage of the Bill is entirely consistent with their tactics, which have been shoddy in the extreme throughout its passage through both Houses. We have been told that the Bill was conceived in haste and in malice by the Prime Minister. It has been nurtured on the lies propagated by the Daily Mail, The Sun, and the Daily Express and it has been dragooned through Parliament by a bunch of placemen prostituting what is left of their political principles. From that, I exonerate both the Secretary of State and the Minister for Local Government who clearly revealed that they had no political principles to start with.

We have been told by the Secretary of State that we have had many hours of debate on the Bill. Indeed, we have, but most of it has been sustained by the Opposition during the Committee stage. When we reach the later amendments we shall no doubt have a repeat of what we have seen before. The Conservative Benches will be completely denuded of Members, save the few miserable rejects on the Government Front Bench and some of their Parliamentary Private Secretaries who are forced to sit behind them and appear loyal. The rest will disappear because Tories are embarrassed by what their Government are doing.

The Government have used secrecy, deceit and plain dishonesty in their efforts to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Conservative Members are asleep.

Mr. Banks: I do not believe that they are asleep. I believe that it is a new thing called "political osmosis". They hope to get some sense through the green leather of the Benches on which their heads rest. There is no credible support for the Bill. Ninety amendments were made in another place and major principles were established and changed, yet we are to have only about six hours' debate.

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): I apologise for intervening in my hon. Friend's speech, but had the Secretary of State not been windy I would have said the same to him. Does my hon. Friend realise that those amendments were made at 11.30 pm last Wednesday in the other place, yet here we are on Monday, less than 48 sitting hours later, talking about those very amendments? Not only is the Bill being subjected to the guillotine, but it is being pushed through the House at the speed of light, which is a gross misuse of parliamentary privilege.

Mr. Banks: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend, but I believe that the hon. Member for Devizes got it right. The Government are severely embarrassed by the Bill. They want to try to rush it out as fast as they can. The hon. Member for Devizes was quite wrong to expect that, merely because the Bill is likely to be passed, somehow the electorate will forget about it. I remind him that the GLC and the metropolitan county councils will still exist until 31 March and no one believes that the GLC, of all bodies, will allow the London electorate to forget about this particular legislation.

I was on the point of reminding the House that "Streamlining the Cities" received about 5,000 responses, the overwhelming majority of which were implacably opposed to the Government's proposals. The Government cannot and have never been able to cite one independent, authoritative academic or professional body in support of abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. The Prime Minister's determination, which in certain respects, from a political point of view, can be considered to be admirable, has turned into sheer boneheadedness. She has permitted her judgment to be dominated by her political vindictiveness towards the GLC, and not one of the bunch of gutless ministerial non-entities who surround her has the courage to tell her the truth. She is taking her party towards political annihilation in London, and local government towards chaos throughout the country. There is overwhelming opposition to the Bill among the electorate as council by-elections and opinion polls clearly show.

The Tory party in London is now too frightened to fight elections. Of the four GLC by-elections called since May this year, the Tories have decided to fight only one, at Romford. That shows that no political principle can be involved. That by-election will be contested on Thursday and the Tories will lose it because of the Bill.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I can see why the Government are worried about elections and why they want to abolish the ballot box. Despite what goes out in the media, the Tories lost two of the safest seats in Sheffield in last Thursday's by-election. Are the Government to start abolishing district council elections as well?

Mr. Banks: I do not know whether they are about to abolish district council elections, but given their authoritarian nature it would not surprise me. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) is quite correct. The real impact of this Bill will be seen in the borough council elections in London and the district council elections in May 1986. From a Labour point of view, we expect to make a clean sweep throughout London. Westminster city council will go Labour in 1986 because of the Bill and the Government will be surrounded by their political enemies. Such thoughts comfort me at times like this.

Whatever happens to the Bill, there will be no comfort for the Government. They have never made anything other than the most generalised statements about their overall objectives. They have talked about massive savings as the reason for abolition, but those savings have never been quantified in any detail. The Government claim that £50 million a year will be saved by the abolition of the GLC, offset by £20 million in the first year because of transitional costs. We have never been given a breakdown of these figures despite repeated requests, and one or two parliamentary questions by myself.

Coopers and Lybrand estimate that the transitional costs resulting from abolition will total between £122 million and £167 million. Early-day motion 795, tabled in the names of a number of Conservative Members, draws the Government's attention to the estimate. I should like to know whether Ministers have asked their civil servants to look at the figures produced by Coopers and Lybrand to see whether they can fill any gaps in their woeful lack of information. The Government's £50 million a year estimate is considered by Coopers and Lybrand to be a substantial over-estimate because it takes no account of the increased costs of debt financing. These figures cannot be verified.

Policy changes, as Alan Greengross, the leader of the Conservative party at County hall has pointed out, could produce for the Government far more savings than they could ever get through abolition, but policy changes would mean that the Tory party would have to go out and win an election at the ballot box. That they have refused to do, and they have abolished the county level ballot box in London.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): The hon. Gentleman is concerned about depriving Londoners of the democratic right to vote, but will he explain how many seats will be contested next year in the borough elections? Is that not an opportunity for Londoners to exercise their democratic rights?

Mr. Banks: Yes, and Londoners will take it, and they will sweep the Tories out of London. However, we are talking about county level elections, which have effectively been abolished in London, but which will be maintained in the shire elections. I cannot see what principle the hon. Gentleman is trying to prove.

The Government have claimed that the GLC services will be transferred to the boroughs and a so-called unnecessary tier of local government will be removed. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has confirmed, it is not the GLC and the metropolitan council services that are to be abolished but rather democratic control over those who administer most of those services. He went on to show the number of functions that would be transferred wholly or substantially to countywide bodies.

Far from streamlining local government, Ministers are introducing proposals that will lead to about 195 successor bodies and authorities taking on GLC and metropolitan county council activities after abolition. If the Secretary of State believes that that is streamlining, it is clear that he would make an even worse job of design engineering than of local government.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Has the hon. Gentleman forgotten that four key metropolitan county councils, the Labour parties in those districts and the GLC leader in London have called for the abolition of these authorities, and that it has taken the Leader of the Opposition since April, when he was asked by the leader of the West Yorkshire county council whether he would restore the metropolitan county councils, to come up with a fudged compromise?

[Dr. Keith Hampson]

Mr. Banks: I have sat through every debate on this Bill, here and in Committee. I have heard our Front Bench clearly make statements that the GLC will be restored and that the next Labour Government will have to look at the whole structure of local government in the metropolitan areas. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that we are going to respond in the same knee-jerk way as the Prime Minister reacted when she read some of the bad publicity that the GLC was getting and said, "We will abolish it, off with its head", he does not understand the way that the Labour party works. We shall make sure that local government is put on a firm and sound footing, and that will involve us approaching the matter properly and democratically and not in the haphazard and undemocratic way of the Conservative party.

The electorate knows that this Bill is nonsense. It started off as a botched-up exercise in political vindictiveness and has now become the most absurd legislative proposal since the window tax. Everybody knows that the Bill will not work. We all know that it is nonsense, and yet it still limps towards the statute book. It does so simply because it is now all about the Prime Minister's face — the most expensive commodity in British politics today. That face sinks ships in the south Atlantic, wages war on trade unionists and the unemployed and undermines the economy. It is now set, against all reason, natural justice and the facts, to abolish the GLC and the MCCs.

The Bill is immoral and unworkable. It seeks to use parliamentary sovereignty to destroy an important part of local democracy and, by doing so, it brings both the law and the House into disrepute. In my first speech in this House I said that the abolition of the GLC would eventually destroy the Government. I see no reason to change that prediction. The coming Labour Government, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has made clear, will have to reorganise local government in London. At County hall, we are already working on a new, super and improved GLC, for the years to come. It will be larger and more powerful, and it will undoubtedly involve the abolition of the City of London. Perhaps, using some of the precedents established in the Bill, we shall abolish the City of London by Order in Council. We shall cite certain things that the Government have attempted to do with ILEA.

Politics is a funny business. It appears from the way that selections for parliamentary candidates in my party are going that half the current Labour group from County hall will be here to see the new, super, improved GLC being created, and I look forward to that.

In the meantime, abolition of the GLC will not end as an issue, even after the Royal Assent has been given. As chairman of the GLC, I give an unyielding promise to the Government that no political goodwill will be forthcoming from County hall between now and 31 March 1986. We shall do all that is necessary to protect jobs and services in London.

The Bill has become a spectacular embarrassment for the Government that even now most of them regret. It is no wonder that the Government wish to force the Bill through tonight by using the guillotine. The destruction of this particularly loathsome Government is all the consolation that I need if the GLC is to be abolished. The Bill will achieve that destruction.

4.16 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): We have just heard a turkey voting against Christmas.

One of the reassuring things about the Bill is that authoritarians in the Labour party say that it will lead to a reduction in democracy, but Mr. Ted Knight, the leader of Lambeth council, when he was defeated last week on a vote about rates, said that it did not make any difference and that he would continue his policies. He spat in the face of democracy, and that is what authoritarians in the Labour party always do.

One thing that the Bill will do——

Mr. Charles Morrison rose——

Mr. Marlow: I shall not give way.

One thing that the Bill will do — this is not its purpose, but a by-product of it — is to rid London of Ken Livingstone as leader of the GLC. That is ridding us of somebody who has done for local democracy what Josef Mengele has done for medicine—perverted his art with brutal and idiosyncratic practices—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Only one hon. Member should be on his feet at a time. Is the hon. Gentleman giving way?

Mr. Marlow: Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I shall give way later.

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the general guffawing that usually surrounds the speeches of the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), perhaps hon. Members missed the fact that he compared Ken Livingstone with the mass murderer of Jews in concentration camps. Is that not exceeding the normal bounds of decent debate?.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Every hon. Member must take responsibility for his speech.

Mr. Marlow: I have no intention whatever of withdrawing my remark, because of the way that I made it. We all know that Ken Livingstone is not a mass murderer, and that is not the point that I was making. I was making the point that he perverted the trust that was put in him in terms of local government, and he perverted that art through idiosyncratic and brutal experimentation against the people of London. Not only that, but he abused his trust by using vast amounts of ratepayers' money for publicity and propaganda that has fuelled the interests of the Labour party. This a disgrace, and the sooner the Widdicombe report comes out and does something about it the better.

Mr. Charles Morrison: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's remarks about Mr. Ted Knight, but how will the Bill improve the position if it is to give more power to Mr. Ted Knight?

Mr. Marlow: We shall have to see what happens to Mr. Ted Knight in the fullness of time and what the ballot box says about him. My hon. Friend will then see that true democracy works. My hon. Friend views the Bill in a different way from me. He is in a small minority in the Conservative party. The reason why I am making these points is that the vast majority of Conservative Members are whole-heartedly behind this measure. It brings democracy closer to the people and gives more control over what is happening to local people. That is why I support the motion.

4.20 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I can follow neither the extremism nor the bombast of the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). He is no doubt aggrieved that his rates in Lambeth are going down, and he will no doubt exercise his single ballot box vote there next year.

We have seven hours and twenty minutes in which to discuss the 98 amendments which were made by the other place. This is the exercise of the Government's use of the parliamentary chopper. Their first exercise of the chopper was to provide no debate within the Conservative party. They chopped any debate within the Cabinet. The Prime Minister decided to include this proposal in the general election manifesto. The second exercise of the electoral chopper was to chop any opportunity to hold a public inquiry and take expert evidence, as has always happened in the past when local government has been reformed. The Government have chopped any opportunity to listen to those who might know a little more about the working of local government than either the Secretary of State or his colleagues who have been given charge of the Bill.

The Government's third exercise of the parliamentary chopper was to chop the 1985 elections in London and in the six metropolitan counties of Britain. The Tories did not do all that well in the elections on their own ground, namely, the shire counties, let alone in the elections that might have taken place in the urban areas of Great Britain. Their fourth exercise of the parliamentary chopper was to chop the elected government of our capital city after a history that goes back 100 years. They have chopped regional government, municipal government and strategic government for the majority of citizens who live in the urban counties. Another exercise of the chopper is to guillotine this debate.

The history of the reaction to these proposals suggests that there is a bigger chop yet to come. The Government included this promise in their general election manifesto of 1983. Their vote went down. At the beginning of the general election campaign 44 per cent. of the population supported the Government, but three weeks later only 42 per cent. supported them. The shire county elections in England and Wales took place earlier this year. Throughout their history the Conservative party has been in control of the majority of the shire counties. It also controlled the Association of County Councils. The result of the Government's policies emanating from the Department of the Environment, their policies relating to local government and local government finance and their policy to make the people out there pay for what the Government are doing here means that they have lost control of the majority of shire counties in England. Their vote has gone down. For the first time ever they have lost control of the Association of County Councils.

What has happened when Members of Parliament have been elected? There have been a few by-elections since the Government first came to office. Only two seats have changed hands in by-elections. They were Tory seats. The Government had a majority of over 12,000 in Portsmouth, but they lost that by-election. That failure was also connected with their local government policies. In Brecon and Radnor the Government had a majority of over 8,000, but they lost that by-election, too. It will not have escaped the attention of the House that the Government lost those by-elections, not to the Labour party, but to the alliance. The message from the electorate of Brecon and Radnor and everywhere else is that because the Government do not respect local government, or local services, or the views of local people, they will be up for the chop at the end of this Parliament. That will be the result of the folly of their policies.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Can the hon. Gentleman explain why, since the Conservative party lost control of the Association of County Councils, it has managed to take the majority of the chairmanships, with the support of the Liberals?

Mr. Hughes: The reason is that the Labour party is incompetent at organising itself and the Association of County Councils is unused to holding the balance of power. It was only under pressure from the alliance that it nominated a member of the Labour party to chair the Burnham committee to look after education, because of the protests of the Labour party.

Mr. Roberts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way again?

Mr. Hughes: No, I shall not give way again. The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to make his speech.

The result of this policy is that, contrary to all their protests and to what was said by the Secretary of State's predecessor, who is now the Secretary of State for Education and Science, the Government are giving more power to the Secretary of State and his successors, to quangos and to nominated or indirectly elected bodies. They are all equally inappropriate and inadequate substitutes for local government. We have watched the flight of confidence as people have been driven from their jobs, not only in county hall, but in the metropolitan county councils.

Crucial matters are to be debated today. However, they reflect only bits of policy, because the Government's policy was formed on the run and has not been thought out properly. All those who served on the Committee know that the Government had no answer to the question about who supported their proposals. They did not even have an answer, for half of the time, about their proposals. The bits of the Bill which were amended by the other place deal with strategic planning — hardly something which the Government presume can be carried out by borough or district councils. Highways and traffic management do not stop at borough boundaries and suddenly become somebody else's responsibility at a handover point, as happens when one crosses the Channel. It is ludicrous that these matters are not to be dealt with by countywide authorities.

The Government had no policy on waste disposal when the Bill was previously considered in this House. Waste disposal may not be one of the most exciting parts of the Bill, but if waste disposal goes wrong it will be an important matter for those who are concerned about the environment and who will have to cope with waste and rubbish in their cities and urban areas.

As for the Government's education proposals, it has been said for decades that education in London is better looked after by a cross-borough authority. The Government, it is said, ought therefore to have left it alone. Instead, they are not allowing county education structures to remain in place. The details and the principles need to be considered fully, not in a rushed debate. That is what the guillotine will imply.

[Mr. Hughes]

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I take on board entirely and agree with the point made by the hon. Gentleman. His argument about waste disposal applies precisely to Merseyside, as it does to many of these other services. However, can the hon. Gentleman say what advice he would give to the electors of Liverpool, Mossley Hill? I understand that his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) has consistently supported the abolition of the metropolitan counties, against the interests of the people of Merseyside. Is not the only way to deal with the matter in Mossley Hill at the next general election to vote for the Labour candidate?

Mr. Hughes: I shall deal in a moment with that matter and all that goes with it, as well as with the statement this morning by the Leader of the Opposition. I repeat what the Government ought to bear in mind. At the beginning of the debate on the Bill the alliance made its view clear.—[Laughter.] It is no use the Labour party laughing, because it still does not have a clear policy.

Our position has been made clear for decades. London should again have—whatever the Government do—a regional authority. The rest of England should have regional authorities. The Labour party is still—it is entitled to take its time—sorting out whether it will replace county authorities with metropolitan authorities, whether it will have only district authorities, or whether it will have a combination of the two. However, we repeat what we said at the beginning, that the only satisfactory answer is to give London and the other areas proper regional government. Under that form of government regional functions such as transport, planning and waste disposal, which should have been provided many years ago, will be carried out.

Dr. Hampson: Can the House determine from that statement that the official view of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties is that the metropolitan counties should be abolished?

Mr. Hughes: We have always believed that the metropolitan counties should be replaced by regional government. We opposed the setting up of the metropolitan counties, and we have never liked them. [Interruption.] It will be done by regional government, with many of the powers which Whitehall and this Secretary of State and his successors will inherit. Perhaps the Government should have paid more heed to that message at the beginning.

I end with these two notes of warning to the Labour party and its policy makers and to the Government. They should notice that since 1982 the alliance, and not the Labour party, has done best in local elections in London —[HON. MEMBERS: "Not in London."] It is true. Labour Members may try to prove me wrong but they will not succeed. We have done better in London in local elections. We have been consistent in our policies and arguments on the issue. I hope that, one day, the Labour party will have a consistent approach and policy. Labour Members will not be the victims of what is primarily a Government folly. The Government intend passing powers to a residuary body. As a body, the Government were withering when the Bill was introduced. They will be the residuary body at the end of this exercise, and they will have only themselves to blame.

4.32 pm

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I wonder whether any hon. Member or any person outside who hears this debate will be able to consider this as a serious debate. I suspect that this is the type of debate that brings the House into some disrepute. There is no doubt that the people know full well that the Government, who were elected with an overwhelming majority in 1983, had a policy to abolish the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties. In June 1983 a poll conducted by National Opinion Polls clearly showed that the public had little idea what the GLC did and saw no reason why it might not just as well be abolished. In the general election which followed soon after that poll the Conservatives won 56 of the 84 London seats that were up for election. If that did not represent an overwhelming majority vote for the Conservative party's policies, I should like to know what did.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tracey: No doubt the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to speak in the debate.

Various politicians in the metropolitan counties have told us of their wish to abolish the metropolitan councils because they see no purpose in them. They believe that it is far better for democratic practices to be returned to the district councils, which have many more elected members representing a much smaller proportion of the population. The same applies in Greater London. I am sure that, once the people realise that their interests are represented by many more councillors, it will be an irrelevance to have a Greater London council.

Since the general election, £12 million has been spent by the GLC in an attempted brainwashing exercise. Almost £1 million has been spent by the metropolitan counties in doing the same thing. The latest intervention is a letter from the Leader of the Opposition which, we have been told, took him six months to write—no doubt, there was a lot of rewriting. We have been told that the Labour party is not committed to restoring the GLC and the metropolitan councils in their present form. This was confirmed by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), speaking from the Front Bench, in reply to my intervention. The Opposition are committed to restoring what they call a strategic, democratically elected voice. That is a very different thing.

Mr. Nellist: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tracey: The hon. Gentleman will have his opportunity to speak.

I ask the hon. Member for Blackburn and his Front Bench colleagues whether they believe that the district councils and the London borough councils are democratically elected bodies. If they are not, what are they? The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues know only too well that there are members of the Labour party in senior positions who share the view that the metropolitan councils and the GLC are superfluous and an irrelevance.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tracey: I shall give way to the chairman of the GLC.

Mr. Banks: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way to the right hon. chairman of the GLC. Will he reflect on this point? Of course the impending Labour Government will not bring back the GLC as currently established, because it has lost transport, housing, ambulance services and water and sewage services. It would be pointless bringing back the GLC as it is now. We want to bring it back with all those services added to it.

Mr. Tracey: I am sure that the House and the world outside will find it instructive to hear the right hon. chairman of the GLC make such a partisan statement. It is rather like you, Mr. Speaker, making a speech in a partisan way for, or against, the existence of the other place. I am sure that you would not do that——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do not bring me into it, please.

Mr. Tracey: Willingly, Sir.

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not the case that whoever sits in your seat would be expected to support the concept of an elected democracy?

Mr. Speaker: That is a difficult question. I do not give my reasons.

Mr. Tracey: If a great mind like yours, Mr. Speaker, will not answer that intervention, I certainly will not try.

I remind the Opposition, who are spending so much time arguing against the Government delivering their manifesto commitments, of two statements. On 23 September 1983 the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), writing in his local newspaper, the Sutton Coldfield News, stated:

"I do not intend to lift one legislative finger to stop the return of single tier government to Birmingham. That was the view of all the city councillors and it was clearly the view of all West Midlands MPs before the Election."

He was referring, of course, to the 1983 general election.

Then very recently, in April 1985, Mr. Ken Livingstone, the leader of the Greater London council, wrote to the chairmen of his committees:

"We have never defended the GLC status quo and have always argued for an extension and development of our powers."

I realise that from the Labour party there is indeed a view that it wishes to go further and that it wants, of course, to abolish the shire county councils, but what we are asking for is that the Government's commitment in the manifesto should be delivered now without further ado to the population, and there should be no further talk about this matter. We should proceed to legislate.

4.41 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I wish to make one brief point which I think goes to the kernel of the argument about the motion.

The kernel of the Bill is the removal from direct democracy of a whole range of powers which at present exist in the metropolitan counties and the Greater London council. If the House is to mean anything, it must be the watchdog of democracy against the dictatorship of the Executive. The Executive in the form of the Government are bringing forward the Bill to remove democracy from the hands of many of my constituents and many others throughout the country. It therefore behoves us——

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. SPEAKER put the Question pursuant to the order of the House of 11 February.

The House divided: Ayes 285, Noes 166.

Division No. 255] [4.41 pm

AYES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Rt Hon Sir Frederic
Benyon, William
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Dover, Den
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Forman, Nigel
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gorst, John
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Joseph, Rt Hon Sir Keith
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lamont, Norman

Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luce, Richard
McCrindle, Robert
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marlow, Antony
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morrison, Hon C. (Devizes)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Portillo, Michael
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Prior, Rt Hon James
Proctor, K. Harvey
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speed, Keith
Speller, Tony
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thurnham, Peter
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Walters, Dennis
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Carol Mather and
Mr. Robert Boscawen.

NOES

Alton, David
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Tony
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Bruce, Malcolm
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hamilton, W. W. (Central Fife)
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
John, Brynmor
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Lambie, David
Lamond, James
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
Maclennan, Robert
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
Owen, Rt Hon Dr David
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Rowlands, Ted
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Mrs R. (W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C. (Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steel, Rt Hon David
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wainwright, R.
Wallace, James
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
White, James
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Wilson, Gordon
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Wrigglesworth, Ian

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Allen McKay and
Mr. Frank Haynes.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Order of the House [11th February] be supplemented as follows:—

LORDS AMENDMENTS

1. — (1) The proceedings on Consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting. Those Amendments shall be taken in the order shown in the Table set out below, and, subject to the provisions of the Order of 11th February, each part of those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in the second column of that Table.

TABLE

Lords Amendments	Time for conclusion
Nos. 1 to 3	6.00 p.m.
Nos. 4 to 8	7.45 p.m.
Nos. 9 to 12	8.45 p.m.
Nos. 13 to 42	9.15 p.m.
Nos. 43 to 47	10.00 p.m.
Nos. 48, 92 to 94, 49 to 91 and 95 to 98	Midnight

(2) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings for two hours after Ten o'clock.

2.—(1) For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above:—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the amendment of a Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment of the said Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion moved by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment, or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment, as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege, and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment, or, as the case may be, in their Amendment as amended;

(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;

(iii) put forthwith with respect to each Amendment designated by Mr. Speaker which has not been disposed of, the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Amendment; and

(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

Stages subsequent to first Consideration of Lords Amendments

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of the proceedings.

4. For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining items in the Lords Message as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;

(ii) in the case of each remaining item designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their Proposal; and

(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplemental

5. — (1) In this paragraph 'the proceedings' means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of the Message or, as the case may be, for the appointment and quorum of the Committee.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which they are appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

Orders of the Day

Local Government Bill

Lords Amendments considered.

Clause 4

DEVELOPMENT PLANS

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 3, line 11, leave out subsection (2).

4.53 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may take the following amendments thereto, (a) in page 3, line 12, leave out from 'establishment' to end of line 15 and insert

'in each metropolitan county of an authority to be known by the name of that county with the addition of the word "Authority", and the functions of those authorities in respect of planning matters'.

(b), in line 12, leave out from 'London' to end of line 15 and insert

'Authority, and the functions of the London Authority in respect of planning matters'.

Lords amendment No. 2, after clause 4, insert the following new clause—

Joint planning committee for Greater London

" .—(1) The local planning authorities in Greater London shall not later than the abolition date establish a joint committee to discharge the functions mentioned in subsection (2) below.

(2) The joint committee shall—

(a) consider and advise those authorities on matters of common interest relating to the planning and development of Greater London;

(b) inform the Secretary of State of the views of those authorities concerning such matters including any such matters as to which he has requested their advice;

(c) inform the local planning authorities for areas in the vicinity of Greater London, or any body on which those authorities and the local planning authorities in Greater London are represented, of the views of the local planning authorities in Greater London concerning any matters of common interest relating to the planning and development of Greater London and those areas; and the committee may, if it thinks fit, contribute towards the expenses of any such body as is mentioned in paragraph (c) above.

(3) The expenses of the joint committee which have been incurred with the approval of at least two-thirds of the local planning authorities in Greater London shall be defrayed by those authorities in such proportions as they may decide or, in default of a decision by them, as the Secretary of State may determine.

(4) In this section references to the local planning authorities in Greater London are to the authorities which are the local planning authorities in Greater London for the purposes of Part II of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 or section 4 above.".

Amendments thereto:

(a), in line 4, at end insert

'and the local planning authorities which the councils of districts (in this section referred to as "district planning authorities") in each metropolitan county shall not later than that date establish a joint committee to discharge those functions.'.

(b), in line 8, at end insert 'or that county'.

(c), in line 12, after '(c)' insert

'in the case of Greater London'.

(d), in line 18, at end insert—

'(d) in the case of a metropolitan county inform the local planning authorities for areas in the vicinity of the county or any body on which those authorities and the district planning authorities in the county are represented of the views of the district planning authorities in the county concerning any matters of common interest relating to the planning and development of the county and those areas;'.

(e), in line 18, at end insert—

'(d) issue guidance to local planning authorities in Greater London for the purposes of paragraph 2(4)(a) of Schedule 1 to this Act.'.

(f), in line 19, leave out 'paragraph (c) above' and insert 'pagagraph (c) or (d) above, as the case may be'.

(g), in line 22, after 'Greater London', insert

'or of the district planning authorities in a metropolitan county'.

(h), in line 30, at end insert

'and references to district planning authorities are to the authorities which are local planning authorities for metropolitan districts for the purposes of that Part of that Act or section 4 above.'.

(i), in page 75, line 27, leave out 'Secretary of State', and insert

'joint committee established by section (Joint Planning Committee for Greater London) of this Act'.

Lords amendment No. 4, before clause 7, insert the following new clause—

Highway and Road Traffic functions

' . The Secretary of State shall by order taking effect on the abolition date make provision for the London Residuary Body to exercise the following functions relating to highways and road traffic in London to the extent and in the manner that such order shall provide—

(a) that the Body shall have a duty to prepare, in consultation with the borough councils, plans relating to highways and traffic in Greater London and the Body and borough councils shall have regard to such plans when exercising their stationary functions;

(b) that it shall be a duty of the Body to establish and maintain an organisation for the purpose of assembling, disseminating and keeping up to date, information on road traffic and other transport in Greater London and that the Body may commission such research and carry out such surveys as they think fit in fulfilment of this duty;

(c) That the Body shall have the functions of the highway authority under the Highways Act 1980 in relation to metropolitan roads;

(d) that not later than 1st April 1987 the Body shall, in consultation with the borough councils review the existing network of metropolitan roads and prepare and submit to the Secretary of State for his approval proposals for the revision of that network;

(e) that, as respects metropolitan roads, the Road Traffic Regualtion Act 1984 shall apply to the Body (for the purposes of traffic management and parking control) as they now apply to the Greater London Council;

(f) that the Body shall be a local authority for the purposes of section 38 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 (power of local authorities as to giving of road safety information and training);

(g) that the Body shall be authorised, for the purpose of regulating traffic on metropolitan roads, to exercise the powers of a borough council under the said Act of 1984 as respects roads communicating with or adjacent to metropolitan roads in accordance with procedures to be prescribed by the Secretary of State;

(h) that, for the purposes of ensuring that the exercise by the London borough council of their powers under the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 does not have any adverse effect on traffic on roads for which they are not the highway authority, the Body shall be given reserve powers similar to those given to the Secretary of State in Part 1 of Schedule 9 of the said Act;

(i) that the Body may exercise the powers of a London borough council or the Common Council under sections 6 and 9 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 for the purposes of prohibiting or restricting such use of heavy commercial vehicles as the Body considers expedient for preserving or improving the amenities of Greater London or some part or parts thereof;

(j) that the Body shall have a duty to control, manage, maintain and, where appropriate, develop and extend the system of urban traffic control through traffic light signals established by the Greater London Council;

(k) that the Body shall be a "London Authority" within the meaning of section 50 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984 (travel concessions on journeys in or around Greater London);

(l) that the Body shall be able to assist, by way of grant or loan, the provision of transport services by a voluntary organisation for the benefit of the public or any class of persons."

Amendment thereto, (a) in line 2, leave out 'Residuary Body' and insert 'Authority'.

Lords amendment No. 5, before clause 7,

Insert the following new clause—

Strategic Highways Functions in Metropolitan Counties.

" . The Secretary of State shall by order taking effect on the abolition date make provision for the authority established by section 27 of this Act for each metropolitan county to exercise the following functions relating to highways and road traffic in that county to the extent and in the manner that such order shall provide—

(a) then in functions of the highway authority under the Highways Act 1980 in relation to principal roads within the county;

(b) the functions of a county council and a highway authority for the purpose of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 in relation to principal roads within the county;

(c) issuing guidance as to the manner in which in relation to non principal roads the councils of metropolitan districts should exercise their powers under the 1984 Act, for the purpose of ensuring that the exercise by such councils of those traffic powers in relation to non principal roads does not have an adverse effect on traffic or any class of traffic using principal roads within the county or any traffic or class of traffic in any area other than the area of the district council, as the case may be;

(d) the functions relating to the construction and maintenance of bridges within the county which on that date are the responsibility of the highway authority;

(e) the functions contained in the Road Traffic Acts 1972 and 1974 in so far as the same relate to road safety within the county; and

(f) the collection, examination, analysis and dissemination of data required for the discharge of those functions."

Amendment thereto, (a), in line 3, leave out 'the authority established by section 27 of this Act for each metropolitan county'

and insert

'each metropolitan county authority established by Part II of Schedule I to this Act'.

Amendment No. 9*(a)* in clause 8, page 4, line 31, leave out 'London borough councils and the Common Council' and insert 'the London Authority'.

Amendment No. 9*(b)*, in line 33, leave out 'Metropolitan district Councils' and insert 'Metropolitan county authorities established by Part II of Schedule I to this Act'.

Lords amendment No. 48, in clause 55 page 38, line 38, at end insert—

"(4) As soon as may be after the establishment of a joint committee under section 93 below for Greater London or a metropolitan county the Secretary of State shall, after consultation with that committee, appoint one of its members to be a member of the appropriate residuary body."

Amendments thereto, (c), in line 38, at end insert—

'(4) The members of the London Residuary Body appointed under subsection (3) shall be such members of the London Authority as are nominated by that Authority to the Secretary of State for that purpose.'.

(d) in line 38, at end insert—

'(4) The members of each residuary body appointed under subsection (3) above shall be such members of the Metropolitan County Authority established by Part II of Schedule I to this Act in the area of the appropriate residuary body as are nominated by that authority to the Secretary of State for that purpose.'.

Lords amendment No. 55, after clause 85—

Insert the following new clause—

Research and collection of information

" .—(1) A scheme may be made for Greater London or a metropolitan county by the constituent councils whereby one of those councils designated by the scheme has the function of—

(a) carrying out, or assisting in carrying out, investigations into, and the collection of informtion relating to, any matters concerning that area or any part of it; and

(b) making, or assisting in making, arrangements whereby any such information and the results of any such investigation are made available to any other local authority in that area, any government department or the public.

(2) Any such scheme shall require the other constituent councils to contribute as provided by subsection (3) below to the expenditure incurred by the designated council in carrying out its functions under the scheme.

(3) The constituent councils shall be required to contribute to any expenditure of the designated council which has been incurred with the approval of at least two-thirds of the constituent councils; and the amounts of the contributions shall be determined so that the expenditure in respect of which they are payable is borne by the constituent councils in proportion to the populations of their respective areas.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3) above the population of any area shall be taken to be the number estimated by the Registrar General and certified by him to the Secretary of State by reference to such date as the Secretary of State may from time to time determine.

(5) A scheme may provide that, if two-thirds of the constituent councils so decide, the designated council may require all or any of the constituent councils other than the designated council to carry out in respect of their respective areas an investigation into, or the collection of information relating to, any specified matter concerning the area covered by the scheme or any part of it; and where such a requirement is imposed on a council—

(a) that council shall comply with the requirement in such manner and within such time as may be specified in the requirement; and

(b) if that council fails to comply with the requirement the designated council may itself do what was required and recover the cost of doing it from that council.

(6) The expenditure which is to be borne as mentioned in subsection (3) above shall not include—

(a) any expenditure of the designated council which is recoverable by virtue of paragraph (b) of subsection (5) above; or

(b) if a requirement is imposed by virtue of that subsection on all the constituent councils other than the designated council, any expenditure incurred by that council in doing in respect of its own area what it has required the other councils to do in respect of their areas.

(7) Any information collected by the designated council, and the results of any investigation carried out by it, in the exercise of its functions under the scheme shall be made available, on request, to each of the other constituent councils.

(8) A scheme shall not come into force before the abolition date but shall continue in force until the end of at least two financial years after that in which it is made.

(9) A scheme may, in the absence of agreement between all the constituent councils, be made by a majority of those councils so as to be binding on all of them; but a council shall not be designated by a scheme except with its consent.

(10) A scheme may contain such supplementary provisions as the councils making the scheme think necessary or expedient and, subject to subsection (8) above, may be revoked by those councils (or, in the absence of agreement between all of them, by a majority of those councils) with effect from the end of any financial year after that in which the decision to revoke the scheme is made.

(11) The council designated by a scheme may be giving not less than twelve months notice to the other constituent councils withdraw its consent to act as the designated council with effect from the end of any financial year not earlier than the second financial year after that in which the scheme was made; and in that event the scheme shall terminate when the withdrawal takes effect.

[Mr. Speaker]

(12) For the purposes of this section the constituent councils are—

(a) in relation to Greater London, the London borough councils and the Common Council; and

(b) in relation to a metropolitan county, the councils of the metropolitan districts comprised in the county.

(13) Whether or not a scheme is made under this section a London borough council, the Common Council and a metropolitan district council shall have the power to exercise any of the functions described in subsection (1)(a) and (b) above.

(14) The appropriate Minister with respect to any matter may require any such council as is mentioned in subsection (13) above to provide him with any information with respect to that matter which is in the possession of, or available to, that council in consequence of the exercise of any powers conferred by or under any enactment."

Amendments thereto:

(a) in line 1, leave out from beginning to end of line 4 and insert

'It shall be the function of each Metropolitan authority established by Part II of Schedule 1 to this Act to make arrangements for—'.

(b) in line 11, at end insert

'in the area of the Metropolitan authority'.

(c) in line 1, leave out from beginning to end of line 3 and insert

'It shall be the function of the London Authority to make arrangements for—'.

(d) in line 11, leave out subsections (2) to (14).

Lords amendment No. 61, in schedule 1, page 86, line 38, leave out paragraph 18.

Amendments thereto:

(a) in page 86, line 38, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

(b) in line 38, leave out

'at any time after the passing of the Act'

and insert 'on the abolition date'.

(c) in line 39, after 'body', insert 'in each metropolitan county'.

(d) in line 39, leave out from 'known' to 'guidance' in line 40 and insert

'by the name of that metropolitan county with the addition of the word "Authority" to prepare.'.

(e) in line 40, leave out

'Planning Commission to assist him in preparing' and insert 'Authority to prepare'.

(f) in line 41, leave out 'Greater London' and insert 'the relevant metropolitan county'.

(g) in line 42, leave out 'him' and insert 'the Secretary of State'.

(h) in line 43, leave out

'for the appointment and terms of office of members of the commission'

and insert

'for the members of each metropolitan county authority to be elected by the local government electors of the relevant metropolitan county in accordance with this Act and the Representation of the People Act 1983'.

(i) in line 45, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

(j) in line 46, leave out

'for the appointment and terms of office of members of the Commission'

and insert

'for the members of the London Authority to be elected by the local government electors of Greater London in accordance with this Act and the Representation of the People Act 1983;'.

(k) in page 87, line 1, leave out 'the commission' and insert 'each authority'.

(l) in line 1, leave out 'Commission' and insert 'Authority'.

(m) in line 4, leave out 'the commission' and insert 'each authority'.

(n) in line 4, leave out 'Commission' and insert 'Authority'.

(o) in page 87, leave out lines 5 and 6.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With all due respect to you, Mr. Speaker, and acknowledging that London is a marvellous place, of the eight speakers called during the debate on the guillotine motion, including a Minister and a Front Bench Opposition spokesman, five were London Members and not one Member was called from a constituency which is part of a metropolitan county. With respect, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to acknowledge that millions live in the metropolitan counties that are affected by the Bill.

Mr. Speaker: I am well aware of that. Unfortunately, there was only an hour's debate on the guillotine motion.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I shall describe briefly the four broad effects of the Opposition amendments to the main Lords amendments. First, they build on the concession which was forced on the Government in another place on Third Reading that there should be a joint planning committee for London. In the Opposition view, the concession did not go far enough. We believe that there should be a strategic body to advise on the planning of London.

The Government amendment, which was considered in another place, was and is hopelessly inadequate in its powers and authority. It lacks any kind of democratic accountability. The first purpose of the amendments is thus to build on the small concession that was made by the Government and to make the joint planning committee for London, and the committees that we hope to establish in the metropolitan counties, more effective.

The second purpose of our amendments is to establish an overall joint planning committee for all the metropolitan counties. We do not accept that there should merely be a planning committee or authority for Greater London. The shire counties represent smaller populations than are represented in the metropolitan counties and there is no reason why they should have an overall planning authority while the conurbations, which now form part of the metropolitan counties, have no such authority. We wish to establish a joint planning authority for each of the metropolitan counties to take further the Government's inadequate concession in accepting that there should be a planning authority for London. It is almost inconceivable to reject the advice of every responsible planning commentator that the great megalopolis should be treated as if it did not exist for planning purposes.

The third purpose of the amendments is to invest each county-wide planning authority—we want to see one for every metropolitan county — with a power to give strategic guidance that must be taken into account when plans are drawn up for the counties. We want these planning authorities to be able to go much further than merely giving guidance or advice. It is no use having a joint planning committee, whether for London or for all the metropolitan counties, if it is a toothless talking shop. The Government's concession in another place would merely set up such a body.

Fourthly, and perhaps most importantly, the purpose of the amendments is to create an elected authority for the Greater London council and for every metropolitan county to deal with the functions that we intend will remain on a county-wide basis. We want a democratically elected authority to continue as an interim measure to deal with planning, which is the main subject of the first two Lords amendments, highways, which remain a county function as a result of concessions elsewhere, traffic, waste disposal and research. We want also democratic accountability for the residuary body, which is assuming so many powers and functions to London. In other words, we want to put some democracy back into local government and the tangled web of functions that will remain after the Bill passes into law.

In short, we are looking for more consistency in planning and more authority for joint planning committees for the counties. We want to allow the people to choose, by the democratic process, how their county functions are discharged. Ostensibly the Bill was about transferring power to the boroughs and districts but in reality that was not its purpose. It was designed to destroy seven powerful elected councils that had the inconvenience for the Government of being controlled predominantly by the Labour party. The real background to the Bill involves malice and the abuse of power, and the destruction of local government because it lay largely in the hands of the Labour party.

5 pm

Perhaps one should describe the Government's proposition as simple minded. On the face of it, the cities could be streamlined, but the Government's proposition means that Greater London will not really be Greater London at all. One can ignore it and treat it as 32 separate boroughs. One can ignore the conurbation implications of Merseyside, Manchester, the midlands, and so forth. On face value, that idea of streamlining is daft. I have authority for saying that the proposition is not workable. I quote:

> "It will be generally agreed that Greater London, an area of some 610 square miles containing seven million people, must continue to be more than an agglomeration of 32 boroughs with different degrees of urban disease".

Those are not my words, but the words of the Minister for Local Government when he wrote about being a Londoner in 1977.

The idea of streamlining the cities has turned out not merely to be daft—most commentators agreed at the beginning that it was daft—but to be impossible. The Bill is a great legislative lie. It does not deprive the counties of all the countrywide functions, it does not streamline the cities, it does not transfer many functions to the boroughs or the districts, and it does not give the districts and the boroughs the powers that the Government originally intended to transfer. The Bill defrauds people of their vote.

One can sum up the Bill as it comes towards the end of its passage by saying that it does not streamline, it makes more complicated; it does not save money, it spends more; and it does not transfer powers and functions substantially to the boroughs or the districts. Above all, the Bill destroys an element of local democracy, and by doing so it adds chaos to the functions that remain countywide. It bears as much resemblance to streamlining as a Heath Robinson conveyance bears to Concorde. Carrying that analogy further, the only thing that it borrows from Concorde is the cost. The original conception of abolition has not come about.

The result of the Bill is the creation of 62 quangos consisting of joint boards, joint committees, a London planning committee, authorities for waste disposal, traffic and so on. The 62 quangos are part of the Government's plan to streamline the cities. It invests five Government Departments with quasi local government functions. It quite properly preserves the Inner London Education Authority as an elected body for all time and it gives to 127 boroughs, districts and shire councils functions relating to the government of part of the metropolitan counties.

In London, the lie behind the Bill is illustrated because 60 per cent. of the GLC's expenditure will continue to exist as a countywide function. During the passage of the Bill in another place, 25 new county functions were devised for the counties as a whole instead of being transferred to the boroughs and districts. Incredibly, out of 80,000 staff working for the GLC, 71,000 will continue to work in services that will run countywide after the passage of the Bill. That underlines the lie.

After the passage of the Bill a large number of people will be working for London and money will be spent on London and the other metropolitan counties, but the main difference between the government of London now and after the passage of the Bill is that there will be no democratic accountability. What will emerge is a sham that is even more costly than the original—a municipal Byzantium, which, as was the case with Byzantium, has no democracy.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman quoted figures of employees of the GLC and went on to say that there will be no democratic representation. Will he confirm that the figures included the entire work force and staff of ILEA? Under the Bill, the members of ILEA will be democratically elected. Therefore, the hon Gentleman is talking nonsense.

Mr. Fraser: I concede that the right hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that those who work for the ILEA will be controlled by a directly elected body. Why does the same principle not apply to every other county function that is being preserved as a result of the amendments made largely in another place under pressure from the Opposition? What is good for the ILEA and for countrywide local government at the moment should obtain in the future. Government supporters have the chance to vote for Opposition amendments, which would enable that democratic structure to be preserved. Otherwise, we shall simply have a distortion of local democracy. The main burden of our amendments is to give a democratic accountability to those functions which will continue not on a district or a borough basis, but on a countywide basis.

The second main purpose of the amendments is to recognise the reality of planning our conurbations, and to give each metropolitan county a joint planning commission, which would be elected. One cannot plan a road system from one borough to another. One has to deal with land use on a conurbation basis. A magnificent change has taken place in the nature of south London as a result of the GLC financing over many years on a countywide basis, for example, with the creation of

[Mr. Fraser]

Burgess park. Much of south London was too densely populated and people were living with no green around them at all.

It is impossible to have such a planning function simply on a borough basis. On such a basis, it is impossible to plan the skyline around our cities, planning that is very important both in London and parts of Yorkshire, where, without adequate planning, it is possible to destroy the skyline.

The argument for planning our conurbations on a conurbationwide basis is made out in the Government's proposals on inner cities. The Government do not treat inner city policy as a subject merely for one borough or another. They recently set up, with a flourish from the Prime Minister, an organisation called City Action Teams, or CATs for short. As the Association of Metropolitan Authorities observed, what the country needs is not cats, but mice—more inner city expenditure.

At any rate, when looking at the problems of the inner city, the Government did not choose to do so from borough to borough or district to district. They took a strategic overall view, and said that Government Departments and local authorities must come together to take a strategic view of the inner city. The inner city should be planned in that way. As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, we shall repeal the Bill at the earliest opportunity. The further the Bill gets in its passage, the nearer the opportunity will come for a Labour Government to undertake that task.

In the meantime, the amendments amount to no more than interim measures. They at least restore to planning some democratic accountability and sense. For that reason alone, I ask hon. Members on both sides of the House to support our amendments.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I wish to speak to amendment (b)

"to the words so restored to the Bill":—

Page 3, line 12, leave out from 'London' to end of line 15 and insert

'Authority, and the functions of the London Authority in respect of planning matters'.

The Government made some concessions in the other place to various aspects of the Bill, but from the point of view of those in all parties who have opposed the Bill all the way through, and regarded it as a sad piece of legislation, to say the least, that has not been sufficient to repair the damage that is contained in many parts of the Bill. In the other place the Government lost some crucial amendments on significant occasions, but it was not enough to persuade them to depart from the central and still extremely unwelcome aspects of the Bill's structure.

Amendment (b) deals only with aspects to do with London, but later amendments incorporate the metropolitan counties. At this late stage it is worth remembering that my hon. Friends and colleagues in all parts of the House still have an opportunity to do some useful repair work to the Bill's structure. The confusion and chaos in the original text has to some extent been made worse by the Government's concessions in an attempt to achieve a more rational structure. Despite their Lordships' interesting and heroic efforts—I pay particular tribute to Lord Plummer for his amendments — the position is more difficult than previously.

With this amendment my colleagues and I suggest a significant adjustment to help the Government produce a much better structure. We do not seek to push them too far, or oblige them to depart from their original manifesto commitment, which is adhered to in the Bill. In some respects our arguments, fortuitously and felicitously, coincide with those of the Opposition Front Bench, but they are significantly and interestingly different. The substantial effect of the amendment is to put London's strategic planning, highways and traffic control, waste disposal and the important but often forgotten citywide research services into one directly elected London authority.

Thus, we return to the theme of the body being directly elected. The body is not to be compared in any way with the existing Greater London council. It has no relationship to it and is wholly different. It would be a small body, which would meet the Government's objectives of saving costs, and would have the opposite effect to the present one. The Coopers and Lybrand report shows beyond all doubt that the whole exercise will cost a one-off £170 million. That may be the top end of its range of estimates of the extra cost.

The amendment would transform the residuary body — which was supposed to be a marginal tidying-up body, but which has acquired more and more functions, which the Government's planners could not put elsewhere, as the text became more problematic — into a London authority. The amendment would also provide, together with related later amendments, that the London authority should nominate members of the London residuary body, instead of the Secretary of State.

In the other place successful amendments transferred parts of highways and traffic to the London residuary body. As has already been said, the boroughs end up with only a small minority of the total activities and expenditure in gross terms, contrary to the original intentions of both the manifesto and the Secretary of State. Although my hon. Friends and I believe that the decentralisation proposed for the boroughs in the change for the residuary body is right, it is not appropriate to move the remaining overall Londonwide highways and traffic functions to a temporary nominated quango, such as the London residuary body or a joint board.

The amendment is valuable in that it deals with direct elections, and immediately and specifically makes possible the co-ordination of those four important citywide services—planning, highways and traffic control, waste disposal and the research unit — into one London authority. Obviously, we want the authority to be directly elected because its powers and expenditure will be substantial, and it should be accountable to the ratepayers who will have to pay for its functions. We in this House and the other place will anyway have to return to the question of direct elections in separate legislation in due course.

As the Secretary of State has often reminded us, the Conservative party election manifesto promised to abolish the GLC on the grounds that it was a wasteful body and an unnecessary tier of government. Those arguments have been rendered otiose by the passage of the Bill and the detailed examination of all the arguments for and against it. We shall be left with a yawning gap and major lacuna in London local government, unless this admittedly late-in-the-day adjustment is made.

At the end of the Bill's passage — the Government will no doubt have a chance to refer to this later—there is little talk in official circles about saving large sums through abolition. All the evidence suggests that Londoners will face heavy one-off bills, and annually recurring bills for these regrettable changes. I do not exaggerate when I say that this is a tragic piece of legislation in every respect.

5.15 pm

The Londonwide tier of government will remain in a structural sense because the GLC's services have been distributed among various quangos, joint boards and joint committees, most of which will be under close ministerial supervision. Instead of the long-standing and solemn tradition of democratic co-ordinated government for London under whatever political control — elections come and go, to give all parties a chance—we have a muddle and a plethora of different bodies, which confuse everyone, including the Department, and none of which is directly elected. The boroughs will get about one third of the GLC's services in terms of gross revenue expenditure, excluding debt charges, according to the latest calculations, as opposed to most of the expenditure and functions, which was promised as the central rationale of the legislation when it began its unhappy passage.

One of the worst features of the new scheme for London government is that the entire operation seems to be confused, botched-up and temporary. In a few years' time Parliament will have to return to the subject, and do a major repair job. All parliamentarians must find it tragic to think of all the hours that have been wasted on the legislation. I, therefore, ask the House, especially the Secretary of State, even at this late stage to rise to the occasion, to retrieve something secure from this confusion and chaos, to put the essential services together in one authority rather than into the proposed body, and to make it directly elected and wholly separate and different from the existing GLC, with none of the Left-wing hang ups that have rightly irritated Conservative Members. In that way, we would once again have sensible local government in London.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I hope that the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) will forgive me if I do not follow his comments in detail. He spoke largely about London, whereas my interest lies in south Yorkshire. So far London and the Greater London council have attracted most attention in this debate. The hon. Gentleman suggested that their Lordships have made some minor improvements, and that may be the case. Some noble Lords who may normally be solid supporters of the Conservative party put the country's interest before those of their party in a way which I should like hon. Members in this House to do. The hon. Gentleman may be rather relaxed about the matter because he foresees further legislation in a few years' time. Our worry is that hon. Members from south Yorkshire do not have the time or the opportunity for a leisurely view. The economy of south Yorkshire is appalling and is deteriorating day by day. We are losing more than 200 jobs a week. This is not the time for the Government to plunge the area into the costly chaos that is bound to develop.

Conservative Members know that south Yorkshire metropolitan county has a vigorous, thriving and growing public transport system based on low fares. What has escaped their attention is the fact that ridership has increased. The Government dislike the system and, for no other reason, they have adopted an attitude of hatred towards the county council, and cheer its departure because they want to privatise bus services, which in our area are first class.

I am especially interested in participating in the debate because of the other aspects of the South Yorkshire county council that deserve consideration. It has a high reputation for its environmental work. It commands respect for its intelligent approach towards strategic planning responsibilities, which are now to be changed at a time when the economic condition is critical.

The Minister does not have responsibility for steel and coal, but if he had he would turn grey at what is happening to our special steels industry. The week before last, we heard of the decision to close the British Steel Corporation's relatively new works at Tinsley Park, which he may have visited when he was at the Department of Trade and Industry. Last week, the River Don works, Britain's only large heavy forging and casting capacity, lost 500 or 600 jobs. In the coal industry, 4,000 or 5,000 jobs have been lost within a matter of months. This has happened while the Government are destroying our strategic planning capacity. Within the planning operation and generally, the county council has developed a splendid, internationally commended reputation in environmental protection. That is well known. If the Secretary of State cares to check, he will see that I am making no false or extravagant claims. The county council has done enormous work in recognising and conserving the ecology of our county. It has achieved much in the reclamation of derelict land. The Minister may be aware, despite the contraction of our coal industry, that there is a continuing problem of colliery spoil. There is a continuing and growing need to maintain the current work of the county council in land reclamation. I fear that the measure and the Government's attitude to the modest amendments carried in the other place will be of enormous disadvantage to the county.

I hope that the Secretary of State will not feel that I am being unfair, but the other day I heard him telling a substantial and important gathering how deeply committed the Conservative party was to conservation. He claimed that it is the party concerned with conservation in Britain. I am well aware of what the Conservative party is disposed to conserve.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Themselves.

Mr. Hardy: The Secretary of State made substantial claims on Saturday. However, I am patron of the Yorkshire Wildlife Trust. There may be other hon. Members from my region who subscribe to the organisation. It is a long-established and reputable body.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West) indicated assent.

Mr. Hardy: I am glad to have the confirmation of the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson). The West Yorkshire and South Yorkshire metropolitan county councils are the two most important financial supporters of the trust. If they disappear, the income they provide for the trust, which performs an important function in the county, will be imperilled. It is all right for the Minister to say that the quangos or the borough councils that will inherit the responsibility will be able to offer the same support, but hon. Members from Yorkshire, and perhaps other hon. Members, will be aware that, under the rate-capping arrangements and contracting central support for local government to which the Government continue to be committed, there is no possibility of maintaining the support currently given by the county councils. If the Minister pretends otherwise, he is doing his Department and the House a disservice. It worries me that at a time when we need to enhance our environment, to invest in the economy and the environmental infrastructure, to give our crushed and critical economy some chance, to give our young people some hope and to provide some decency for the leisure of those who have gone in huge numbers into the dole queues, one major area of leisure is put under a severe and unacceptable threat. I hope that even at this late stage the Minister will recognise that, whatever concessions he may be prepared to make for London, he is making far too few concessions for the metropolitan counties in the north. In my county, the economic position is grave. The environment will be seriously disadvantaged entirely as a result of this petty, politically motivated and grossly unattractive measure.

[Mr. Hardy]

Dr. Hampson: I am glad to have the opportunity to follow my colleague from Yorkshire, the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy). It is undoubtedly true that there is anxiety about several of the changes that will result from the Bill, largely from the cash point of view. However, I do not understand why the matters that the hon. Gentleman raised, especially those relating to the environment, cannot be dealt with under a different structure, provided that sufficient resources are available. Today, we are dealing with the structures through which such services are carried out.

Since the Government came to power in 1979, they have talked about the abolition or reform of the metropolitan county structure. The matter was discussed in the Department of the Environment early in the life of this Government. No report on local government recommended the present metropolitan county structure. It was a compromise. Some of us thought from the beginning that it was a botched compromise, because those authorities were large, had large bureaucracies and incurred vast expenditure on salaries, but had relatively restricted functions. There was no case for continuing them. It was not only Conservative Members or members of the Government in 1979 who believed that; most Labour city leaders believed that. Mr. Ken Livingstone in London and the leaders in Leeds, Birmingham and Merseyside believed that, because there was no balance of responsibilities at the county level as there was at the shire level. They were not responsible for education, but they were responsible for substantial transport systems, the police and the fire services.

I do not accept that this legislation is tragic. It is bringing us back to the position in which we should have been from the start. Those authorities should never have existed, and are unnecessary. The Liberal party and the SDP today agreed that they are unnecessary. However, what they want in their place is equally horrendous, because I believe that the British people want powers pushed back down to a lower level, not the accumulation powers at a regional level.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The hon. Gentleman must realise that the position is different in London. London has had directly elected, citywide government since the London county council was set up in 1889. Therefore, it is nothing new. If the metropolitan county councils are abolished, there will still be city government in Sheffield, Liverpool and Manchester, but there will be none in London. That is the difference.

5.30 pm

Dr. Hampson: The point is that history moves on and structures do not remain absolute in value. In London the scale of responsibilities of the citywide authority has steadily diminished under all parties. Only about 10 per cent. of the resources spent on the individual citizen in London is channelled through the GLC. What is the value of the body? My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) always emphasises the need for "a voice" for London. I have never understood whom that voice is for, or to whom it is addressed. I can understand the ceremonial function and that people from around the world might want to be received, but the City of London could do that as well as the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks).

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Can the hon. Member explain the intention of the person who gave money to the Horniman museum, over the door of which is the inscription, to which the Bishop of Southwark referred,

"Given to the London County Council as Representative of the people of London in perpetuity"?

What authority other than the GLC or a county council can take responsibility for all citizens and look after all their interests?

Dr. Hampson: City government thoughout the world varies enormously. Municipal authorities elsewhere manage because such gifts are given to parts of cities or to institutions. There is nothing sacrosanct about a particular representative body for a city such as London. London happens to have evolved in a way which is different from other cities. Paris has evolved in yet another way. It has an elected mayor who has almost absolute power, whereas other elected representatives have little or no say. Power there is centralised. Nothing decrees that a particular body should speak for London and have particular powers.

If we had not transferred housing and other major responsibilities down the line the argument would be different. I should have thought that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), since he represents the Liberal party, would argue in favour of passing responsibilities down the line. He seemed to say that powers should be passed up to a regional body, which is even more divorced from the citizen. Most of my constituents do not know who their county councillors are or what functions they have, so how on earth would they know who to turn to at regional level?

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Only inner London had a county council structure and it was called the London county council. The county of Surrey and the county of Middlesex represented many outer London boroughs. Previously most of the metropolitan areas were county boroughs, which were smaller, unitary authorities and therefore more understandable to the public.

Mr. Hampson: The people of Leeds wanted to remain within a county borough. No one recommended the metropolitan county of West Yorkshire, although I am sad to say that a Conservative Government created it. It makes no sense. It is not a metropolitan conglomeration but a huge city with a number of other small towns.

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): The hon. Gentleman's argument would make sense if the Government intended to pass back to the old county boroughs or districts the functions they lost, but they are not doing that. They are setting up unelected, undemocratic quangos with no responsibility or accountability to the people of Leeds or anywhere else.

Dr. Hampson: I am glad the hon. Gentleman has allowed me to return to my course. I want to deal with precisely those matters. People talk about the residuary body.—[Hon Members: "What is it?"] It is as described by definition. It is not intended to exist in perpetuity. Most of us believe that it is important to put the reorganisation on the road, to find out the rough edges and to resolve the problems.

Some of the amendments are farcical. The residuary body is intended to find out how to deal with the functions and to farm them out to the appropriate quarter. Such a body should not be elected. We do not want the residuary body to be perpetuated by making it an elected body.

The House of Lords has the notion that elections should take place for people who are to deal with tiny functions. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East, for whom I have a great respect on a European level, wants a directly elected body to deal with waste—an important function —research agencies, libraries and museums. That is in the realms of farce. We do not have a tradition of direct elections to deal with specific functions.

In other countries such activities are handled on a broader basis on behalf of others by a single elected authority. Even in Britain we have a strong tradition of one authority acting on behalf of another. In education, for example, children can cross a boundary and be educated at a neighbouring school and one authority pays the recipient authority. We have a long tradition of agency agreements. Research facilities, safety inspectorates, quality controls and consumer standards can be operated by one authority on behalf of another through an agency agreement. That is a long-standing practice. An elected body is not necessary to perform that function.

Mr. Dykes: Why make ILEA a directly elected body?

Dr. Hampson: I opposed that idea. I do not wish to be side tracked into that argument. At least I was, and am, consistent.

If we trust the authorities and place responsibilities firmly on them, rather than allowing them to hedge and pass the buck up the line to a nebulous body such as the county council, they will get together and reach agreement.

We tend to view government in the United States in terms of the Senate and Congress, but I have lectured on their history and politics and experienced local government there. Town planning is the responsibility of the town. Small communities and county-level government devise their own plans for their communities. Areas such as Texas deliberately might do little in the way of planning. Where they do, in the east coast states, for example, boundaries adjoin and yet agreements are reached. When I was there last week I found local officials meeting over breakfast. Perhaps that is a good thing because there is less disagreement likely at that time.

The current proposition is not as absurd as some people think. We have accepted many tiers and people spend years making structural plans, decisions often overturned on appeal to the Secretary of State. In many ways the arbiters of planning proposals are the Secretary of State's regional officials. We do not need all the present tiers because people can get together at a planning level to resolve difficulties amicably.

These proposals are long overdue. The present county and London levels are unnecessary and the more quickly that we get rid of them the happier I and my constituents shall be.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): The most revealing point made by the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) came at the end of his contribution when he claimed that the Government's proposals are not so absurd as many people think—an admission that the Government's argument is not getting across so well as Ministers claim.

Hon. Members on both sides believe that this group of amendments provides the last chance of maintaining a minimal elected authority in each of the metropolitan areas and in Greater London. Unlike the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West, I believe that the powers proposed in these amendments are coherent and should be operated on a conurbationwide basis covering strategic planning, highways and traffic, waste disposal, central and support services and research and information. Those are all essential, practical services, not the high-visibility political issues which cause anxiety to so many people. The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West claimed that this was a minimal series of responsibilities for which to have people elected, but I believe that it entails a great deal more responsibility to exercise those powers across a metropolitan area or the Greater London area than is exercised by many elected district authorities.

Dr. Hampson: Is it not sensible that decisions on the important functions which affect neighbouring authorities should be taken by representatives from the directly elected district councils who have the interests of their communities at heart? The people on those joint bodies could then resolve the difficulties.

Mr. Cartwright: Some of us have experience of trying to get this sort of agreement at local level when the interest of one borough or district is different from that of its neighbours. It is not easy to achieve. This is one area in which some hon. Members are sceptical about the Government's belief that co-operation and co-ordination will magically break out at district or borough level and that it will be all right on the night. This has not happened in practice because, for perfectly understandable and defensible reasons, local authorities fight their corner and for their people. They do not see the overall needs of the wider area, nor should they when they are elected to do a rather different job.

The Government accept that many of these conurbationwide powers cannot be exercised by individual authorities because the Government have created an extraordinary patchwork quilt of joint boards, quangos and other authorities. Much of the expert evidence heard during the Committee stage gives the lie to the belief that there will be co-ordination and co-operation at borough and district level.

[Mr. Cartwright]

Their Lordships went some way to recognise that key services are best carried out at metropolitan level. I welcome the idea of a joint planning committee for Greater London which will give elected borough councillors a chance to discuss planning issues, to represent their views to the Secretary of State and to send representatives to the south-east planning body. Having provided that committee for London, why will the Government not provide the same machinery for the other metropolitan areas, where the problems are the same and sometimes even worse—run-down inner city areas, declining industries, difficulty in attracting new developments and new jobs and problems with public and private transport? It is wildly illogical to provide that machinery for London and to deny it to the other metropolitan authorities.

I endorse what the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said about the need to view inner city problems on a conurbationwide basis. Our experience of metropolitan government has made it clear that it is impossible to solve inner city problems on the basis of inner city areas alone. One must take a wider view. For example, the Thamesmead new town development in my constituency is a highly imaginative scheme originally launched by the Greater London council. No one could possibly suggest that such a gigantic project could have been undertaken by one or two borough or district authorities.

5.45 pm

The philosophy of this legislation is in sharp contrast with commitments given by the Conservatives before they came to power in 1979. When the Labour Government were considering the question of organic change—the idea of giving powers back to some of the biggest of the former county boroughs—the present Secretary of State for Defence was reported in the Local Government Chronicle of 9 March 1979 to have told the Conservative party local government conference in March 1979 in his traditionally strong and robust manner that the Conservative party rejected the idea of a reform of local government structure. He said:

"I do not believe for one moment that the British people are looking for a major upheaval in local government."

He went on to say:

"Change for change's sake or expensive experiments with the ratepayers' money must be ruled out and that must be the position of the Conservative party."

The right hon. Gentleman announced that he had had discussions with the leaders of the Association of County Councils, the Association of District Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. He went on to make a clear declaration:

"We are agreed that we do not seek another major reorganisation of local government because we are certain that change in this field is likely to be expensive and divisive."

It has certainly been divisive, and from the Coopers and Lybrand studies it is clear that it will also be expensive. The GLC figure for the transitional costs is between £122 million and £167 million. Even on the most optimistic Coopers and Lybrand assessment it would take almost 12 years of annual savings to recoup that kind of expenditure.

The present Prime Minister, speaking at the same conference, promised a close relationship between a Conservative Government and Conservative local authorities. She declared:

"We've worked with you in Opposition. I want to say very strongly that we shall go on working with you in Government."

Clearly, she felt that there was some scepticism on that point because she went on to say:

"In case that comes as a shock to those of you with long memories—I repeat—we shall go on working with you in Government. Good Government rests on a partnership between Whitehall and town hall."

She concluded:

"We are going to give back to you more of the responsibility for running your own affairs."

That will raise a very hollow laugh from many Conservative councillors up and down the country who are suffering even tighter control from the Department of the Environment. It would certainly get a short, sharp and rude response from those Conservative councillors whose councils will be abolished by the Bill. Conservative Members who believe in the traditional Conservative view of local government should support the amendments.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: This short debate has allowed the House to rehearse various arguments which have been extensively debated on previous occasions in this House and in another place. In those circumstances, it would not be right for me to go on too long. I shall therefore set out briefly the Government view on the points made by the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) and others.

There seem to be three substantive issues. The first concerns planning in London. I was grateful for the welcome given by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) to the amendment accepted in another place. Lords amendments Nos. 1 and 2 and the consequential Lords amendment No. 61 provide for a joint committee of borough council representatives instead of the appointed London planning commission originally envisaged in the Bill. The purpose of the joint committee would be to consider matters of common interest relating to the planning and development of Greater London and to inform the Secretary of State and neighbouring planning authorities of its views. It is important to note that the joint committee will not itself be a planning authority but an advisory committee, as the originally proposed London planning commission would have been.

The Lords amendments owe a good deal to the wisdom of my noble Friend Lord Sandford who has great experience in these matters. The London planning commission as an appointed expert body did not find much favour in another place. Instead, there was felt to be a need to co-ordinate the borough councils' approach to planning in and around London. The proposal for a joint committee has the support of the London Boroughs Association and of SERPLAN, the South East Regional Planning Conference. The Government are satisfied that that change made by the other place is an improvement, and I hope that the House will accept the relevant Lords amendments.

The Opposition amendments to Lords amendment No. 2 seek to do two things. First, they seek to extend the joint committee concept to the six metropolitan counties. Secondly—the hon. Member for Norwood touched on this briefly—they would empower the London joint committee, but, strangely, not the metropolitan joint committees, to issue guidance to which borough councils must have regard in preparing their unitary development plans.

I hope that the House will reject both Opposition amendments to Lords amendment No. 2. The Government remain unconvinced that there is any need for special planning machinery to cover the metropolitan county areas. In this context London is and always has been seen to be a special case. London has more than three times as many planning authorities as the largest metropolitan county and the impact of London's development on the surrounding area is far greater and more complex than that of any other conurbation in England. Our original proposal for a London planning commission recognised those facts and the decision to substitute a joint committee of the boroughs cannot alter the case against providing anything comparable for the metropolitan counties because there is simply no need for any such provision. Each of the metropolitan districts will be a powerful elected planning authority in its own right. To impose a joint planning committee would be an unnecessary bureaucratic top hamper and I advise the House to reject the amendments which call for it.

Mr. Wareing: The right hon. Gentleman may regard London's problems as quantitatively greater than those of areas such as Merseyside or Tyne and Wear, but under the Bill the powers granted to the joint planning commission for London will go to the Secretary of State in the case of the metropolitan counties. That is even more bureaucratic. Does the right hon. Gentleman envisage no possibility of conflict between district councils such as Liverpool and Sefton? Such conflict does not make for good local government planning. What advantage is there to the metropolitan counties in the system proposed in the Bill?

Mr. Jenkin: In the case of town and country planning powers in the metropolitan counties the proposal has always been that strategic guidance would be drawn up by the Department of the Environment in response to planning conferences held within the areas concerned. The broad, strategic guidance is and always has been a function of central Government Departments. To try to interpose an extra layer between the powerful district and borough planning authorities and the strategic guidance — I emphasise the word "strategic"—which must inevitably come from central Government will merely create confusion and difficulty, as has already occurred when large bodies of that kind interfere with the planning functions of a large number of districts and boroughs.

Thirdly, amendments to various parts of the Bill seek to provide for multi-purpose directly elected authorities either for London or for the six metropolitan counties or for all seven areas. A number of hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes), have spoken in favour of those amendments.

I note with some relief that this really is the last opportunity to debate this issue. No one has ever denied its importance. It has been the central issue in the Bill. It has been debated time and again at every stage of the Bill —on clause 1 on the Floor of the House, on several occasions in the Standing Committee and again on Report. On that last occasion, on 27 March, the Voice for London amendment was defeated by 335 votes to 193. Now, undaunted — perhaps refreshed after three months' freedom from the need to debate the matter — hon. Members on both sides have returned to the charge yet again.

Mr. Corbyn: And the Government still have not answered the case.

Mr. Jenkin: The formation of the proposal is slightly different from those previously advanced, but the objective is the same. Whatever hon. Members may say, the objective is the retention in a different form of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jenkin: No, I have only six minutes left——

Mr. Corbyn: The Secretary of State is destroying local government, but he will not give way to the chairman of the GLC.

Mr. Jenkin: I know that a number of my hon. Friends are and always have been opposed to the abolition of the GLC, but I find the Opposition's stance puzzling. They have not put their names to the amendments relating to London, although they are supposed to be against abolition of the GLC. It is time that we were told what the Opposition policy for London really is.

Mr. Corbyn: Democratic government.

Mr. Jenkin: Do the Opposition agree with the Frankenstein horror of a report currently going the rounds at County hall which proposes to recreate not just the GLC but a body which could take unto itself a whole mass of additional powers, including powers over the London police, many of the functions of the London boroughs, stretching its tentacles right out into the green belt to commutor services and so forth?

Mr. Corbyn: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jenkin: That report proposes to lop off a number of outer London boroughs so as to give the resulting body a permanent and undefeatable Labour majority. We need to know whether the Opposition support those proposals.

As for the metropolitan counties, we were interested to see the press notice referring to a letter from the Leader of the Opposition to the leader of West Yorkshire county council, Councillor John Gunnell. The Leader of the Opposition was asked what was the Labour party's future commitment. We now know the answer to that question. The Leader of the Opposition wrote on 4 July:

> "With regard to the future commitment of the party I am quite sure that the strong case for strategic authorities in the metropolitan areas which you have advanced so well will influence our future policy considerations."

That seems a less than wholehearted commitment to restore the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Tony Banks: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Jenkin: The Government view has always been clear. We oppose recreation of the GLC or the metropolitan county councils in any form. Those authorities do not have enough functions to justify their existence as separate directly elected tiers of local government.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Jenkin: Although the amendments proposed today differ in some respects from those put forward on earlier occasions, neither they, nor, with great respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East, any of the speeches that we have heard today, begin to make out a case for successor authorities.

[Mr. Jenkin]

Those who advocate directly elected authorities for London and the metropolitan counties have consistently failed to answer the following point. They know that the present arrangements do not work. They know that the boroughs and districts are now the major providers of local government services in those areas. They also know that major strategic planning and strategic transport decisions inevitably fall to central Government rather than to local government. That has always been so and will continue to be so in the future. Any attempt to stake out an area between the strong boroughs and districts and the central Government functions to be covered by an intermediate tier responsible for planning, highways, waste disposal and so on is doomed to failure. It is a very small area and certainly not large enough to justify a separate directly elected authority.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Jenkin: At an earlier stage, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East and other Conservative Members argued that we should abolish the GLC and establish a new body with most of the same functions. That was illogical. They now say that we should abolish the GLC and establish a body covering only a few of those functions. That is even more illogical. If the GLC itself does not have enough functions to justify its existence, how can a body with even fewer functions be justified?

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Jenkin: The case for directly elected countrywide authorities for London or the metropolitan counties does not stand up. Between the functions of the boroughs and districts, which are the major providers of services, and the functions of central Government, which are and always have been wider than those of individual boroughs and districts, there is simply not room for an intermediate tier. Acting jointly, the boroughs and districts can, with central Government, provide all the co-ordination that is necessary.

I do not deny the importance of this issue, but it has been debated time and again in both Houses of Parliament and time and again the changes proposed in the amendments have been firmly rejected. I ask the House to reject them firmly today.

Mr. Nellist: I had hoped that while the Secretary of State was speaking, attempting to clear up in people's minds the commitments made from the Opposition Front Bench, he would clear up the confusion resulting from his statements. He said at the beginning of this exercise that 7,100 jobs and £100 million would go if we did not have democratically-elected authorities. Where are those jobs to go? What services? Which counties? What were the targets in the mind of the Secretary of State when he started making those statements one and a half years ago? In Committee and so far on Report we have had no explanation. The hopes and aspirations of working people in the metropolitan areas and the GLC and the security of their jobs——

It being Six o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Order this day, to put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

The House proceeded to a Division——

Mr. Tony Banks (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Does the point of order relate to the Division?

Mr. Banks: Yes. We have just had a speech from the Secretary of State for the Environment which lasted about 12 minutes, or one sixth of the allotted time in which the Government have forced the House to consider——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that this is not a point of order for me. I am not responsible for Ministers' speeches or their length.

Mr. Banks: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was trying to ask you to protect the rights of Members who want to raise points because you decide when an hon. Member will be called. Ministers who coerce the House in terms of the guillotine should not be given a disproportionate amount of time to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but he will know that the House has passed the allocation of time motion and it is my job to ensure that the will of the House in that respect is carried out.

Mr. Banks: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have dealt with the hon. Gentleman's point. He is now getting close to arguing with the Chair.

The House having divided: Ayes 319, Noes 177.

Division No. 256] [6 pm

AYES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amery, Rt Hon Julian
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Beith, A. J.
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Rt Hon Sir Frederic
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruce, Malcolm
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Cartwright, John
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dover, Den
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)

Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Freud, Clement
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodhart, Sir Philip
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Howell, Ralph (N Norfolk)
Howells, Geraint
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jenkins, Rt Hon Roy (Hillh'd)
Jessel, Toby
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Joseph, Rt Hon Sir Keith
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Kennedy, Charles
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luce, Richard
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclennan, Robert
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Marland, Paul
Marlow, Antony
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Owen, Rt Hon Dr David
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Penhaligon, David
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Prior, Rt Hon James
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speed, Keith
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steel, Rt Hon David
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wainwright, R.
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Wall, Sir Patrick
Wallace, James
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Wrigglesworth, Ian
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Carol Mather and
Mr. Donald Thompson.

NOES

Abse, Leo
Anderson, Donald
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Brown, Ron (E'burgh, Leith)
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell, Ian
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald

Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hamilton, W. W. (Central Fife)
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Haynes, Frank
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Janner, Hon Greville
John, Brynmor
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Lambie, David
Lamond, James
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Rowlands, Ted
Ryman, John
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Short, Mrs R.(W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C.(Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
White, James
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John McWilliam and
Mr. Allen McKay.

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put the Questions on the remaining Lords amendments to be disposed of at that hour.

Lords amendment: No. 3, in page 3, line 38, at end insert—

"( ) The Secretary of State shall before the abolition date lay before Parliament a report on the steps he will take to secure the full adoption by metropolitan district councils and the London borough councils of those facilities, services, and responsibilities for the protection and enjoyment of the countryside and areas for urban nature conservation which serve the continuing needs of the wider county areas and neighbouring populations."

Read a Second time.

Amendments made to Lords amendment, (a) in line 4, leave out 'metropolitan district councils and the London borough councils' and insert

'the councils to which functions are transferred by this section in Greater London or a metropolitan county'.

(b) in line 8 leave out 'the wider county areas' and insert 'Greater London or that county'.—[Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

Lords amendment, as amended, agreed to

Lords amendment No. 2 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 4, before clause 7, insert the following new clause — Highway and Road Traffic functions

" . The Secretary of State shall by order taking effect on the abolition date make provision for the London Residuary Body to exercise the following functions relating to highways and road traffic in London to the extent and in the manner that such order shall provide—

(a) that the Body shall have a duty to prepare, in consultation with the borough councils, plans relating to highways and traffic in Greater London and the Body and borough councils shall have regard to such plans when exercising their statutory functions;

(b) that it shall be a duty of the Body to establish and maintain an organisation for the purpose of assembling, disseminating and keeping up to date, information on road traffic and other transport in Greater London and that the Body may commission such research and carry out such surveys as they think fit in fulfilment of this duty;

(c) that the Body shall have the functions of the highway authority under the Highways Act 1980 in relation to metropolitan roads;

(d) that not later than 1st April 1987 the Body shall, in consultation with the borough councils review the existing network of metropolitan roads and prepare and submit to the Secretary of State for his approval proposals for the revision of that network;

(e) that, as respects metropolitan roads, the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 shall apply to the Body (for the purposes of traffic management and parking control) as they now apply to the Greater London Council;

(f) that the Body shall be a local authority for the purposes of section 38 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 (power of local authorities as to giving of road safety information and training);

(g) that the Body shall be authorised, for the purpose of regulating traffic on metropolitan roads, to exercise the powers of a borough council under the said Act of 1984 as respects roads communicating with or adjacent to metropolitan roads in accordance with procedures to be prescribed by the Secretary of State;

(h) that, for the purposes of ensuring that the exercise by the London borough council of their powers under the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 does not have any adverse effect on traffic on roads for which they are not the highway authority, the Body shall be given reserve powers similar to those given to the Secretary of State in Part 1 of Schedule 9 of the said Act;

(i) that the Body may exercise the powers of a London borough council or the Common Council under sections 6 and 9 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 for the purposes of prohibiting or restricting such use of heavy commercial vehicles as the Body considers expedient for preserving or improving the amenities of Greater London or some part or parts thereof;

(j) that the Body shall have a duty to control, manage, maintain and, where appropriate, develop and extend the system of urban traffic control through traffic light signals established by the Greater London Council;

(k) that the Body shall be a 'London Authority' within the meaning of section 50 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984 (travel concessions on journeys in or around Greater London);

(l) that the Body shall be able to assist, by way of grant or loan, the provision of transport services by a voluntary organisation for the benefit of the public or any class of persons."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I beg to move amendment (b) to the Lords amendment, in line 26, at end insert

'provided that, if such revision contains proposals for the designation of existing metropolitan roads as trunk roads, a public enquiry shall be held before any such road shall be so designated by the Secretary of State.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: amendment (c) thereto, in line 26, at end insert

'and the Secretary of State shall not direct that a highway or proposed highway shall become a trunk road until he has considered the proposals submitted to him under this subsection.'.

Lords amendment No. 5, before clause 7, insert the following new clause—

Strategic Highway Functions in Metropolitan Counties

". The Secretary of State shall by order taking effect on the abolition date make provision for the authority established by section 27 of this Act for each metropolitan county to exercise the following functions relating to highways and road traffic in that county to the extent and in the manner that such order shall provide—

(a) the functions of the highway authority under the Highways Act 1980 in relation to principal roads within the county;

(b) the functions of a county council and a highway authority for the purpose of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 in relation to principal roads within the county;

(c) issuing guidance as to the manner in which in relation to non principal roads the councils of metropolitan districts should exercise their powers under the 1984 Act, for the purpose of ensuring that the exercise by such councils of those traffic powers in relation to non principal roads does not have an adverse effect on traffic or any class of traffic using principal roads within the county or any traffic or class of traffic in any area other than the area of the district council, as the case may be;

(d) the functions relating to the construction and maintenance of bridges within the county which on that date are the responsibility of the highway authority;

(e) the functions contained in the Road Traffic Acts 1972 and 1974 in so far as the same relate to road safety within the county; and

(f) the collection, examination, analysis and dissemination of data required for the discharge of those functions."

Lords amendment No. 6, in page 4, line 3, leave out from first "to" to end of line 7 and insert

"give effect to the transfer of functions relating to those matters—

(a) from the Greater London Council—

(i) in part to the London residuary body; and

(ii) in part to the London borough councils and the common council; and

(b) from the metropolitan county councils—

(i) in part to the metropolitan county strategic transportation authorities; and

(ii) in part to the metropolitan district councils."

Lords amendment No. 7, in page 4, line 13, leave out from second "the" to "and" in line 15 and insert

"metropolitan county strategic transportation authorities and London residuary authority."

Lords amendment No. 8, in page 4, line 19, leave out from" metropolitan" to end of line 23 and insert

"county strategic transportation authorities and London Residuary Body;"

Lords amendment No. 24, in clause 27, in page 18, line 18, leave out "Passenger"

Lords amendment No. 25, in page 18, line 19, leave out "Transport" and insert "Strategic Transportation"

Lords amendment No. 26, in page 18, line 20, leave out "passenger"

Lords amendment No. 27, in page 18, line 20, leave out "transport" and insert "strategic transportation"

Lords amendment No. 28, in page 18, line 21, leave out "passenger"

Lords amendment No. 29, in page 18, line 21, leave out "transport" and insert "strategic transportation"

Lords amendment No. 30, in page 18, line 23, leave out "passenger"

Lords amendment No. 31, in page 18, line 23, leave out "transport" and insert "strategic transportation"

Lords amendment No. 32, in page 18, line 27, leave out "passenger"

Lords amendment No. 33, in page 18, line 27, leave out "transport" and insert "strategic transportation"

Lords amendment No. 40, in clause 38, in page 24, line 17, leave out "passenger"

Lords amendment No. 41, in page 24, line 18, leave out "transport" and insert "strategic transportation"

Mr. Hanley: These amendments deal with the vexed subject of the trunking of the south circular road. As many Members will know, this road is a scar through the middle of an otherwise beautiful constituency. The level of traffic on it is totally unnecessary for the local area, and the road itself was not designed to take the level of traffic now on it. It is an unnecessary road, following the completion of the M25, and is totally inadequate.

There is no point in trying to upgrade the road, because, following what I hope will be improvements after a possible west London relief road has been constructed, this part of the south circular road will be rendered redundant. The main argument of my constituents is that under this Bill the trunking procedures required by the Highways Act 1980 are being abolished in the case of the south circular road. One can have public inquiries at any time up to the effective date of the Bill and at any time after the effective date of the Bill, but on the date the Bill is passed the rights of my constituents with regard to trunking will be removed.

6.15 pm

One of the other worries of my constituents is that the south circular road just shovels in the problem from somewhere else. The headaches and miseries my constituents suffer as a result of the traffic, especially lorries, are totally unacceptable and before the road is trunked they would like to express their total opposition to the whole subject of trunking. As a result of the effective abolition of the Highways Act by this Bill, the rights of my constituents will expunged.

I am grateful to the Government for building the M25, which will take a considerable amount of lorry and car traffic out of the south circular road areas. But the M25 will take only approximately 18 to 20 per cent. of that volume. In any event it is not yet finished, and we do not know what will be its exact effect. The democratic rights of my constituents ought to be enshrined in public inquiries before trunking takes place.

I cannot speak too highly of the Minister of State for the way she has tried through public meetings and through letters and interviews with local journals to put her side of the story. She has assured my constitutents that there will be public inquiries prior to any road widening schemes. She also says that no road widening schemes are planned at the moment, but, without prejudice to the assessment studies being carried out at the moment, if there is any widening later there will be public inquiries.

My constituents are somewhat jaundiced about Government assurances following the abolition of the 275,000 aircraft movement limit at Heathrow recently, and therefore wish to have the opportunity of a public inquiry so that the inspector can properly hear the views of people in this area.

[Mr. Hanley]

One of the things my hon. Friend the Minister does not fully appreciate, but I believe that her officals do, is that there is a basic difference between public inquiries into trunking proposals and public inquiries set up for road widening proposals following this legislation.

A trunk road inquiry differs substantially from an inquiry into a local authority road proposal, because whereas a local authority requires a compulsory purchase order and then a side road order, line orders are not made for local authority roads. Unlike a trunk road, planning permission is required for the construction of a new road by a local authority and where an inquiry is needed into the refusal of planning permission or a called-in application for a new road it will normally be held concurrently with the inquiries into the CPO and the SRO.

The promoting local authority at a public inquiry will be required to prove its case up to the hilt. Before objections are considered it will have to call evidence establishing the need for the road and justifying the scheme as being the best way of meeting that need. By contrast—and this is where constitutionally the people of Richmond are getting a raw deal—the purpose of a trunk road inquiry is not to enable the Secretary of State's case for building the road to be tested in public, but to inform the Secretary of State of the weight and nature of objections to the scheme. The key tasks of the inspector are to take account of objections from people affected by the proposals, to report on those objections and to make recommendations on the proposals. But perhaps the most controversial aspect of road trunk inquiries is that questions on Government policy are outside their scope. The procedural rules specifically require the inspector to disallow any questions which in his opinion are directed to the merits of Government policy. We believe that any inquiry before trunking would give full protection to my constituents. They demand that right.

I can do no better than quote some of the demands made by an organisation called Richmond Residents Against the A205 Trunking. That group has acted non-politically and in a completely non-partisan way. It has worked hard to try to bring to public attention the constitutional disaster that trunking under the Bill produces. I agree with every statement that the organisation makes. It stated:

"We want to cross the main road with no more difficulty than now. We do not want to have to use bridges and tunnels. We want to be able to take our children to school and to shop without being buffeted by vehicles of all sizes or weights. We do not want pavements narrowed in the shopping areas. We want to be able to shop freely on both sides of the road."

Communities are otherwise destroyed.

"We do not want our main road run by a Whitehall department that sees it as a through route to somewhere else, attracting traffic through our constituency. We want the Government to accept any changes made by the House of Lords aimed at keeping London's roads under London control."

The organisation wants a public inquiry.

My final worry is that, even if we had a public inquiry after the road had been trunked and were able to put forward the environmental matters that we believe should be considered with regard to any widening proposals of the south circular road, an inspector might have to resort to the Trunk Roads Act 1936, which describes trunk roads as:

"the principal roads in Great Britain which constitute the national system of routes for through traffic".

In the face of that definition, an inspector would have to say, "I hear the environmental considerations put forward by the local community but, because it is a trunk road, in the national interest I shall order it to be widened." Our ability to complain has been eroded by the Bill.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I understand the worries of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), because he has expressed them time and again, as is his right. While I fully agree that conditions on the south circular road are completely unsatisfactory and have every sympathy with those who live, work and shop nearby, the road cannot be altered without a public inquiry. The distinctions that he drew between a local road inquiry and a trunk road inquiry are theoretical. Government policy will always be discussed at a trunk road inquiry. There has never been one where that has not occurred. In practice, therefore, the Secretary of State for Transport must justify his case fully. I cannot accept what my hon. Friend was saying about the difference between the two types of inquiry.

Amendments (b) and (c) which my hon. Friend has tabled have problems. First, amendment (b) is incompatible with the power contained in schedule 4 for the trunking of some metropolitan roads on abolition date. Amendment (c) would stop any trunking order anywhere in the country between now and April 1987 at the earliest, because, as my hon. Friend is aware, the power to trunk contained in schedule 4 has been debated and approved by both Houses.

Mr. Hanley: I tabled amendment (b), not (c), which is in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mrs. Chalker: I apologise, but the same applies, whoever tabled the amendment.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) spoke to amendment (c), not (b).

Mrs. Chalker: I thought that I heard that mentioned before. I am asking the House to resist amendments (b) and (c), for the reasons that I have given. Amendment (c) would stop any trunking order anywhere in the country between now and April 1987 at the earliest. Given the correspondence which I frequently receive in which I am asked to trunk some roads, that would be in no one's interests.

We have debated the power to trunk contained in schedule 4, and it has been approved by both Houses of Parliament. Any proposals to trunk roads in London after abolition date would have to follow the procedures laid down in the Highways Act 1980. In other words, even if the residuary body conducted a review of metropolitan roads for 1987, any trunking proposals would still be subject to the provisions of the Highways Act 1980.

My hon. Friend is aware, and I repeat, that the ownership of GLC roads will be transferred to the appropriate successor authorities at abolition date. I resist amendment (b) because if we were to use the powers contained in the Highways Act 1980 there would be a long period of uncertainty, not just about the A205 in my hon. Friend's constituency, but about all the other parcels of land in the metropolis covered by that provision. It would impose upon local ratepayers the cost of maintaining those major roads in the meantime. I do not believe that that is fair.

It is right for me and the Government to make clear what the transfer of ownership at abolition will mean. Similar transfers of ownership have been made through legislation before—in 1936, 1946 and in 1963 when the GLC was established.

My hon. Friend asked about improvements. He said, "When?" I say, "if". While we are seeking to improve the environment along the south circular road and in other places, there is no certainty that any of the matters which he and his constituents fear will occur. As he correctly said, we have no plans to improve the road. If there were any proposals to improve the road, they would all follow the normal procedure of public consultation and inquiry, and the full provisions of the Highways Act 1980 would bear upon the handling of the improvement proposals. The power contained in schedule 4 gives the Department no authority to carry out improvements. I hope that that is clear once and for all.

I repeat what we said in Committee, on Report and in the other place, that we shall not revive the ringway road and motorway box ideas. Those plans are long since dead and buried. Those who say that there will be concrete in various places across London which today are the city's lungs are merely scaremongering. They have been financed through the GLC to act in that way.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): My hon. Friend said that there are no plans to revive the motorway box around London. Will she remind herself and others that the originator of the motorway box idea was the Labour-controlled LCC and not the Conservative party?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is correct. Many of those living in the area which would have been affected by the proposal were devoutly opposed to it then, and we have never changed our position.

Mr. Tony Banks: Why was the Conservative administration at county hall between 1971 and 1973 so much in favour of the motorway box?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman knows that not every member of his party agrees council to council. I should have been surprised if after public inquiries those plans had then gone ahead. I am speaking for a large number of people, of whom I am one, living in the area. When the LCC proposed those plans, we knew what would happen if they were allowed to proceed. There are no proposals for a ringway road and a motorway box.

Amendment No. 4 seeks to transfer the GLC highway and financial responsibility to the London residuary body. I sympathise with some of the objectives of the clause, but it is unworkable and inconsistent. Perhaps I can tell the House why it is inconsistent with the general policy underlined in the Bill. The clause would retain a three-tier structure for highway responsibilities in London. It would introduce a new three-tier structure for traffic responsibilities, and it would run counter to overall policy on streamlining embodied in the Bill. It would greatly reduce — perhaps even completely do away with — those benefits which we expect from that streamlining. The residuary body is not a satisfactory body to run these responsibilities. The new clause envisages the GLC's highway and traffic responsibility for metropolitan roads going to the residuary body, and that would be unsatisfactory, because it is only a temporary organisation for major functions such as highways and traffic, because they are permanent functions, and because the residuary body is only an appointed body.

6.30 pm

Both Houses have rejected amendments to establish directly or indirectly elected authorities for metropolitan roads, and therefore metropolitan roads would go to the boroughs, when the residuary body would be wound up. The boroughs are competent to take on the responsibilities for these roads and they are suitable authorities to do so. They are also directly elected. The new clauses are unworkable because they are completely inimical to sensible transport planning for London.

It is true that the residuary body is given certain responsibilities, but these are not set within the wider framework of traffic and highway or London-wide planning duties. Even with the amendments to the Bill which the House has passed tonight, that would not be so. The provisions envisage, in certain cases, dual responsibility for traffic management for the same roads between the residuary body and the boroughs, and I see that as a recipe for trouble indeed. They also create duplication of the reserve powers, with both the Secretary of State and the residuary body having some, but there is no clear division of responsibility for exercising them. They also envisage dual responsibility for prohibiting or restricting the use of lorries, but not for making it clear whether the borough or the residuary body has the final say. They also give the residuary body powers to make grants to any group, as its fancy takes it — goodness knows what they might be — but they do not establish the duties or the systems of accountability in relation to such grants.

The clause does not make proper financial provision for the exercise of highway and traffic functions proposed for the residuary bodies. These are major flaws and they are not the only ones. It is not a matter of tinkering to put these matters right. If the House were to agree with the amendment, substantial parts of the Bill would require major revision. This is not justified when the residuary body is only temporary and when appropriate and competent alternative authorities stand ready and are qualified to take on the responsibilities.

We recognise the need to maintain expert teams, specialist equipment and information gathering. We have always recognised that from the earliest planning days of the Bill. One of the most important things is to maintain the UTC system in London. That is exactly why there is reserve power in schedule 5. We recognise the importance of maintaining data collection and analysis, including accident statistics. We are already discussing with the boroughs how best to maintain the systems and we see the residuary body as providing a home for such systems and staff until permanent arrangements are settled with the boroughs. We do not need a separate strategic body, because our proposals make effective provision for handling the London-wide issues. I can go through those in detail, but the House knows full well what they are.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): My hon. Friend is touching on important matters of great interest to our constituents. Can she give any assurance that these matters, when they pass to the boroughs and also to her own Department, will be regularly debated by the House?

[Sir Philip Goodhart]

Mrs. Chalker: In so far as the boroughs have responsibility, these matters will be debated in the council chambers of those boroughs, but in so far as the Department has responsibility, just like any other responsibilities where the Department is answerable, we shall be answerable in the House. That is exactly the way it should be.

We are against the policy embodied in the new clause proposed by amendment No. 4 because the streamlining functions are there and we do not want duplication of administration and costs. The residuary body is not appropriate for these functions because it is only temporary and is only appointed. The detailed provisions are unworkable, wholly inadequate and, as I have said, would require major revision to remedy the defects. In any case, the highway and traffic responsibilities proposed to be transferred to the boroughs are primarily local in nature and are best handled at local borough level. The wider issues can be handled elsewhere where necessary. Those are the suitable arrangements about which I spoke.

The Government ask the House to disagree with the Lords amendment on the situation in the metropolitan county council areas because the clause also makes the arrangements proposed unworkable. It is particularly wrong to introduce into the metropolitan counties the three-tier structure of highway authorities which has already proved unsatisfactory in London. The strategic transportation authority was given a whole host of extra jobs to be done which should best be done at district level, such as traffic management guidance, taking over construction and maintenance of highway bridges, road safety and data collection—all things which can be done adequately at district level.

The provisions of the clause are attractive only to those who believe that everything should be integrated. There is scope in the clause for regiments of staff to produce plans to co-ordinate public transport and traffic across the metropolitan counties, but the real needs of those districts are very different. Road systems in the metropolitan counties consist of interlinking networks of principal and other roads. Almost every journey involves travel on a principal and other road. It is wrong to have separate highways and traffic management responsibilities. Opponents of abolition have made much of the cross-boundary problems, but under the clause district councils would have to consult not only their neighbouring districts, which they should do anyway, but the joint authority, about almost every traffic problem, even down to double yellow lines.

There is no need for a further tier of highway and traffic authorities in the metropolitan areas, and the district councils will talk to each other, as they do already, about the small proportion of highways and traffic management work which requires their co-operation. I do not believe that the great city authorities, like Coventry or Leeds, cannot manage their roads and traffic in sensible co-operation with neighbouring districts.

Mr. Tony Banks: They have 33 boroughs.

Mrs. Chalker: Nor do I believe that the boroughs cannot manage. They are highway authorities already and co-operate across boundaries, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), the chairman of the GLC, knows well.

Mr. Banks: Why is the Minister trunking the roads?

Mrs. Chalker: My point about the roads in the metropolitan county council areas is this. We understand that some traffic problems and some road problems need to be considered over a wider district, and that is true of the boundaries of any local authority anywhere in the country. At professional level authorities have good working relationships and joint working arrangements are well precedented, so while I am confident that sensible co-operation will usually prevail, as I have said before, from time to time, just as between other unconnected authorities, problems will arise. For this reason the original provisions provide a framework within which those districts can operate to ensure that wider considerations are properly taken into account.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister has just made the point that in most counties there is one authority. That is because in most counties the travel-to-work area is within one shire county boundary. Does she accept that some at least of the metropolitan areas, archetypically Merseyside, have at present a county area which encompasses one travel-to-work area? Therefore, for example, people do not suddenly cross the Wirral boundary, the Sefton boundary or the Knowsley boundary to Liverpool. They go in and out within that county, and for that county, if not for anybody else, to have no strategic authority higher than district level authority goes against all the logic and all travel patterns and movements.

Mrs. Chalker: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is not quite right. The travel-to-work area in my region of Merseyside happens to be Wirral and Chester. Chester is in the Cheshire county council area and Wirral remains for a few months yet in Merseyside. Therefore, we continually cross between two county areas with no difficulty and good co-operation. However, that co-operation happens at local level. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that people observe where the boundary is most of the time, he is in difficulty, because, unlike the French, we do not have signs showing when one is going into or leaving an area.

Schedule 5 contains powers for the Secretary of State to issue guidance to local authorities on traffic management. If the guidance is disregarded, with the likelihood of adverse consequences for a wider area, then, but only in that case, would the Secretary of State intervene if he thought it necessary. Similarly, occasion other local authorities object to a traffic scheme affecting their areas, and if objections cannot be resolved the Secretary of State will, subject to consultation, be able to determine the issue.

One of the most important area-wide traffic management task is the operation of the urban traffic control systems. The Government are fully committed to ensuring continuity in London and the metropolitan counties, and the Bill provides reserve powers for that. If the districts are unable to reach a satisfactory agreement, the Secretary of State can take over such responsibilities. I do not believe that it will be necessary for the Secretary of State to do so, because I believe that in order to carry out their new functions districts will need specialist staff and facilities from the metropolitan county council. A Government amendment from the other place, which we shall consider later, requires residuary bodies to consult successor bodies about likely needs. The residuary bodies can then take over special manpower facilities, and that will ensure a smooth transition on abolition day.

It is time for districts to get down to considering the ways in which they will meet their highway and traffic responsibilities. They are ready to do so. They do not need strategic authorities, which would simply perpetuate some of the worst features of the metropolitan county councils, and even add to them. That would not be a recipe for improved conditions. Therefore, I hope that the House will disagree with Lords amendment No. 5 as well.

Mr. Snape: I found the Minister's explanation singularly unconvincing, and I think that my hon. Friends will agree. I am the first to concede that the hon. Lady normally deals well with her brief. This was one of the rare occasions on which I have seen her reading the whole brief through from beginning to end.

Mr. Corbyn: Maybe she does not believe in it.

Mr. Snape: I agree with my hon. Friend. I was just about to say that I do not think the Minister believed a word of her brief. She did not appear to convince too many of her hon. Friends, but then again she does not have to. As we saw in Committee, those Tory Members who bother to say anything about the legislation are few and far between, and those who do not bother to say anything vote for the Government anyway, so the Minister does not have too much to worry about.

It will be a sad day for the House when this undemocratic legislation goes through virtually on the nod, as it will by midnight tonight. It will destroy a tier of local government that, whatever its faults over the past 10 years, has proved, particularly in traffic functions, to have been exceedingly valuable and done much good work. The Minister's unconvincing explanation was an illustration of the fact that what the Government are doing tonight they are doing as a result of a Prime Ministerial afterthought in the drafting of the 1983 general election manifesto.

The Government are carrying through abolition without any consideration of the invevitable chaos that will follow when it will fall to those who are at present doing this work in local government to try to make some sort of order out of the chaos—they will try, as they always do. I shall come to the point made by the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) in a moment.

6.45 pm

Lords amendment No. 4 deals specifically with London. During the passage of the Bill through the other place, numerous amendments were tabled with the aim of transferring the strategic highway traffic problems to an appropriate single authority to replace the GLC. Directly and indirectly elected bodies were proposed, with obvious local democratic advantages, as well as the London residuary body. In the many hours of debate on this important issue, cogent arguments from both sides of the other place overwhelmingly supported the need for London-wide co-ordination and for integrated solutions to London's complex problems.

Integrated solutions are necessary even though, these days, the Minister sneers at such solutions. Not long ago she was a fervent and passionate advocate of them. She now has to follow a doctrine, but most people, including a majority of the other place, feel that integration for traffic functions is necessary. The Minister may have picked up her boss's habit of sneering at the word "integration", but nevertheless a majority of her party in the other place felt that integration of these functions was called for, and voted for it.

The way that the Minister read out her brief shows that perhaps she should spend some time in private discussons —we shall not embarrass her by urging her to make them public—with some of her political colleagues at the end of the Corridor, because on this occasion they have proved to be more progressive than she is. She normally likes to be thought of as the progressive, warm and humane voice of the Department of Transport and it must be a real problem for her to have to come to the House to read a brief that was more suitable for the abrasive tone of her boss the Secretary of State for Transport.

The Minister has failed to produce any sound arguments to explain how two Departments—[Interruption.] The hon. Lady has a patronising air. I know that she loves to see herself as the Marjorie Proops of the Government Front Bench. She dispenses advice such as fasten seat belts, do not drink too much, do not be naughty. That is her general philosophy. Tonight she has a brief that does not enable her to do that. She has to read something saying that integration and all the things in which she used to believe, and which she used warmly to endorse and recommend to the nation, if they would take the trouble to listen, are all in the past. These days, to keep her job, she has to prove that she is just as nasty, hard-line and Right wing as the Secretary of State for Transport.

The hon. Lady dismissed all the arguments for integration and for a London-wide authority for highways. The fact that she has said that it will not work does not make it so. The majority of the other place, and therefore the majority of the Conservatives in the other place, has decided that it will. For once, we have to believe it.

Mr. Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend agree that the performance of the Department of Transport in redirecting traffic from the M1 into traffic jams elsewhere makes it admirably suited to run every traffic scheme throughout London and the metropolitan counties?

Mr. Snape: We had exchanges on this point as recently as last Monday. Once again, when the Minister's inherent goodness was called in question by Labour Members, she stamped her foot and said that such criticism was terribly unfair. However, I do not wish to debate the M1 motorway now.

It is for the Minister of State to convince her hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes that she is not about to turn his constituency into a motorway. I do not know how convincing she was; no hon. Member will know until the hon. Gentleman comes to a decision at the end of the debate. However, I found the Minister of State's reply to her hon. Friend singularly unconvincing. It was as unconvincing as the rest of her speech.

The other place believes that there are considerable advantages in the amendment that the Government are seeking to remove. I am not allowed to refer directly to what was said in the other place, and I would not dream of doing so, but it is possible to paraphrase what was said by those Conservative Members of the other place who participated in the debate. With one exception, the Government had no supporters. Some of the speeches should leave the Minister of State in no doubt about the lack of support that their proposals command and about the widespread concern that is felt in both Houses about their inherently undemocratic nature.

[Mr. Snape]

The Opposition believe that there are numerous advantages in amendment No. 4. The advantages that were incorporated by the other place mean that the substantial though negative powers of the Secretary of State have been removed. The old fashioned Conservative party would have supported their removal. It professed not to like over-centralisation. If Conservative Members believe that the Secretary of State is hardly the person to leave in charge of a whelk stall on a wet Whit Monday, never mind being in charge of London's strategic highways and planning functions, they ought so to indicate when they have the opportunity to vote.

Amendment No. 4 retains economies of scale arising from the handling of large-scale programmes. The Minister of State was singularly unconvincing about the fragmentation of these functions if the Lords amendment is rejected. The amendment retains a degree of centralised leadership regarding the assessment of priorities and there would be central funding of projects where that is most needed. Is there to be competition between the boroughs? That would mean that those who shouted the loudest, or put in their bids first, would get the financial wherewithal to carry out their role, instead of sensible, centralised planning for highways.

The amendment would provide the body concerned with sufficient breadth and a sufficiently large budget to sustain specialist teams with the computer back up and data collection systems that were referred to in Committee. Few hon. Members who heard the Committee debate would doubt the need for capital-wide planning for these functions.

As for amendment No. 5, the Government were found to have few friends in the other place for their metropolitan county council proposals. The other place made it clear, to say the least, that it was very unhappy about the Government's proposals, particularly about the proposal to devolve highway and traffic functions to district councils. Lord Molson referred to the unsatisfactory nature of the Government's proposals. Although the Minister of State is pulling a face at me for referring to Lord Molson, I think that it is in order for me to mention in passing what he said. Let me try the Earl of Cranbrook on the hon. Lady. He was the Chairman of the Select Committee which had some harsh words to say about the Government's proposals. It is no use for the Minister of State to hide her face and whisper. If she is cross with the more senior members of her party in the other place, that is a matter for her. The Earl of Cranbrook referred to bridge and highway design, major road schemes, urban traffic control, data gathering and travel demand forecasting and said that all such matters ought to be dealt with by a strategic transport authority.

It is significant that the Government's proposals for the metropolitan county councils have been found to be completely unsatisfactory. The Select Committee of another place has also published a report on the Government's proposals. I assume that a majority of Conservative party members serve upon it. The noble Earl to whom I have referred is the Chairman of that Committee and at column 62 of the Select Committee's report he said:

"voluntary joint committees appear unlikely to be to resolve the inevitable policy conflicts, or lead authorities to resolve the conflict between their service role and their policy interests."

The report then said that a more practical option would be a joint authority. It is remarkable when the, in our view, undemocratially appointed members of another place lecture an elected Conservative Government about local democracy. If somebody had said to me a decade or so ago that this would happen, I should have expressed great surprise. The Government have no friends for these proposals.

Amendment (b) was moved by the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes. It is a wondrous thing, having the smallest Conservative majority in England——

Mr. Hanley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Snape: No, I have not finished yet. The hon. Gentleman had a fairly good run. I think that I am on fairly safe ground if I say that he has the smallest Conservative majority in any London constituency. The hon. Gentleman appeared on television, which gave him the opportunity to explain the difficulties that his Richmond constituents will face if the Government's proposals are accepted. I ask again: Has the Minister of State fully satisfied her hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes? If so, he will let the House know, but I shall be surprised if he has been satisfied by the Minister of State's explanation. She said that if the powers contained in the Highways Act were used, her hon. Friend's constituents would face long periods of uncertainty. That was the Minister of State's phrase; I wrote it down.

I hope that the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes will agree with me that uncertainty is exactly what his constituents are facing now. One of the reasons why they have written to him is to demonstrate that they are already suffering because of the long period of uncertainty caused by the Government's proposals. If the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes is satisfied by the Minister of State's explanation, he will say so, but, if not, he will not complain if I exploit that fact. He has had a good run this evening, even though there was insufficient time to debate the matter in Committee because of the appalling, undemocratic guillotine procedure to which the Government have had to resort to get the legislation through this House.

If, like me, the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes is denounced for scaremongering — that is what the Minister of State will say about him if he refuses to accept her explanation—he will have to live with it. Some of us will make sure that the Minister's comments receive fairly wide circulation not only in the hon. Gentleman's constituency but in the other parts of London where people are worried about these proposals.

7 pm

The author of the Bill—the Secretary of State for the Environment — is not here. The man who builds the Boeing 747 aircraft has to fly one, but the right hon. Gentleman has disappeared. The Bill's pilot — the Minister for Local Government—sits beside the Minister of State, Department of Transport. The right hon. Gentleman has had a fairly good run during the Bill's passage. In his humorous way, he has convinced many of his colleagues that the Bill's proposals are totally innocuous.

Mr. Corbyn: He has frightened them.

Mr. Snape: He has persuaded some and frightened others. Normally, he tries not to be too frightening. If there were ever two strong favourites for the political guillotine in October, it is the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Transport, although the Secretary of State for Transport appears to have been temporarily reprieved. If the Minister for Local Government fulfils his ambitions and enters the Cabinet in October, it will, no doubt, be seen as a suitable reward for this appalling legislation. Like the Minister of State, the right hon. Gentleman knows that he would not reject this proposal if he were really master of his own Department——

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Or master of his own ambitions.

Mr. Snape: —or master of his own ambitions, as my hon. Friend has reminded me.

I admire the Minister's sartorial elegance. His tie reminds me of a British Rail adverisement about black dots and red dots. In his case, the red dots are all the lies that have been told during the past 12 months or so about expenditure in local government and the democratic nature of the Bill's proposals. The black dots are some of the promises that have been made during the passage of the legislation, which will prove to be as worthless as other Government promises. Although the right hon. Gentleman might well receive his reward in October, it is likely to be short-lived. In the opinion of everyone concerned with the functions of local government, he has done local government no service.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Whilst I agree with the principle of abolition and the Bill's main provisions, I believe it right to consider whether there are better ways of preserving some local centres of great excellence. My constituency, which is on the boundary of west Yorkshire and north Yorkshire, falls within Leeds and the urban traffic control area of the west Yorkshire metropolitan county council. I accept the arguments that have been advanced by my hon. Friend the Minister of State that an area on the border of different traffic authorities—the problem is exacerbated in my constituency as the A1 goes through the middle of it—emphasises the importance of consultation and of working together. Nevertheless, I am concerned that the centre of excellence represented by west Yorkshire's urban traffic control system should be effectively preserved.

The system in west Yorkshire is one of the most advanced in this country, if not in the world. It is highly integrated and inter-active between a complementary range of services. Many of its ideas for road construction and embankments are especially innovative. The system is a considerable source of pride to the people of west Yorkshire.

It is possible for my hon. Friend the Minister of State to say that, with such a centralised system, a lead authority such as Leeds where the central computer is situated could be an effective way of running the system. However, when dealing with urban traffic control a number of priorities have to be balanced and local jealousies between different district authorities might preclude the effective working of the system, particularly if the lead authority is especially large.

How will the Government ensure that that system is not broken up if the district authorities are not able to agree?

Mrs. Chalker: The expertise of the west Yorkshire team is very impressive. I have seen the team in operation. It is right that we should safeguard that expertise. That is where the residuary body can supply the temporary home. The officers of the west Yorkshire county council have said that they believe that they have a role to play. They have formed a company and could use their expertise as a privately run centre of expertise on offer to all districts in the area. That is exactly what we would expect them to do. The co-ordinating committees would have the duty to consider joint arrangements.

Mr. Batiste: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that comment.

I am especially worried about the time scale on which change will occur. The people who work for the urban traffic control system in west Yorkshire have very marketable skills. Many of them have been approached by consultants and other companies outside the public sector seeking to snap up their services. These people are highly motivated. They want to work within west Yorkshire's integrated system. Obviously, if they see an uncertain future, they may be tempted by some of the offers. Indeed, I understand that some have already gone to work elsewhere.

I am seeking a clear commitment from the Government that, if the district authorities are unable to co-operate to preserve the urban traffic control system in west Yorkshire, they will step in and ensure that this centre of excellence, which is so highly prized by the people of the area, is retained. The Lords amendment provides one means of doing this. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State can give sufficiently firm assurances of another.

Mr. Simon Hughes: We are discussing one of the principal parts of the Bill. The other place took the view that transport planning should be "integrated" with the running of transport services. Two large amendments are being considered—the first concerns London and the second concerns the metropolitan authorities. I do not think that the Minister of State admits to understanding why we are so keen to persuade her that it would be better to agree with the Lords, so I shall remind her.

No one would say from choice that a body called the "London residuary body", which is a collective of people appointed by the Secretary of State, is the best organisation to take on the co-ordinated planning functions of transport in London. There are not many options available if the Government get rid of a directly elected strategic authority—the option of no co-ordinating body, or the option of something that is better than nothing.

The measure is strongly supported because many people, including most experts who have given evidence, would rather have a co-ordinating body that can consider the problems of London traffic and strategy as a whole. They do not want it to be a Minister.

To give a practical example, outside my street door there is a small road with a wall beyond it, and on the other side of the wall is a large open space that could well become a main road. I would far rather that the people making decisions about what happens to that space, and whether it ever becomes a through road from the Bricklayers Arms down to Woolwich or anywhere else, were a group of non-elected people with special responsibility for all London. I would prefer that body —which could eventually, because it might survive a bit longer than the Government, be converted back into a group of elected representatives—to make the decision rather than that the Secretary of State did. I trust a group of people, and preferably a group of elected people, far more than I trust the Secretary of State to make a decision about the strategic planning of roads in London and what should travel on them.

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

Mr. Corbyn: Do I understand that the Liberal party is now in favour of quangos rather than directly elected authorities to look after planning in London, or is the hon. Gentleman in favour of centralising power? I think that the country needs to know, and the SDP needs to be told.

Mr. Hughes: The SDP and the Liberal party will tell the hon. Gentleman—he now knows it because he has heard it often—that we entered into the debate on the Bill knowing our policy for London and not having to announce it this morning, as did the Leader of the GLC on the radio and elsewhere. Our policy has always been that London needs a regional authority directly elected which should cover these powers and many others. The new super-expanded GLC, for which the present GLC chairman and others will be fighting, is a concept that they have adopted from us, and we have been arguing it for a long time. I am sorry they are so slow at reaching the right conclusion, but that is not unusual. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about quangos?"] We do not want a quango, but we do not want the Secretary of State deciding what should happen in London transport in strategic planning terms.

As regards outside London, according to the amendment, the strategic highway functions which are now governed by the county councils should go to the passenger transport authority which is being set up under the Bill. In the course of debates, it has become clear that some very popular services are being produced by local government in the metropolitan counties. The Tyne and Wear Metro service is one, the public transport service in south Yorkshire is another. They are popular because they are good services, well used, and cheap and because expertise is co-ordinated in running them and in planning for the future. They link the number of people who want to use transport with the transport provided, be it roads or rail lines.

I ask the Minister to say that it is appropriate, as we proposed in the other place, to accept that in the metropolitan areas we, too, co-ordinate to avoid this muddle. The Government are asking us to believe that, in a series of discussions, the districts can agree on some of the most controversial issues. Such issues cannot be reconciled if one district believes that there should be a road while the other does not, and the two districts are adjacent.

I wish to comment on the amendment of the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley). He has been under a lot of pressure from his constituents, quite rightly. We all know the effect of a power which allows the Secretary of State to make decisions about the trunking of roads in London and all the implications on the hon. Gentleman's constituents and all the people who live along the south circular road, in the borough of Southwark and beyond of trunking in London. Given the Minister's intention that many roads like the south circular will be trunked, the result will be roads which have more traffic, more disruption and more environmental problems for the people who live and work alongside them.

The amendment is a modest one, and I am surprised that the Minister does not accept that the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes needs her support. However hard the hon. Gentleman will have tried, he will have had to tell his constituents that I and others have argued the case that there ought to be a public inquiry before roads in London are trunked, but it fell on deaf ears—Tory deaf ears, Tory Government deaf ears and even the deaf ears of the Minister, who has her home not all that far from the south circular.

If the Government do not think again, the Lords may well stand by what they said last time and the Government may risk losing the Bill as a whole instead of enacting it with amendments that come from sane and sanguine proposals made by people who are trying to improve an appalling piece of legislation.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is not alone in being worried about the accumulation of power to the Secretary of State which is the basis of the matters that we are now discussing. Due to a quirk of our procedure, amendment (a) tabled by the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) cannot be discussed in this section because it has already been debated.

There are obviously grave shortcomings about the residuary body for London. I am concerned about Lords amendment No. 4 only, and not about the other metropolitan counties. I had hoped that the Government would say that, because the other place has looked at the matter carefully, considered the various implications of what is proposed and decided that there should be a Londonwide body to carry out these functions, they would pay respect to that and, if we do not like the residuary body, would find some other way of operating this overall power.

7.15 pm

As someone who has had a certain amount of experience of local government at county and district level, I cannot see how matters will work out in practice when we get down to the nitty-gritty of planning roads in London in future with the various traffic aspects involved, even if it is only a system of traffic lights. I cannot see how that will be worked voluntarily by the boroughs.

The power going to the Secretary of State will be considerable, and can be exercised only with an increased number of staff. I know this is rather like twice cooked meat—we have been round this course so often in the past in relation to the Bill. It is a question of how one views local government and forms one's ideas on that basis. None the less, I think it is sad that the Government are to resist the Lords amendment.

Mr. Wareing: The need for an integrated countywide authority is very great in an area like Merseyside. I am surprised that the Minister does not recognise the true needs of Merseyside and how these are likely to be jeopardised if the Bill—and particularly this part of it—is enacted.

On Merseyside, the principal road network takes up 10 per cent. of the total network in the area. Although the principal roads represent only 10 per cent., they carry 50 per cent. of the traffic. Most of the business traffic and heavy goods vehicles cross the boundaries between the various districts. Fifty per cent. of car drivers commute across district boundaries in Merseyside. I cannot accept the point that the Minister made in reply to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). The travel-to-work area for most of those people who live in the built-up parts of the Wirral, the old constituency of Wallasey and Birkenhead is undoubtedly across the river Mersey into the rest of the conurbation, and particularly into Liverpool.

If one looks beyond the highways, one finds that 80 per cent. of traffic signals on Merseyside are under central computerised control. Therefore, a countywide operation is essential, for which the districts are not automatically prepared. Urban traffic control cannot be managed in isolation from all the other traffic and highway functions such as the collection and analysis of data traffic management, road improvements and route signing, all of which are closely bound up with urban traffic control.

There are many specialist services which must be shared for economic reasons. It is clear that they are too costly to duplicate. I cannot conceive that Sefton, the Wirral, Liverpool, St. Helens and Knowsley will be able to provide services to provide urban traffic control, research and development, bridge inspection and maintenance, engineering laboratories, geo-technical surveys and materials testing and development. All these services are highly costly.

It can be argued that it is possible for such services to be provided by someone else, and I think that the Government have someone else in mind. They are not concerned with replacing one democratic countywide authority with another such body, which might be elected indirectly by the people of Merseyside through their district councils. All the evidence would seem to point in the other direction. The authority that the Government have in mind is the Secretary of State for Transport. Heaven help us if he were to take control. One example of his control is the shambles of the Transport Bill that is before Parliament.

Districts do not necessarily have coincidental interests. There may be many conflicts between district councils over the need to provide, maintain or restore certain roadways. A district council could downgrade a vital strategic route either explicitly or by neglect at the expense of essential traffic that is generated elsewhere.

The real reason for the introduction of the Bill, and the reason why no adequate democratically elected control of authorities is envisaged within it, is that the Government dislike the present political control of the metropolitan counties. That is the sole reason for the Bill being before us. If Merseyside were run by the Conservative party, for example, the Bill would not be with us.

If the Minister of State is suggesting that the district councils will be able to afford to provide the services and functions that we are discussing, I believe that she is quite wrong. New clause 8 would forestall the real danger of continuing central Government encroachment on local responsibility for principal roads. That is why the House should approve it. It obviates the need for the reserve powers that the original Bill sought to give the Secretary of State.

There are those who say that the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Environment genuinely envisage the district councils having more power over highways, that they are democratically elected and that there is nothing sinister about the Bill. A real sign of the Department of Transport's intentions on strategic highway issues is to be found in a guidance note that the Department issued recently to district councils to assist them in planning for their enhanced transport responsibilities. The existing strategic functions of the metropolitan county councils is scarcely mentioned and there is no reference to the relevant manuals and advice notes. Against that background, and with the reserve powers that are contained in the Bill being directed specifically at matters of more than local significance, it seems that the Department rather than the districts will be the de facto highway authority for principal roads under the Bill's original provisions.

A provision for a countywide highway authority would impede the covert increase in Government power and responsibility. That is why new clause 8 is essential even to support the Government's argument, which I do not think they believe in themselves, that there must be co-operation between the districts to obtain a countywide integrated highway system.

I invite the Government to issue a new guidance note. I suggest that they refer to the competent manuals on the subject. Let them ensure that there is democratic control and that the expertise of the teams of workers in areas such as Merseyside is maintained. The Minister of State has told us that she has been to west Yorkshire and has spoken to the experts in that area. She commends what they have done. I hope that she has visited Merseyside as well, whose experts are at risk of being thrown to the winds. They are people of substance and the enactment of the Bill could oblige them to seek employment in other areas. If we are to allow Liverpool, Sefton, the Wirral, St. Helens and Knowsley to have the same expertise as has been available in those areas and built up since 1974, the hon. Lady should examine closely the contents of new clause 8. I hope that the Government will adopt the clause, but I appreciate that I am entering into a dialogue with the deaf.

Unless there is a sign in the Government's response to these amendments that their intention is to keep local government local, it is inevitable that we shall be presented with a national network that will involve more bureaucracy from the centre.

Mr. Tracey: It has always seemed to me that roads, especially local roads, involve issues that become personal. Roads and associated considerations arouse strong sentiments when they are discussed by those who live near them. The Government have recognised that by providing that in the main the highway authority should be the local council. I do not dispute the views that have been expressed by my hon. Friends the Members for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) and Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley). I do not dispute the views that we have heard from the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) because I do not know the facts.

However, I am only too well aware of the story of two roads. I live close by the south circular road, which is notorious in London. I have knowledge also of a road that is yet to be born, we hope, which is the Kingston relief road, which is within the royal borough of Kingston upon Thames. This road will have a serious effect on my constituents who are business men in Kingston.

[Mr. Tracey]

The south circular road has been under the strategic control—I use the term loosely—of the Greater London council. The road is well known as a collection of signposts. It weaves its way across south London. If I had a pound for every time someone has stopped me in one of our suburban highways off the so-called south circular road to ask me whether they were still on it, I should be a very wealthy man. The south circular road is a positive disgrace and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes will confirm that. Over the years the GLC has failed completely to maintain a proper highway for those who want to cross south London. As a local resident, I would rather that the road fell under the control of the Department of Transport than under the GLC. I would prefer the local authority in my area, the excellent borough of Wandsworth, to deal with local matters.

7.30 pm

The Kingston relief road is a classic case of how this fag-end Greater London council is behaving in a particularly partisan way. The GLC secured money from the taxpayer for some of the strategic road schemes in London by using various cases. One of the cases involved the Kingston relief road which, as is well known, is required in Kingston upon Thames. The GLC has that money from the taxpayer in its coffers, yet it refuses to hand it over to the council of the royal borough which is to take on the construction management of that road. It has instead, quite deliberately in my opinion, handed over the money to local authorities controlled by the Labour party in various parts of the GLC area.

That is the way that the strategic authority, the GLC, manages affairs, as far as I can see. I think that it will be better for the people of London, for whom I speak in part, if the responsibility rests with their local authority and, thereafter, with the Department of Transport. I support the Government recommendation that we should disagree with the Lords amendment.

Mr. Tony Banks: When the Minister was telling us why the Lords amendment should be opposed, she said that the reason was that it was not consistent with streamlining. I did not feel that she could say that without cracking into a large smile and then a big belly laugh because she cannot believe that the Bill streamlines anything in terms of either transportation or other services.

I ask the Minister to look carefully at the Bill to see how many successor bodies will inherit the powers of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. I do not have the time to read through them, but they include joint boards, residuary bodies, co-ordinating joint committees and quangos — a total of 62 bodies. Then there are the Government Departments — the Department of the Environment, the Department of Transport, the Office of Arts and Libraries, the Department of Education and Science and the Home Office. That is another five. Then there are approximately 127 other local authorities. The grand total is 195. Has the Minister ever studied how many bodies will inherit from the GLC and the metropolitan county councils?

Mrs. Chalker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, the chairman of the GLC, for giving way. He is speaking specifically about London so I shall confine my remarks to that. Has he considered how many times the requests of a London borough have to be rubber-stamped or gone through again by the GLC? Why does a borough that needs double yellow lines to make a turn-out from a service road safe have to go to the GLC transportation committee? That is the duplication that we are getting rid of. That is the streamlining that we are doing.

Mr. Banks: That is an interesting point. Has the Minister read the Lords amendment? The hon. Lady will see that the amendment that the Government now seek to overturn was careful to devolve traffic responsibilities on borough roads to the individual boroughs. They would become responsible for traffic signing, signals, parking, pedestrian crossings and speed regulation on the roads. That would considerably reduce duplication.

Whatever the Minister thinks about the GLC, she should not be opposing the Lords amendment. It gives her precisely what she just argued for at the Dispatch Box. She has not read the Lords amendment, and does not understand the consequences of the Bill with regard to streamlining. It is nonsense, and the hon. Lady knows it.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): I am surprised that the Opposition should be so vehemently opposed to greater powers being transferred to the boroughs. After all, they have been trying to criticise the Government in our long debates on the Bill, saying that not enough power is being given to the boroughs, that we are not devolving enough power, and that what Conservative Members have been arguing, which is that the whole purpose of the Bill is to give local people a say in local matters, is rubbish. Once they have an opportunity to see real powers being given to the boroughs, the Opposition oppose that.

From my point of view in the London borough of Enfield, it makes sense that the borough should be the responsible authority. It is already responsible for all but very few roads in the borough. The Bill will increase efficiency and reduce costs if the borough is responsible for the few remaining roads in the borough——

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way.?

Dr. Twinn: I shall not give way because I think that some of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends still wish to speak.

The GLC's behaviour on road matters has been extraordinary. It uses partisan tactics to stop boroughs that want to go ahead with road schemes in the interests of the local citizens from doing so. There is an example in the borough of Enfield, where the Barnet and Enfield lorry ban has been held up by the GLC, so that the local citizens will not benefit from relief from heavy traffic in the area. We have seen the same example in south London where the GLC, despite the advice of its friends in Southwark and Lewisham, has tried to stop the relief road from the Old Kent road being developed.

The local boroughs need to have those powers so that we can develop roads and road policy in London that are to the advantage of local citizens.

Mr. Cowans: My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) hit the nail on the head. It is patently obvious that the Minister of State either has not read the Bill or has not read the Lords amendment.

She said that there was duplication, but the contrary is the case. I have heard her speak on several occasions, and there are only two conclusions that the House can come to tonight—either that she had a poor brief or that she did not believe that brief. I think that it was both—she had a poor brief and she did not believe it.

The hon. Lady did not make a logical or reasoned case against the amendment when, having changed her mind, she said that those who supported the amendment were those who supported integration. She is perfectly correct. She used to be one of our number, but she has changed. May I drag her, kicking and screaming—it is a frank offer—into the real world?

Mrs. Chalker: I am already in the real world.

Mr. Cowans: I think that the hon. Lady has to come into the real world. She will realise that after I have finished.

There was a Bill on local government in 1972. Being adaptable, local government conformed to the Bill. One of its requirements was that local government should integrate. Was it surprising that it did just that? That was the wish of the Government of the day. The unreasonable argument, "It was like that in the past, and the old county boroughs had those functions," is so naive that Opposition Front Bench spokesmen should not have to expose it. It assumes that nothing happened until the county boroughs became county boroughs. However, the contrary is the case. Because the metropolitan county councils and metropolitan districts were set up under the remit of a Conservative Government in the 1972 Act, services were centralised and systems integrated, such as the Tyne and Wear Metro, many bus services, the central control of traffic movements, and specialised teams to co-ordinate their areas of responsibility. It is no surprise that that happened, but it is surprising that the Minister does not believe that it happened.

If the Lords amendment No. 4 is not accepted, local authorities will be required quickly to dismantle everything that was set up under that Conservative Government. Many Conservative Members seem to favour the Bill so long as it does not affect their constituencies, and where it does affect their areas they have asked the appropriate Minister to make concessions and deviate from the Bill. They must also come into the real world, because that cannot be done.

Mr. Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is significant that the Minister seeks to rush through the proposal to trunk 65 miles of London's roads without any public inquiry precisely because she has no answers to the type of objections that hon. Members have been raising on constituency grounds because of the obvious implications of trunking, widening those roads and further taking control of transport planning matters from local people in London?

Mr. Cowans: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I shall return to that relevant point.

I was talking about specialised teams. They are already starting to break up and, not unnaturally, to look elsewhere. The Minister is on record as saying that the Government recognise the specialised teams and would like to keep them, but they leave it to God and good neighbour and do nothing themselves to ensure that those teams continue to exist.

I now come to the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). Apart from integration, the Government believe that there is a strategic role, and that there should be overall planning and control in large areas. The basic difference between us is that the Opposition believe that there should be local democratic control. The Government have set themselves up in London as a de facto strategic body and, therefore, they obviously believe in overall planning and control. They believe that they should be in control and that the local voice should not be heard.

The strategic body in London for transport will be the Department of Transport, and it will have powers, to which it can add ad nauseam at any time. Even the Government's friends in the other place see through that kind of argument. On the Select Committee—I shall not quote from its report because I have no time—the Government do not even have a friend of their own persuasion. Time and time again professional people, hon. Members and their Lordships have rubbished the Government's arguments.

The Government have tried to hide the arguments by bringing the Bill back to the Floor of the House, and pushing it through at the speed of light. There is no substance behind anything that the Minister has said because integrated systems already exist. If we do not pass the Lords amendment, we shall leave overall control to voluntary co-ordination. I have news for the Minister—there is no such animal.

The Government want to ensure that the specialised teams continue to exist, but that will not happen. In the past where joint organisations have been set up and failed to agree, it has been to the detriment of those whom they serve.

I remind the Minister of the content of her speech. She spent 14 minutes on the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), seven minutes on amendment No. 4, which dealt with London, and the glorious sum of five minutes on a major alteration——

It being fifteen minutes to Eight o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the order this day, to put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 198, Noes 304.

Division No. 257] [7.45 pm

AYES

Abse, Leo
Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Rt Hon J.
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy

Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Critchley, Julian
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Haynes, Frank
Healey, Rt Hon Denis
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Janner, Hon Greville
John, Brynmor
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Lamond, James
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsle,)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Edward
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McKelvey, William
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Molyneaux, Rt Hon James
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Penhaligon, David
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Rowlands, Ted
Ryman, John
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Short, Mrs R.(W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C.(Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steel, Rt Hon David
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wallace, James
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Wrigglesworth, Ian
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Jeremy Hanley and
Mr. Simon Hughes.

NOES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amery, Rt Hon Julian
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Rt Hon Sir Frederic
Benyon, William
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Foulkes, George
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodhart, Sir Philip
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)

Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Mates, Michael
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parkinson, Rt Hon Cecil
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Walters, Dennis
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Carol Mather and
Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones.

Question accordingly negatived.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Motion made, and Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment—[Mrs. Chalker.]

The House divided: Ayes 285, Noes 200.

Division No. 258] [8 pm

AYES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Rt Hon Sir Frederic
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew

Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Proctor, K. Harvey
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Carol Mather and
Mr. Robert Boscawen.

NOES

Abse, Leo
Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Benyon, William
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Brown, Ron (E'burgh, Leith)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell, Ian
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Goodhart, Sir Philip
Gould, Bryan
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Healey, Rt Hon Denis
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Janner, Hon Greville
John, Brynmor
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Kirkwood, Archy
Knox, David
Lambie, David
Lamond, James
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Edward
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McKelvey, William
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Morrison, Hon C. (Devizes)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Penhaligon, David
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)

Richardson, Ms Jo	Stott, Roger
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)	Strang, Gavin
Robertson, George	Straw, Jack
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)	Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Rogers, Allan	Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Rooker, J. W.	Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)	Tinn, James
Rowlands, Ted	Torney, Tom
Ryman, John	Wallace, James
Sedgemore, Brian	Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Sheerman, Barry	Wareing, Robert
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.	Weetch, Ken
Shore, Rt Hon Peter	White, James
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)	Williams, Rt Hon A.
Short, Mrs R.(W'hampt'n NE)	Winnick, David
Silkin, Rt Hon J.	Woodall, Alec
Skinner, Dennis	Wrigglesworth, Ian
Smith, C.(Isl'ton S & F'bury)	Young, David (Bolton SE)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter	Tellers for the Noes:
Soley, Clive	Mr. Frank Haynes and
Steel, Rt Hon David	Mr. Robin Corbett.

Question accordingly agreed to.
Lords amendment No. 4 disagreed to.
Lords amendments Nos. 5 to 8 disagreed to.
Lords amendment: No. 9, leave out clause 8.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following:

Lords amendment No. 10, on page 4, line 35, leave out subsection (1) and insert—

"( ) On the appointed day there shall be established in Greater London and each metropolitan county a body corporate to be known by the name of the London Waste Disposal Authority or by the name of the county with the addition of the words "Waste Disposal Authority", as the case may be.

( ) Each authority shall consist of members of the constituenct councils appointed by them to be members of the Authority.

( ) The constituent councils in relation to the London Waste Disposal Authority shall be the London borough councils and the Common Council.

( ) The constituent councils in relation to a metropolitan waste disposal authority shall be the councils for the metropolitan districts comprised in the county.

( ) Each authority shall be a joint authority within the meaning of Part IV of this Act and the provisions of that Part shall apply to this section as if this section were included in that Part.

( ) The functions specified in subsection (2) below shall be discharged by the authority in respect of the area for which it is established."

Amendments thereto: (a) in page 4, line 37, leave out 'authorities' and insert 'councils'.

(b) in page 4, line 42, after 'purpose', insert 'before 15th November 1985'.

(c) in page 5, line 3, leave out 'that' and insert 'the Abolition'.

(d) in page 5, line 4, leave out

'may, after consulting the authorities concerned'

and insert 'shall'.

(e) in page 5, line 8, at end insert—

'(1A) For the purposes of subsection (1) above the Secretary of State shall have particular regard to the need for satisfactory arrangements in respect of hazardous waste.

(1B) No person shall be a member of an authority established by an order under subsection (1) above unless he is a member of one of the councils for whose areas the authority is established; and any such order may make provision for enabling the Secretary of State to require the authority established by the order to submit to him a scheme for the winding-up of the authority and the transfer to those councils of its functions, property, staff, rights and liabilities.'.

Lords amendment No. 11, in page 5, line 13, leave out subsections (3) to (5).

Lords amendment No. 73, leave out Schedule 6.

Mr. Baker: When the Bill left this House it provided for the responsibility of the GLC and the MCC for waste disposal and regulation to be devolved to borough and district councils. It also provided a reserve power so that if my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment was not satisfied that the boroughs and districts had agreed on adequate voluntary joint arrangements for the discharge of those functions he could impose statutory authorities for some or all of those functions in all or part of any metropolitan area. As amended in the other place, the Bill now provides for waste regulation and disposal functions to be transferred to a single joint authority in each area, without any opportunity for the boroughs and districts to put forward proposals themselves to assume those functions on abolition.

The other place was concerned in particular that there should be certainty about future arrangements for waste disposal, and especially for the disposal of hazardous waste. These concerns are shared by hon. Members in all parts of this House. The Government have always recognised the need for adequate arrangements for waste disposal after abolition. With regard to hazardous waste, the guidance note issued to authorities by the Department on 28 March made it clear that we wished to see the creation of a separate unit in each metropolitan area to co-ordinate these and other non-operational functions. These units could house the specialist staff and facilities which are necessary for these functions and about which there was particular concern in another place.

We do not accept that joint authorities need to be the only or necessarily the best means of achieving adequate arrangements and it is right that the Government should take account of the strong concerns expressed both in this House and in another place.

I believe that the boroughs and districts are in the first instance best placed to judge the most appropriate arrangements for their areas. The Conservative boroughs to which I have spoken take that view. I have also spoken in an unofficial capacity to several of the Labour-controlled districts outside London and they tell me that they take the same view. I appreciate that the Labour-controlled districts have some difficulty in expressing their full opinions on this issue. We propose, therefore, that waste regulation and disposal functions should be devolved to the boroughs and districts. If, however, my right hon. Friend is satisfied that joint arrangements could, with advantage, be made for the discharge of some or all of those functions in the whole or part of any metropolitan area, and adequate joint arrangements have not been made by 15 November 1985, he will have a duty—I stress that it will be a duty—by order to establish a statutory authority to discharge those functions.

Mr. Straw: Why have the Government retreated from the September deadline in the earlier draft stressed in another place as being the time limit for the Secretary of State to be satisfied?

Mr. Baker: In the continuing discussions there is considerable co-operation between many of the Conservative boroughs and the Liberal boroughs in London and in Conservative boroughs in the districts, but the Labour boroughs in London have not joined in any discussions and in the metropolitan counties the Labour districts have not formally engaged in discussions. We have every reason to believe that they have well developed plans, particularly in the constituency of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). In many areas outside London it is clear that some subterranean planning has been carried out. I understand that the Labour leaders of the district councils have been unable to come out officially because it is still their policy not to co-operate before Royal Assent. The Government therefore thought it appropriate to extend the deadline to 15 November as the latest date by which the Secretary of State will have to exercise his duty.

[Mr. Baker]

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): As the right hon. Gentleman formerly represented a constituency next to mine, he knows the problems of north-west London. How does he envisage the 32 London boroughs being able in any way to come to separate arrangements without massive joint arrangements, especially north and south of the Thames? There will have to be at least two, or even four, separate organisations. If it is intended to wait for some agreement between the different political complexions, how can the practical problems be solved by November?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman represents an area which is part of the "West Waste" group of boroughs, and plans for dealing with the disposal of waste in that area are far advanced. He will appreciate that the powers that my right hon. Friend will have under the Bill as amended will allow the imposition in parts of London of a joint arrangement if such an arrangement is not arrived at voluntarily. I suspect that in that area an arrangement will be arrived at voluntarily.

8.15 pm

The five southern boroughs — Bromley, Croydon, Sutton, Merton and Kingston upon Thames—have had extensive discussions among themselves as to how they will co-operate, and I believe that they will be able to come to a voluntary arrangement. A great deal of disposal is carried out on a geographical basis. The refuse that arises from the western parts of London will be disposed of out towards the west, that from the south to the south, and so on around London. The hon. Gentleman should not underestimate the interests of the boroughs themselves to co-operate voluntarily to provide this service.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): Taking London as an example, my right hon. Friend said that he could envisage circumstances in which if there was not co-operation in certain boroughs a joint authority would be set up under the instruction of the Secretary of State to look after the remainder of the boroughs which have not co-operated. Can my right hon. Friend hazard a guess whether if arrangements made by some boroughs collectively, including the letting of contracts, and so on, do not appear "satisfactory", the Secretary of State will have powers to overrule those contracts?

Mr. Baker: The Secretary of State will have powers which he has a duty to exercise by 15 November and which will allow him to set up a joint authority for the whole of a particular conurbation or for parts of it. In the southern part, the northern part, or wherever it may be, the various district councils may have come together to work in a positive way. One of the factors which my right hon. Friend will have to consider is the way in which existing contracts are honoured. The contracts may be with the private sector or with the surrounding county councils.

In making his decision the Secretary of State will be required to have particular regard to satisfactory arrangements for hazardous waste. The Secretary of State will also retain the discretionary power to establish a statutory authority if initially satisfactory voluntary joint arrangements subsequently break down. To ensure, however, that there remains a real prospect of the devolution of functions even if statutory authorities are established under these arrangements, the authorities would be required within a reasonable time, probably 12 months, of their establishment to submit proposals to my right hon. Friend for their functions to be devolved to their constituent councils.

It may help the House if I explain in some detail the types of voluntary arrangements which my right hon. Friend would be prepared to consider and the steps which would precede his decision on whether to establish a statutory authority in any metropolitan area. The guidance note issued in March set out the types of arrangement which it seems to us would be sensible in each metropolitan area. As I have already made clear, we envisage special arrangements for hazardous waste. Those arrangements will generally need to be countywide, unless it can be clearly demonstrated that they would be satisfactory on some other basis. With regard to operational functions, some districts can probably operate in isolation, and they may well be Labour districts, but in other areas it will make sense for the districts to group together. It may even make sense in at least one county for all the districts to come together in an operational group. Where boroughs and districts produce proposals for groupings they can be either non-statutory or be enshrined in an order made under the reserve power. I emphasise again that we want to see arrangements made which are appropriate to each area, but we have to be assured that they are satisfactory arrangements.

We shall invite those boroughs and districts which have not already done so to submit to us, by 30 September, their detailed proposals for voluntary joint arrangements, in particular for hazardous waste. As soon as possible, and ideally within 10 days of that deadline, we shall — following discussion with those authorities as necessary — let them have our reactions to their proposals. We shall then invite them, as soon as possible, to work up those proposals, modified as necessary in the light of our comments, into the draft terms of a mutually binding agreement between them. If the terms of those draft agreements seem to us satisfactory, we shall then ask the boroughs and districts to submit signed agreements by early November. My right hon. Friend will then be able, in the light of those signed agreements, to reach his final decision by the statutory deadline of 15 November on whether the arrangements embodied in those agreements are, in his judgment, satisfactory. If he judges them to be satisfactory, he need do nothing.

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): Does the Minister identify excess water as hazardous waste? Does he intend to refer to excess water?

Mr. Baker: Excess water may have an effect upon hazardous waste if there is seepage. It is probably more directly connected with that part of the Bill concerned with drainage.

Mr. Harrison: Surely it is a matter that comes under the items which the Minister has mentioned.

Mr. Baker: If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to raise a particular point, I shall, of course, deal with it.

This is my first opportunity to tell the right hon. Gentleman how sorry I was to hear that he intends to resign at the next election.

Mr. Harrison: The Minister must not say that. I do not intend to resign. I do not intend to seek re-election. There is a difference between resignation and retirement. One is the more elegant way of expressing oneself.

Mr. Baker: I do not want to intrude into the niceties of what is happening in the Labour party. I was lucky to serve under the right hon. Gentleman, when he was a Whip, on my first Committee in 1968 on the Finance Bill. There was a historic moment when he was half inside and half outside the door for a Division, and I understand that it is so recorded in Hansard.

I return now to the question of waste disposal. The functions will be devolved to the borough and district councils to be performed in accordance with those agreements on abolition day. If, on the other hand, my right hon. Friend judges those arrangements not to be satisfactory, he will be under a duty to establish statutory authorities to discharge those functions. We shall issue detailed advice to the boroughs and districts on the steps in that process, and on the criteria against which my right hon. Friend would judge the adequacy of their proposals for joint arrangements, immediately after Royal Assent.

I believe that the amendments we have now tabled represent a considerable strengthening of the reserve power. I am confident that, by placing my right hon. Friend under a duty to establish statutory authorities if he is not satisfied by 15 November 1985 that the voluntary arrangements are adequate, they provide the guarantee of satisfactory arrangements on abolition which, legitimately, both Houses have sought. At the same time, we have retained the flexibility to enable us to take account of the wishes of the boroughs and districts. The requirement for my right hon. Friend to have particular regard to the need for satisfactory arrangements for hazardous waste will secure the future of those vital functions. I believe that the provisions will ensure that satisfactory arrangements for waste disposal are in being on the appointed day.

The House of Lords, quite rightly, debated hazardous waste at some length. We are at one with Lord Cranbrook on the importance of maintaining existing centres of expertise and scientific advice, especially for hazardous waste. We are most grateful to him and to a Select Committee of another place, which he chaired, for their valuable advice on these aspects. We also recognise and appreciate the contribution of Lord Gregson both in the 1981 report with which he was associated and his subsequent actions. However, we consider that their concerns are fully met by our proposals.

I wish to deal with two points of some concern. The first is the concern of the home counties about the waste arrangements for London. I am, of course, well aware of the views of the home counties, and in particular their common concern to see close co-ordination of the boroughs' arrangements for the disposal of London's waste. I have met representatives of the home counties on two occasions during the past eight months, and the proposals which we are now making in respect of waste regulation and disposal are intended to try to meet those concerns. Clause 9, as now proposed, would provide the certainty of stable voluntary arrangements, underpinned by binding contractual commitments, which were sought by the home counties. I have offered to meet the home counties' representatives again later in the summer when a more detailed picture of the arrangements proposed by the boroughs will be available.

I wish now to deal with the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) about guarantees for the private sector companies which have waste disposal contracts with the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. It will, of course, be important to ensure that the major contractors which actually dispose of most of the waste in London and the metropolitian counties do not suffer as a result of abolition.

I am conscious of the importance of the role played by those contractors, and the heavy investment involved. We have made it clear to successor authorities that any large-scale abandonment of existing contracts would be unacceptable, and I am glad to have the opportunity this evening to reassure the House that this remains the Government's position.

In asking the House to disagree with the Lords in the said amendment, and to agree with the amendment that we are proposing, I believe that that will provide adequate and appropriate arrangements for waste disposal in both London and the metropolitan counties. I ask the House to remember that we have had representations, both officially and unofficially, from many of the London boroughs and district councils saying that they can co-operate voluntarily, one with the other, or in groups of three or four. The functions of disposal of waste can be properly devolved and delegated.

I wish to emphasise again that it is important that hazardous waste is dealt with on a wide basis.

8.30 pm

Mr. Straw: I shall be as brief as possible as we now have only 18 minutes before the guillotine falls.

The Minister is a master in the art of soft soap. His praise for the noble Lord Cranbrook would be rather more credible had he accepted — and accepted in full — the advice of the Select Committee that the noble Lord chairs. Speaking on behalf of the Select Committee, the noble Lord pointed out that it was evident, and had always been evident, from the Government's reserve proposals that they lacked confidence in the system of devolution. They believed that it would take two months to take a step that we believe should have been taken now. The nettle should have been grasped and it should have been acknowledged that waste disposal, as opposed to waste collection, could not possibly be handled on a borough-by-borough basis.

The Minister accepted that in his speech today. He said that he thought that in one county — he did not say which, but he may intervene to tell us—all the districts could make up one group. That is a countywide function. He suggested that in other counties and the GLC there might be a number of groups. It is extremely unlikely, even with his political desire to devolve waste disposal, that there will be more than a handful of boroughs that will handle disposal themselves. The Government should have recognised that the counties and the GLC have a great success story. No one has criticised them in their efforts to improve and co-ordinate waste disposal since they were established 10 years ago.

[Mr. Straw]

It is quite unacceptable political vandalism to embark on proposals such as these and then bit by bit, and extremely reluctantly, to back off. The Government only back off when they have lost the vote, not the arguments. If my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) had intervened, he would have pointed out that we put forward amendments in terms similar to those put forward in the other place in respect of hazardous waste. They were brushed aside in Committee and in this place because of the Government's majority.

The Minister presents his change as a concession to the Lords amendments. I am unconvinced. It is true that, in place of a general reserve power, the Secretary of State now has to be satisfied about the district-wide arrangements or to trigger the countywide proposals. That is on the plus side. But, on the minus side, he has moved the deadline by some six weeks. If Labour-controlled authorities were co-operating as the Minister suggests—I do not claim much for myself but I do claim to be more in touch with Labour leaders than he is—that would be an argument for advancing the deadline from September, not for extending the deadline to November.

By November, four months after Royal Assent, if Royal Assent is received this side of summer, what will happen to the staff who run those county authorities? Faced with such uncertainty, many of the best staff in those units will seek other employment. That is the nature of the world. If the Minister leaves it until 15 November to attempt to establish joint arrangements or to satisfy himself that the district-wide arrangements are satisfactory he will find that the good staff are not available. I very much doubt that the Minister has taken account of that.

Waste disposal has always been the subject of music hall jokes, but the truth is that it is an efficient and effective system of collection and disposal and is one of the buttresses to civilisation. Without effective waste collection and disposal we would have no public health, and no decent cities and towns in which to live.

We believe that these arrangements are ill thought out. They will cause administrative chaos and may well cause disruption in the disposal of waste. The other place had it right when it proposed that there should be countywide arrangements, and we shall support those arrangements tonight.

Mr. Cartwright: This is another area in which all the expert opinion is against what the Government are proposing. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) quoted the report of the Select Committee of the other place. In June of this year the Department of the Environment's hazardous waste inspectorate reported on the matter of hazardous waste in the United Kingdom. The report concluded that only the GLC and the West Midlands county council were dealing successfully with the problem, largely because of their size and their expertise. These officials, the Government's own officials, said:

"The HWI would view with alarm any prospects of these experienced hazardous waste management teams being disbanded upon abolition of the GLC . . . The HWI attaches great importance to the retention of these experienced waste management teams and considers that any other action would result in chaos in hazardous waste management."

That is the expert view of the people who were doing the job.

The Government's amendment does not inspire a great deal of confidence. It gives the Secretary of State authority to require the winding up of any of the new bodies which may be created. That hardly gives us great faith that they will last long. It certainly leads to the view that the Government are hankering after giving these powers to borough and district councils.

The date of 15 November 1985 is only the most recent of a long line of final dates from the Government on this issue. We were originally told that everything would be ready by July 1984. It was then December 1984. In Committee, the Minister told us that he was prepared to stay his hand until the end of February 1985. On Report, he told us that everything would have to be settled by September 1985. That date was given again in another place. We now have a further slippage to 15 November 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: If the hon. Gentleman had heard what I said earlier, he would appreciate that I invited proposals until September. I have said that there must be contractually binding agreements by 15 November. At that stage obligations with the home counties or private contractors will have to be explained. Extra is being required.

Mr. Cartwright: The Minister is a past master when it comes to command of English prose but, on Report, he said that he would have to have settled on a future set of arrangements by the beginning of September 1985. That does not seem to be the receipt of proposals, but something much firmer than the Minister is now suggesting.

There must be some doubt whether 15 November 1985 allows enough time for a statutory joint authority to be created. As the hon. Member for Blackburn said, it will have to consider key staff, sort out budgets and prepare for the imposition of a precept. Are we to believe that all that can be done in four months? Those of us who have some experience of these problems have reason to doubt it.

We are being offered a choice not between a voluntary and a statutory system, but between a single strategic authority with the benefits of technical expertise, economies of scale and efficiency that that offers and a hotch-potch of groups of boroughs with some voluntary and some imposed functions. Faced with such a choice, the only intelligent and reasonable thing to do is to support the Lords amendment.

Mr. Harrison: I should like to express my appreciation to the Minister for wishing me all the best for the future.

I have trotted around the Chamber for quite a while and I have often thought that hon. Members were considered to be out of order for no reason that I could discern. As a Back Bencher, I find that whatever subject I raise, I am out of order. I therefore consulted my Front Bench to see if I would be in order talking about water and drainage. They said, "Oh, no. The debate is on waste disposal and the rest." The Minister gave way to me and allowed me to talk about water. When I thought of hazardous waste, I thought of what comes up the toilet instead of going down, which is what happens when there is flooding. Does that get in order, Mr. Deputy Speaker? I have been in Wakefield for some time. I consider the matter to be in order and would like to enlarge.

Mr. Tony Banks: Do not forget that there is a guillotine.

Mr. Harrison: I do not know how long I have.

Mr. Straw: Three minutes.

Mr. Harrison: Thanks very much. I am anxious to cover matters that will not be debated again—flooding and drainage. Wakefield is flooded almost yearly. I have pleaded with the Lords and at least 12 Ministers and asked many questions about flooding but I am not getting much nearer a solution, as the matter is dealt with voluntarily. Even the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's Green Paper said that the Government are considering two possible options. What will happen when the Government get rid of the metropolitan councils? A previous Tory Administration delegated authority but forgot to include provision for land drainage. In the 1974 local government reorganisation, the Tories denuded my county, metropolitan district councils and my local water authority of power. They are having to go around with a begging bowl. The begging bowl gets 33 per cent. for a feasibility study from the Wakefield metropolitan area; 25 per cent. from the county; 10 per cent. from the quango Yorkshire water authority; and 32 per cent, from MAFF. If it had been two years later there would have been no percentage agreement, because in 12 months MAFF has dropped from 45 to 32 per cent. Which designated authority will deal with land drainage and flooding problems that will exist in my constituency if something is not done?

There may be people listening to me with whom I have pleaded in another place. They will not give me a copy of the feasibility study report which I could give to Wakefield metropolitan council. I have been refused a copy and I would be helped in my endeavours to try to solve the problems of flooding in Wakefield if I had a copy. Will the Minister look into this matter so that on this occasion the Government do not compound the mistake they made in 1974 on the reorganisation of local government?

Mr. Tracey: I have had a strong feeling from the beginning of discussion on this Bill that Opposition Members do not have their hearts in this amendment. That has been confirmed by what my right hon. Friend told the House, that behind the scenes, as so often happens, Labour authorities are keen and willing to take on these arrangements because they can see very distinct benefits. In the view of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), my right hon. Friend is a master of soft soap. Of course, the hon. Member for Blackburn is well known as a dramatic and very often melodramatic speaker. I do not object to that, it is often very entertaining, but it does not necessarily add up to much.

We had a further example of that tonight when he sought, and he has just sought again through a sedentary intervention, to say that Labour authorities are very happy with the amendments they are putting forward and they are not at all happy with the Government's proposals. That remains to be seen, but so far I have not been able to put my finger on much evidence from the Opposition Benches that they are serious about the amendments. The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) gave us a detective story of dates in seeking to prove that the Government were up to foul deeds behind the scenes on exactly when these arrangements were to be made. The point seems very clear. The people of this country, of London and the metropolitan counties, are concerned that their dustbins are emptied efficiently and that the waste is carted off to whatever multiple resource is there to burn it, dump it or bury it. The arrangements for London, for which I speak with a certain amount of authority I hope, amount to the Greater London council entering into contracts with certain large enterprises to dispose of the waste well outside the boundaries of the capital. It seems ridiculous that we should need a joint board simply to finalise a contract to do such a thing.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Tracey: I am very short of time so perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue. The local authorities could just as well finalise that contract on their own joint arrangement as can this joint board. There is great scope for the local authorities to be able to finalise contracts for greater cost-effectiveness, just as happened with Southend's local council and in various boroughs in London, including the notable example of Wandsworth, so often a forerunner in these matters. Surely that is what we are seeking here. The Government are very wise to seek to disagree with the Lords amendment, and I fully support what my right hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Pavitt: The House knows my concern with public health and hazardous waste. We have a system which is working and fully monitored and it is irresponsible suddenly to cut that up and destroy it. I accuse the Government of playing with the health of the people in all the county boroughs concerned.

Amendment (b) negatived

Lords amendment No. 9 disagreed to.

Clause 9

JOINT ARRANGEMENTS FOR WASTE DISPOSAL FUNCTIONS

Lords amendment: No. 10, in page 4, line 35, leave out subsection (1) and insert—

"( ) On the appointed day there shall be established in Greater London and each metropolitan county a body corporate to be known by the name of the London Waste Disposal Authority or by the name of the county with the addition of the words "Waste Disposal Authority", as the case may be.

( ) Each authority shall consist of members of the constituent councils appointed by them to be members of the Authority.

( ) The constituent councils in relation to the London Waste Disposal Authority shall be the London borough councils and the Common Council.

( ) The constituent councils in relation to a metropolitan waste disposal authority shall be the councils for the metropolitan districts comprised in the county.

( ) Each authority shall be a joint authority within the meaning of Part IV of this Act and the provisions of that Part shall apply to this section as if this section were included in that Part.

( ) The functions specified in subsection (2) below shall be discharged by the authority in respect of the area for which it is established."

Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

The House divided: Ayes 301, Noes 194.

Division No. 259] [8.45 pm

AYES

Aitken, Jonathan	Ancram, Michael
Alexander, Richard	Ashby, David
Alison, Rt Hon Michael	Aspinwall, Jack
Amess, David	Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)

Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Rt Hon Sir Frederic
Benyon, William
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Holt, Richard
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lamont, Norman
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lightbown, David
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Carol Mather and
Mr. Robert Boscawen.

NOES

Abse, Leo
Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty

Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Brown, Ron (E'burgh, Leith)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Rt Hon J.
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell, Ian
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Haynes, Frank
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Janner, Hon Greville
John, Brynmor
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Lamond, James
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Edward
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Penhaligon, David
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Rowlands, Ted
Ryman, John
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Short, Mrs R.(W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C.(Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wainwright, R.
Wallace, James
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
White, James
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Wrigglesworth, Ian
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe and
Mr. Allen McKay.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Amendments made in lieu of Lords amendment No. 10:

(a) in page 4, line 37, leave out 'authorities' and insert 'councils'.

(b) in page 4, line 42, after 'purpose', insert 'before 15th November 1985'.

(c) in page 5, line 3, leave out 'that' and insert 'the abolition'.

(d) in page 5, line 4, leave out
'may, after consulting the authorities concerned'
and insert 'shall'.

(e) in page 5, line 8, at end insert—

'(1A) For the purposes of subsection (1) above the Secretary of State shall have particular regard to the need for satisfactory arrangements in respect of hazardous waste.

(1B) No person shall be a member of an authority established by an order under subsection (1) above unless he is a member of one of the councils for whose areas the authority is established; and any such order may make provision for enabling the Secretary of State to require the authority established by the order to submit to him a scheme for the winding-up of the authority and the transfer to those councils of its functions, property, staff, rights and liabilities.'.—[Mr. Kenneth Baker.]

Lords amendment No 11 disagreed to.

Clause 10

LAND DRAINAGE AND FLOOD PREVENTION FUNCTIONS

Lords amendment No. 12 agreed to.

Clause 20

CONSULTATION WITH INNER LONDON BOROUGHS AND THE CITY

Lords amendment No. 13: In page 15, line 9, leave out "or as the Secretary of State maydirect"

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this may we take the following Lords amendments: No. 14, in page 15, line 18, leave out subsections (1) and (2) and insert—

"(1) The Secretary of State may before 31 March 1991 review the exercise by the Authority of its functions relating to education."

No. 15, in page 15, line 32, leave out from "section" to "and" in line 34.

No. 16, in page 15, line 34, leave out "the first".

Amendment (a) thereto in lieu of the said Lords amendment, in page 15, line 34, leave out 'first such'.

No. 17, in page 15, line 36, leave out subsection (4).

No. 18, in page 15, line 43, leave out subsections (5) and (6).

Amendments thereto:

(a) in page 72, line 11, leave out '21'.

(b) in page 72, line 16, leave out '21 or'.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have just debated amendments about waste disposal. West Midlands county council handles 40 per cent. of this country's hazardous waste. It should be put on the record that an hon. Member who represents the area, who is a county coucillor for the area and who has served on a waste disposal committee was the one hon. Member not called in the debate.

9 pm.

Mr. Dunn: Amendment No. 13 deletes from clause 20 the power for my right hon. Friend to direct the new ILEA to provide specified information to the inner London boroughs or the City for the purposes of the consultation required by this clause between the new authority and those councils. As my noble Friend, Lord Gowrie, made clear in introducing this amendment in another place, the power for my right hon. Friend to direct the new ILEA to provide specified information is of a different kind from his other powers under the clause. If the new ILEA does not comply with a reasonable request for information, the councils will be able to seek effective remedy through the court. The involvement of my right hon. Friend is therefore on reflection unnecessary.

The amendments to clause 21 delete the requirement for my right hon. Friend to undertake an initial review of the new ILEA by 31 March 1991 and his discretionary power to undertake subsequent reviews. They also delete the provision for any reallocation of the new ILEA's functions to be achieved by order. The amendments substitute a discretionary power to undertake a review by 31 March 1991 but make no provision for the implementation of any changes in the light of that review. Such changes would therefore require fresh primary legislation.

The strongest objection to clause 21, both in this House and in another place, has been to the proposal that there should be a power for my right hon. Friend to reallocate the new ILEA's functions by order. We have listened carefully to the arguments, put very strongly in another place, that, if the new administrative structure which we are establishing for education in inner London needs adjustment in the light of experience, then that adjustment should be made by primary legislation. We have been convinced by those arguments.

I am not, therefore, asking the House to disagree with the amendments made in another place. On two points, however, further amendments are necessary to give them full effect. First, amendment No. 16 retains a reference in the clause to "such report". There is now only provision for one report. We propose that the clause should refer to "the report" and this is achieved by our substitute amendment. Secondly, although amendment No. 18 deletes my right hon. Friend's order-making power, reference to that power remains in clause 100. Our consequential amendments delete those references.

I must make clear that our acceptance of these amendments does not mean that we are any less concerned by the policies of ILEA which result in its spending between 29 per cent. and 59 per cent. more per school pupil than the inner city partnership authorities outside London, which have similar problems, spend without achieving results that are proportionately better. We remain no less determined to improve ILEA's cost effectiveness. We are confident that the new elected ILEA offers the best prospect for improving standards and cost effectiveness and we shall look to the members elected next May to vindicate our expectation. But, if experience shows that further structural change is required, the need to secure primary legislation will not deter us from taking the necessary steps.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): We on the Opposition Benches welcome the Minister's conversion, although I am not absolutely certain whether it is genuine. He spoiled his speech by his attack on ILEA. He would have shown more grace had he accepted all the arguments for ILEA. As the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, I welcome the Government's backing off from the idea that something as important and as substantial as ILEA can be abolished as the result of a statutory instrument after 90 minutes' debate.

The cynic in me wonders why the Government left such a provision in the Bill in the first place, and comes to the conclusion that they did so that it could be left out at this point as a token concession to the other place. It is noticeable that this is one of the few concessions that the Government have made, and it does not have much substance.

The real concession was made at the start when the Government agreed to abandon their idea to abolish ILEA. From that point, the Government wanted a face-saving device, having led some of the London boroughs to believe that they might take on education powers. The Government wanted to put something in the Bill instead, so that the idea of a review and a possible later devolving of powers remained. I hope that the Government will make clear that they have abandoned any idea of carrying out a review, because the new body should be allowed to get on with its job without the continued threat of blackmail from the Government that if it does not do just what the Government want it will be abolished.

The Government are retaining massive draconian powers over ILEA. Not only are there the rate-capping provisions of other legislation but there are staff control and review provisions. It is sad that the Minister returned again to cost effectiveness. No one has managed to show that ILEA does not do a better job than some of the other authorities that spend less money. He trotted out the exam results but he and the Secretary of State would agree that exam results are not the only criteria by which to measure success. If one uses exam results, one has to look at other factors such as the social background of the children.

It would have been far better if the Minister had reduced some of the controls over ILEA, recognised the first-class job that it is doing and also acknowledged that it should be responsive to local democracy. The people of London are justly proud of the services that ILEA provides. I am sure that in the first election to the new body there will be a resounding vote of confidence in Labour representatives who want to go on providing a first-class education service. Sadly, they will get a mandate from the electorate but the Government will have the veto over sufficient resources to carry out the policies.

The Government should stop continually sniping at ILEA, and proudly tell the country what a first-class job ILEA does. The Minister said that other inner-city authorities were more cost effective than is ILEA. He should remember that the HMI report said that only 11 local education authorities were providing a satisfactory standard of education and that ILEA was one. It seems that the Government are determined to remove ILEA from that group by restricting its resources.

Although I welcome the Government's removal of the obnoxious bits of this Bill, there will be a continuing campaign from Labour Benches to ensure that ILEA has the resources to continue to do a first-class job.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I join with my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) in welcoming the death-bed conversion of the Government to the arguments put repeatedly by the Labour party over the past five years. I am not sure that they were as convinced by the arguments mounted in the other place as by the outcome of the Division, in particular on the amendment moved by the Lord Bishop of London, somebody who does not normally command much support from the Labour party.

We welcome the removal of one of the innumerable threats and worries that the Government have posed to ILEA over the past few years. As the parent of three children who attend ILEA schools, I am as conscious as anyone of the genuine shortcomings of that authority. Those who run the authority, both the elected members and the people who work for it, are also aware of the shortcomings.

One of our major criticisms of the Government is that at all times from 1979 until now the effort of all those in inner London who want to improve the standard of education has had to be diverted time and time again from the schools to protecting the existence of the authority and fighting for sufficient resources with which to carry out a difficult job. When he was the hon. Member for the City of Westminster, St. Marylebone, the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) played a prominent part in seeking to undermine ILEA. His fatuous Baker report called for the break-up of ILEA and for its duties and powers to be devolved to the constituent boroughs. He will not receive a prize for consistency by urging the House to support the Lords amendment. The right hon. Member for Mole Valley no longer represents the City of Westminster, St. Marylebone. He had to do a bunk to Mole Valley, presumably because he was frightened of the parents of children attending ILEA schools in his Marylebone constituency.

All hon. Members who represent inner London constituencies want ILEA to be provided with a period of stability and certainty so that the teachers, the other staff of the authority, the children and the parents can concentrate upon improving the standard of education. They want the Government to provide sufficient resources to enable them to carry out that job. ILEA is being denied those resources. Rate capping will damage the standards of education in inner London. The constant sniping, bickering and mean-minded malignancy of the Secretary of State and his hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) have severely damaged the morale of all concerned.

If the Government do not resign shortly, the best thing that they could do would be to turn their attention to that London organisation which, compared with other organisations, is by far and away the most expensive and the least competent, the Metropolitan police. The only problem is that if they turned their attention to that expensive and incompetent body, they would find that the Home Secretary is the responsible authority. It would be better if the Government did something about the Metropolitan police for which they are directly responsible and allowed ILEA to get on with its difficult and important task.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I, too, welcome the Government's admission of the strength of the arguments that have been advanced both in this House and in another place. Their recognition of the truth of the arguments comes, I suspect, not just from the force with which they were put but from their recognition of the enormous strength of feeling among parents right across inner London about the value of the education that their children receive from the Inner London education authority. That is true of my constituents, many of whom have written and spoken to me about the subject since the Bill was introduced.

The Opposition wish that in taking this first step in the learning process the Government had taken some further steps. ILEA will still be affected by the vicious rate-capping proposals that have been imposed upon it this year by the Government. If further designations are to be announced in the next few weeks, ILEA might be rate capped next year.

The Secretary of State has also taken powers to interfere in the sensible running of ILEA. He has not taken similar powers to interfere in the running of other education authorities. When Her Majesty's Inspectorate says that of all the education authorities in Britain only six—one of which is ILEA—are providing anything like an adequate standard of education it ill behoves the Government to start interfering with and intervening in that authority and not look at the standard of education that is provided elsewhere. The Government should direct their attention to that aspect, not to the excellent work that is done by teachers, staff and everyone who works in and for ILEA. That work is deeply valued by parents and other people in my constituency and throughout inner London. I welcome the Government's conversion. I hope that it will be the first of several in the right direction.

It being a quarter past Nine o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Order this day, to put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Lords amendment No. 13 agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER then proceeded to put the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Lords amendment No. 16 disagreed to.

Amendment (a) made to the Bill in lieu thereof.

Lords amendments Nos. 24 to 33, 40 and 41 disagreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 14, 15, 17 to 23, 34 to 39 and 42 agreed to.

Government amendments (a) and (b) to Lords amendment No. 18 agreed to.

Clause 47

GRANTS TO VOLUNTARY ORGANISATIONS

Lords amendment: No. 43, in page 30, line 12, at end insert—

"( ) Each constituent council in Greater London or a metropolitan county shall exercise its functions under this section, and under any scheme made under this section, with due regard to the needs of the whole of Greater London or that county, as the case may be, and each scheme shall provide for those needs to be kept under review."

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may take the following:

Lords amendment No. 44, after clause 47, insert the following new clause—

GRANTS BY RESIDUARY BODIES

.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order provide for the making of grants to eligible charities out of money received from the disposal of land by the residuary bodies established by Part VII of this Act.

(2) In this section "eligible charity" means, in relation to a residuary body, a body of persons or trust established for charitable purposes only, being purposes which are wholly or primarily for the benefit of the area for which the residuary body is established."

and the amendments thereto:

(a) in line 2, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

(b) in line 3, leave out 'eligible charities" and insert 'voluntary organisations'.

(c) in line 6, leave out subsection (2) and add

'(2) And order under subsection (1) above shall provide that so far as is practicable the total expenditure of each residuary body under this section shall be no less in real terms than the total expenditure on grants to voluntary organisations of the Greater London Council or a metropolitan county council as the case may be, in the area of that residuary body in the financial year 1985/86.

(3) In this section "voluntary organisation" has the same meaning as in section 47 above.'.

Lords amendment No. 57, in page 67, line 7, at end insert—

"( ) consider whether it is desirable that a scheme under section 47 or (Research and Collection of Information) above, or schemes under both those sections, should be made by those councils and, if of that opinion, promote the making of such a scheme or such schemes;"

Sir George Young: The provisions in the Bill dealing with support to voluntary bodies have developed and have improved during the Bill's passage. I am grateful to those voluntary organisations that have come to discuss with Ministers in my Department the provisions of the Bill. We are indebted to them for many of the improvements that we have now introduced.

In this House we revised clause 47 extensively to meet the points that had been put to us. In the other place the additional change provided for by amendment No. 43 was a response to further suggestions that were put to us by the voluntary sector. There has been concern that, in the absence of the GLC and, to a lesser extent, the metropolitan counties, grant-giving by the local authorities would operate in what would be seen to be a policy vacuum. The Government did not wholly share that fear. It seemed to us that it would be no more than normal local authority practice to operate arrangements for grant-giving under arrangements that would take account of the priorities and needs of the areas concerned. We had to recognise, however, that the concern of the voluntary sector was acute on this point and thus, when an amendment was put forward on Report in another place seeking to have annual reviews made of the needs of the whole area involved in schemes under clause 47, my noble Friend undertook to consider that point. This he did, and amendment No. 43 was put forward by the Government and agreed to on Third Reading in the other place.

I believe that this change to clause 47 has been warmly welcomed by the voluntary sector because it provides two useful additions to the operations of clause 47. First, it ensures that in all aspects of operating the scheme all the constituent councils have to have regard to the needs of the whole area. That is a strong reinforcement of what we had always intended should happen. Secondly, it requiresd each scheme to contain provisions for those needs to be kept under review. This is not a mechanical annual review, as some have sought, but a continuing obligation to respond to changes and developments. I hope that the House will welcome the amendment in the same way that it was welcomed in another place.

Lords amendment No. 57 meets a concern expressed by the voluntary sector in the metropolitan counties. The London boroughs have been very quick off the mark to start making arrangements for funding the Londonwide organisaions. Richmond council has taken the task of acting as lead borough, and has already been in touch with over 800 such organisations. In the metropolitan counties, the districts have, unfortunately, not been quite so quick to get going.

Specifically at the request of the Manchester council for voluntary organisations we have included a provison that will require the joint organising committees to consider the desirability of setting up collective arrangements. This will give the districts a prompt, if they need one. Assuming that they agree that the scheme is a good idea, they will then be required to promote its setting up. I hope that the House will join me in supporting what is another useful addition to the provisions for the voluntary organisations.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I sent the Secretary of State details of the concern felt by voluntary organisations in Greater Manchester. They are looking for a clear guarantee that they will be protected. The Minister knows that there are daunting difficulties facing voluntary organisations in Greater Manchester not least because the statutory organisations find it increasingly difficult to carry out their legal duties. What guarantee can the hon. Gentleman give voluntary organisations in Greater Manchester tonight?

Sir George Young: I am very grateful to Mr. Henry West, who has visited Ministers in my Department on several occasions to relay exactly the concerns outlined by the right hon. Gentleman. I hope that the district councils will avail themselves of the transitional funds that the Government have made available to help local organisations, which at present receive funding from the Greater Manchester council. It is precisely to meet their needs that we have increased to £20 million the amount of transitional funding. I hope that the district councils in the Greater Manchester area will get together soon to decide their priorities for next year. If they want to bid for the £20 million, they should not lose too much time in so doing. The Government are aware of those concerns. They have been forcefully put to us by Mr. Henry West and others, and the Government have increased the transitional arrangements to safeguard the well-being of the worthwhile organisations in Manchester.

Lords amendment No. 44 is the other provision relating to grants for voluntary bodies. The Opposition have tabled an amendment, but first I wish to explain the intention of their Lordships. The amendment introduces a new clause designed to enable funds to be provided for endowing a new trust for London, but the provision is not limited to London alone; it would allow similar arrangements to be made in the other metropolitan areas if there were sufficient surplus assets arising in those areas. The unallocated assets of the GLC will pass to the London residuary body on 1 April next year. From the proceeds of disposing of those assets the endowments will be made. The Secretary of State will make orders providing for the making of payments by the residuary body to charitable trusts whose purpose is to benefit the area concerned. This endowment for the new trust for London will be new money for the voluntary sector in London. Initially, we estimate that £10 million could be transferred from the GLC's surplus assets, and we intend that this should be added to by corporate and other private contributions.

However, the funds made available to the new trust will build up over time. Depending on the rate and scale at which the London residuary body is able to realise the surplus assets, the clause will enable the Secretary of State to provide by order for payments to be made to the trust. Needless to say, the proposal was welcomed by everybody who has an interest in the future of London's voluntary bodies.

The Opposition have tabled a number of amendments to these proposals, but I must say that I cannot advise the House to accept them, first because they would require the Secretary of State to provide for as much grant-giving as the GLC and the metropolitan counties are providing in 1985-86. That would be on top of the arrangements for collective grant-giving by the boroughs already provided for in the Bill; it would be on top of the Government's special programme of £20 million of grant aid for local groups and it would be on top of whatever else the boroughs individually decided to spend. That is an unrealistic proposal.

Other parts of the Opposition's amendments would require the Secretary of State to order money to be transferred to voluntary organisations. We have already made it clear that we shall do this in London. The metropolitan counties will have to await a proper assessment of the size of surplus of ex-MCC assets. The surplus may be small and it would be wrong to promise what could not be delivered. The authorities have been in existence for only a comparatively short time, but we do not rule out altogether the possibility of a surplus. The clause has been drafted to allow provision to be made in the met areas if it emerges that there is a basis for so doing.

The Opposition seek to change the definition of the groups that are eligible to receive the proceeds of ex-GLC or ex-MCC assets from the residuary bodies. That amendment would make almost any non-profit-making body eligible. It is our intention that large capital sums — I have mentioned £10 million — that have been accumulated at the expense of ratepayers in London or elsewhere should be paid over only to properly established trusts that have been set up to meet the needs of the area concerned. I am sure that we should retain the requirement that their Lordships have proposed.

The trust, when it is set up, will be able to fund voluntary organisations as more broadly defined by the amendment, but in the first instance we think it right that the funds should transfer to a body as we have defined it in the amendment. We shall listen, of course, to what Opposition Members have to say about their ideas but it seems that they want to turn the residuary body into a substitute general purpose grant-giving body under the direction of the Secretary of State. That would be inappropriate.

I think that it is generally acknowledged that when we introduced the Bill many voluntary bodies were disturbed. They saw the councils that funded them being demolished and they were uncertain about who would fund them after 1986. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and other Ministers in the Department are aware of the voluntary organisations' fears and uncertainties because we have indulged in lengthy consultations with the NCVO, the LVSC and other voluntary bodies. We have met them on many occasions and from our discussions with them, and our understanding of their fears and anxieties, we have been able substantially to reassure them. We have taken on board many of their suggestions for improving the Bill. We have provided for encouragement and assistance, such as the large increase in transitional support from the £5 million we proposed originally to the £20 million that is now on offer.

Equally importantly, the voluntary sector has been able to learn more about what we, the Government, propose. We have been able to explain to voluntary organisations what we are doing to see through our commitment that good voluntary projects should not lose out as a result of abolition. Two significant proposals will ensure that successor authorities can take over the funding of the voluntary bodies. There will be collective funding by districts and boroughs for county and Londonwide groups with £20 million more of local projects to receive aid via the districts. Over and above that, the trust for London will be endowed with at least £10 million. There are possibilities of others in the mets being so endowed if resources allow.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister explain to the House that £20 million of Government money will not be handed over? That is the impression that he tends to give when speaking on this subject. The Government will be giving permission for the boroughs and districts to spend £20 million of their own money, which they will be hard put to raise anyway because of rate capping.

Sir George Young: It is £20 million of projects that are funded by voluntary oranisations that are eligible for transitional funding. Support from the Government will be phased from £75 per cent. tapering over four years. If the hon. Gentleman reads the reports of what I said in Committee and on the Floor of the House, he will see that I have always been open about the degree of assistance and support that the Government will provide.

Our exchanges with the voluntary bodies have been fruitful and it is my distinct impression that the voluntary organisations in London and in the mets are now much more confident about the future. Such uncertainty as still remains stems almost entirely from the attitude that has been taken by the Labour party, which has refused so far to take part in the preparations for the London collective scheme. It is still striving to ensure that information that is needed desperately to allow grants to be made to voluntary organisations next year is not available. Only last month, when asked by Wirral and Sefton to release such information for Merseyside, councillor Keva Coombes got solid Labour support for continued refusal to discuss that issue.

The true friends of the voluntary sector are on the Conservative Benches, and voluntary bodies will not be deceived by the superficial show of concern on the Opposition Benches. I hope that the House will support the Lords amendments and resist the Opposition amendments.

9.30 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): I should like to discuss our amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 44, and I hope that we shall be able to vote on it at the end of the debate.

If the Minister believes that the voluntary sector has welcomed what the Government did in the other place, and honestly believes that the voluntary sector has been substantially reassured, I can assure him that he is talking to a different voluntary sector from the one that has talked to me and my right hon. and hon. Friends. People in the voluntary sector are still disturbed and concerned. Indeed, many are till angry about the Government's proposals, despite the amendments in the other place. If the Government claim that there is adequate money in the arrangements that have been made to replace the grant-giving powers of the GLC and metropolitan counties, they are not deceiving Opposition Members, they are not deceiving the general public and they are certainly not deceiving the voluntary sector.

Let us look at exactly what happened in the other place and at what the amendments do. First, there is the trust that the Government are establishing. It will receive money from the residuary bodies, which have been set up to sell off the assets of the metropolitan counties and the GLC. That is the vindictive part of the Lords amendments. The Government are obsessed with getting rid of County hall, and selling off the assets that belong to the GLC and the metropolitan counties. They especially want to get rid of County hall as the London symbol of democracy throughout the capital, a symbol that has existed for many years.

In trying to pretend to the voluntary organisations that the sale of assets will produce a large amount of money that can be handed over to the trust to be used for the voluntary sector, the Government do not say where the 32 of the 42 functions, which will be run on a countywide basis under the legislation, will be run and administered from. If County hall is sold—which I doubt will happen—where will ILEA go? ILEA has done its sums, and has estimated that it would cost at least £100 million for it to move out and find other premises. There will not be the bonanza from asset selling by the residuary bodies because all the joint bodies and other quangos that the Government are establishing will need to be housed in not less but more office space than is used at present by the metropolitan counties and the GLC.

The Government envisage that £10 million will be given to the trust at first. That will be invested, and 10 per cent. interest a year will give £1 million. That is mere chicken feed compared with what the GLC and the metropolitan counties now give to voluntary organisations. It does not allay any of the fears that have been expressed.

Let us look at what the trust is. It will not be democratically accountable. It may not have representatives of the voluntary movement on it. Who will the Minister appoint to the trust? There are rumours that existing foundations such as the City Parochial Foundation might be given the job; that would reassure the voluntary sector to some extent. Will the trust be established by the Government, and appointed by a body of do-gooders to ensure that no controversial grants are given? That is where the prejudice comes in. I was in the Committee on the Bill, and the only argument from Conservative Members in favour of abolition—because they could not prove their case on the basis of cost—was prejudice, particularly against the controversial grants given by the GLC and the metropolitan counties. Will the trust be an anodyne group of Conservative do-gooders, specially appointed to do the Government's bidding?

In our amendment we substitute the phrase "eligible charities" for "voluntary organisations". The fears of many voluntary organisations, which receive grants from the GLC and metropolitan counties but which are not charitable bodies, have not been allayed by the Government's proposal. The GLC and metropolitan counties do a great deal of work in unemployment centres, but those centres do not qualify under the Lords amendment because they are not charitable bodies. Many co-operatives and women's organisations will not qualify. The Minister referred to the Richmond scheme. Its proposals have already been published in draft form and exclude grants to women's groups. That sort of thing is already beginning to happen.

With the amendment the Government vindictively seek to force the sale of assets. It is clever conservatism to be vindictive towards metropolitan authorities, and to take their assets and show care by giving those assets to the voluntary sector. In that way the Government are trying to get the voluntary sector to go along with them, and to see some advantage in being vindictive towards the metropolitan authorities. However, people in the voluntary sector know that those authorities are their genuine friends because those authorites have given them cash, money and support, and the Government have given them nothing but false promises.

Mrs. Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would tell me what he considers a voluntary body to be. Is it a body which receives money from the Government to do the Government's bidding, or one which is doing work for the community, and which, in my view, should not be paid anything by the Government?

Mr. Roberts: My definition of a voluntary body is a non-statutory, non-profit making body which contributes to the welfare of the community, such as many non-charitable women's groups, black groups and groups that work with the unemployed. This includes many groups against which Conservative Members are prejudiced. They are voluntary groups, but not necessarily of charitable status, just as some voluntary housing associations are of charitable status and some are not.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will my hon. Friend comment on what the Minister said about the Tories being the friends of the voluntary sector, when in 1984-85 the GLC is providing grants totalling about £60 million to voluntary organisations? How does that compare with the sum that the Government are prepared to provide?

Mr. Roberts: The Government are providing chicken feed compared with the GLC, and the same story is true throughout the metropolitan counties.

The Minister made great play of the increase in the transitional money, as though the Government were providing a great deal of money for that four-year period. When the Bill was first published the Government were to provide £10 million or, to be exact, £7·5 million, and the remainder was to come from local authorities. Then, because of the pressure of the voluntary sector, the figure was increased to £20 million. We can draw a picture of the municipal bill run up by the Conservatives—from £10 million, to £20 million, and closing at £40 million. That is their last offer. What does that mean? In the first year the Government will provide £15 million for the GLC and the metropolitan counties, and the local authorities must find £5 million. In the second and third years both the Government and local authorities must provide £10 million. In the fourth year both the Government and the local authorities must provide £5 million. That is not exactly a windfall for local authorities, nor is it a great deal of money for the many voluntary organisations operating in those areas.

Mr. Alfred Morris: My hon. Friend put an important point in making it clear that our concern is not only with voluntary organisations—properly so-called. The Royal Exchange theatre company in Manchester has made clear to hon. Members from the Greater Manchester area that, without the £548,000 which it receives this year from the Greater Manchester council, the theatre will have to close. What kind of guarantee can we give the company about its future?

Mr. Roberts: Of course, the Government cannot provide guarantees. They have studiously avoided providing guarantees while mouthing platitudes about how they are trying to assist voluntary organisations.

The district councils and London boroughs are already rate capped, and will have to take over many functions after abolition, for which the Government will not provide extra rate support grants, yet they must find part of the transitional £40 million. They will be unable to meet all the needs, and will certainly be unable to meet the many requirements of the voluntary sector unless the Government undertake to provide the necessary money.

Another minor amendment tabled by the Government —many of them were probably drafted by the Minister —related to the concession that, in the first year of the collective scheme—the Minister praised the Richmond initiative—if two-thirds of the boroughs agreed to grant money to a countywide voluntary organisation, all the boroughs must contribute to it. However, the Government placed a ceiling on the amount that could be given, although for the first year they said that they would not use their powers to impose such a ceiling. That is not reassuring, because the Government are retaining their draconian, ministerial powers, as they have done throughout the Bill, to set ceilings and to control the amount of money that even the so-called democratically liberated London boroughs and metropolitan county councils will be able to give to voluntary organisations.

The Minister made much of Lords amendment No. 43, but it is extremely vague. It asks the boroughs to set up a review of social needs with due regard for the entire metropolitan county and GLC areas. What will be the result of such a review? The Minister rightly referred to the criticism from voluntary organisations they they will be unable to operate within comprehensive political or strategic frameworks. At present, the GLC and the metropolitan counties meet representatives of the voluntary movement and thrash out a set of policies, in relation to funding the voluntary sector, which operate within the terms of reference of each local authority's strategy. The trust cannot do that, because it has no other functions or powers. Many local authorities will come together to review social needs, but they all have differing views. I assure the House that Sefton council has a different view of the social needs of Merseyside from the views of Liverpool city council and Knowsley council. The trust will be no substitute for the present system.

We said in Committee that their Lordships said that the Government have failed to prove that administrative savings can be made in services by getting rid of bureaucracy. We were told that many services, including waste disposal, firemen and the police, would cost more. However, we now know that the cuts will be made in the voluntary sector. The Government were motivated to attack the GLC and the metropolitan counties because they wanted to cut the amount of money given to voluntary organisations. They did not like the way in which local government was setting new trends in encouraging community activity, bringing people closer together, working closely with the Labour local authorities to improve conditions in their communities and pioneering in the traditional local government way. They knew that the spin-off would be support for the Labour party, and that is why they are so vindictive against the GLC and the metropolitan counties. That is why they are attacking the voluntary sector.

These Lords amendments are prejudiced and spiteful. The Government's abolition proposals are based on prejudice and spite, and this attack on the voluntary sector is a prime example of it. Although Ministers try to put on a pleasant face, Conservative Back-Bench Members show their prejudice every time we mention the GLC, the metropolitan counties, or the giving of grants to the voluntary sector. I urge the House to reject the Lords amendments, which will not provide adequate support for the voluntary sector, and to accept the Opposition amendments.

9.45 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): We debate the amendment against the background of an extraordinary expansion in Exchequer and other public support for the voluntary sector. Gradually the partnership between the voluntary sector and the Government is becoming a genuine third force. Many of us who have worked in the voluntary sector have hoped for that for many years.

Such a partnership involves enormous difficulties. The whole point of the voluntary sector—whether charitable or non-charitable—is that it should be free to move where it will and to do those things which it sees are needed, particularly if the statutory sector does not recognise a paramount need. Too much of the voluntary sector is being sucked into the statutory sector simply because the money is made available to it and it therefore follows the money.

That is not necessarily bad, but I hope the Minister can reassure us that, after the long, constructive and hard-working sessions with the voluntary sector, he will ensure that we have a much clearer idea of those activities which the Government of the day believe appropriate to be done by the voluntary sector. Let us make no mistake. The voluntary and charitable sectors can take on able staff to operate under a Government grant which is often taken away after only a short time because of changes in political control or in the ability of the statutory sector to meet the need. I hope that as a result of the current painful discussions a more coherent strategy for the future will emerge.

[Mr. Andrew Rowe]

Mr. Dobson: If that third force does not receive funds from the public sector, where will the funds come from?

Mr. Rowe: An enormous amount of public money is spent in that direction through tax concessions and other means. Increasingly, money is provided through a wide range of other sources, including the private sector, which in many ways is a healthier source of support than the state. What is more, the changes in the law governing covenants by the present Government have resulted in an increase in the amount of individual contributions, which I welcome.

The Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), gave the show away because, although much of the money spent by the metropolitan authorities and the GLC has been spent in a pioneering way, too often it has been spent in such a way that pioneering has taken precedence over responsibility. Some pioneering groups have been incompetently managed and have been unable to perform the tasks which they were paid to perform.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Local authorities have always spent money on publicising their policies and ideas. The Government object, not to that, but to the fact that the metropolitan counties and the GLC are publicising their ideas successfully. That is why they object to their grants policy. The objection is not that they have failed, but that they have been successful.

Mr. Rowe: That is not why I object. I do not object to some of the experiments that have been carried out, but I do object to frantically increasing expenditure for no purpose other than to bind groups of diverse kinds and activities to the Labour party. That is the nub of the question. Many of the groups that have been funded had worthy aspirations and may derive from areas in which, because there are difficulties, they may have been able to appeal to sympathy or shame to get funding. When they have failed to deliver the goods, the result has too often been a desire to give them more money because the poor things failed to deliver the goods last time as they did not have sufficient money. In the budget for 1984-85 the GLC in particular delivered a cynical exercise in trying to bind to the Labour party the support of a wide variety of groups, some of which were undoubtedly worthy of support but many of which were not.

I support the Government amendments, but I urge the Government to take pains to build on the hard work that they have done so far to ensure a much more predictable pattern of partnership between the Government and the voluntary sector.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Because time is short I shall concentrate on the amendments proposed to Lords amendment No. 44. In the prevailing atmosphere of impending doom, I welcome the Richmond initiative to get the two thirds rule. My experience of district co-ordination in the voluntary sector is not encouraging. The two thirds rule will not breed harmony and light among the districts because those who are not party to the two thirds but are part of the one third or some smaller proportion, will not contribute willingly or with a warm heart.

The crux of the matter is the definition. If one restricts the definition to charitable organisations, one excludes a whole area of the voluntary sector which in some respects has been the most innovative, experimental and beneficial in recent years. To restrict matters entirely to those who fulfil the definition of "charitable" will exclude new groups which cannot, at the beginning of their lives, achieve charitable status. It will not be easy for the Government to discover a means of determining whether a group is charitable or not, in law short of registration with the Charity Commissioners. Those who have been involved in this area for many years will know that it is a legal minefield. It is not easy to determine whether a group is charitable or not, and the Charity Commissioners have great difficulty in doing so. There are many organisations which I believe are charitable but which do not have charitable definition and registration with the Charity Commissioners. In the past I have managed to get tax relief for many bodies which are not registered with the Charity Commissioners but which the Inland Revenue regards as charitable.

Another area which will be deprived is that of co-ordination of voluntary work. The councils of voluntary service which facilitate collaboration between voluntary and statutory bodies often find it difficult to achieve charitable status because the Charity Commissioners are loth to give that status to bodies that simply co-ordinate the activities of other voluntary organisations. A whole area with which many Conservative-controlled authorities are happy to work will be cut out from this definition and they will find their work extremely constricted.

Any attempt at such restriction runs counter not only to local government tradition and to the work that the local authorities have done for many years in endeavouring to pump-prime and to assist experimentation and innovation by not confining themselves to the use of charitable bodies. It also runs counter to central Government intentions and central Government tradition. An examination of grant-giving patterns under clause 64 from the DHSS or from the voluntary service unit of the Home Office and the urban programme and the partnership authorities, shows that most of those grants which are beneficial and accepted as such by Conservative Members do not go to those bodies which are deemed in law to be charitable. I cannot understand why the Government wish to cut off from grant aid under this heading those bodies to which they had willingly and voluntarily given support for many years.

The sums of money involved that have been quoted sound large but, for many reasons, the sums of money going through this third arm is extremely large. The sums being quoted are nowhere near enough to accommodate what is happening. For example, there is a housing project in Bradford with which I was associated when I was involved in the voluntary sector there which is costing £2 million. The turnover of some large city bodies is beyond the sums being quoted.

My experience suggests that the Government's policy will seriously harm the voluntary sector. Innovations and experiments will inevitably be deprived. It is not so much whether Conservative or Labour Members are the friends of the voluntary sector—from what I have heard today, the Government want to constrict local authorities and Labour wants to control them. Neither is the right approach. The proposals of the Government and the other place are defective and I urge the House to accept the amendments to the Lords amendment.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Through rate-capping and penalties, the Government have hit local authorities hard, and feeding cash into voluntary organisations will be ever more difficult. Local people are proud of Tyne and Wear metropolitan county council because it has helped and funded voluntary organisations. However, it now seems that there will be a distinction between Conservative-controlled shire counties and Labour-controlled metropolitan authorities.

Under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, district and county councils can each raise 2p with which to fund organisations and projects. Metropolitan counties are also able to raise a 2p rate for the dame purpose, so in an area covered by a metropolitan county council 4p is raised under section 137. If Tyne and Wear county council is abolished, however, only 2p will be raised for that purpose. Because the shire counties, which are predominantly Conservative controlled, will continue to exist, areas covered by them will continue to exist, areas covered by them will continue to levy 4p under section 137. In other words, Conservative-controlled areas will have much more money with which to fund voluntary organisations. If that is not political vindictiveness, I do not know what is. The Minister and the Secretary of State should reconsider and let boroughs in metropolitan county areas raise a 4p rate under section 137.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 44, after clause 47, insert the following new clause—

"Grants by residuary bodies

.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order provide for the making of grants to eligible charities out of money received from the disposal of land by the residuary bodies established by Part VII of this Act.

(2) In this section "eligible charity" means, in relation to a residuary body, a body of persons or trust established for charitable purposes only, being purposes which are wholly or primarily for the benefit of the area for which the residuary body is established."

Read a Second time.

Amendment (a) proposed to the Lords amendment: in line 2, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.—[Mr. Allan Roberts.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 195, Noes 320.

Division No. 260] [9.59 pm

AYES

Abse, Leo
Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Brown, Ron (E'burgh, Leith)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell, Ian
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Haynes, Frank
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Janner, Hon Greville
Jenkins, Rt Hon Roy (Hillh'd)
John, Brynmor
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Lamond, James
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Edward
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Penhaligon, David
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Rowlands, Ted
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Short, Mrs R.(W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C.(Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steel, Rt Hon David
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wainwright, R.
Wallace, James
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
White, James
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec

Young, David (Bolton SE)

Mr. Allen McKay and Mr. Sean Hughes.

Tellers for the Ayes:

NOES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amery, Rt Hon Julian
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Rt Hon Sir Frederic
Benyon, William
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Holt, Richard
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Howell, Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lamont, Norman
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Mates, Michael
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Molyneaux, Rt Hon James
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Oppenheim, Rt Hon Mrs S.
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parkinson, Rt Hon Cecil
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John

Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Carol Mather and
Mr. Robert Boscawen.

Question accordingly negatived.

It being after Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER, proceeded, pursuant to the Order this day, to put the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Lords amendments Nos. 44 to 47 agreed to.

Local Government Bill

Clause 55

ESTABLISHMENT OF RESIDUARY BODIES

Lords amendment: No. 48, in page 38, line 38, at end insert—

"(4) As soon as may be after the establishment of a joint committee under section 93 below for Greater London or a metropolitan county the Secretary of State shall, after consultation with that committee, appoint one of its members to be a member of the appropriate residuary body."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Straw: I beg to move, amendment (a) to the Lords amendment, in line 4, leave out ', after consultation with that committee.'.

I understand that we are to discuss also amendment (b) to the Lords amendment.

By amendment No. 48, which I understand was moved in the other place by the Government, it is proposed that the residuary body for London and those for the other areas should have added to their membership one of the members of the joint committee established under clause 93. By our amendments we propose that the Secretary of State should be required to appoint to the total number of members of the residuary body such members as are nominated to it by the joint committees of the local authorities. It is delightful to have the rapt attention of the House at 10.15 pm on such a scintillating topic. I repeat that it is possible, judging by the form of the earlier votes, that we will lose this vote.

So scintillating are my words that Mr. Speaker has moved out of the Chair. It is delightful to see Mr. Deputy Speaker back in the Chair. I thank Mr. Speaker for his rapt attention on this issue. Although I hope that it is not, this issue may be the last occasion on which we have a substantive debate. I hope that their Lordships will do their duty.

I should like to place on record, on behalf of my hon. Friends and myself, my thanks to the people who have briefed us over the last 18 months on the many issues of the Bill. Even the Minister will accept that not only have we won the arguments on the Bill and on the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act but, unquestionably, as many Conservative Members have said, that we have been better briefed. The main reason for that is that there have been excellent briefing arrangements with both the GLC and the metropolitan counties parliamentary unit. We could not have advanced the arguments and turned what was seen by the Government as an electoral advantage into an electoral disadvantage had it not been for the work of people such as Damien Welfare and Richard Percival of the Greater London council and David Burton and Rodney Jones of the metropolitan counties parliamentary unit and their supporting staffs, and the leaders of the counties and the GLC, to whom we are all grateful.

10.15 pm

When the Bill was originally published, the residuary bodies were seen as bodies which would have merely wrap-up and technical functions. The Government suddenly realised that, although their intent was to snap out the light of the GLC and the metropolitan counties immediately on vesting day, on 1 April 1986, that would not be possible, and therefore there would have to be life after death for the councils, but the Government would try to limit that as far as they could. It was initially envisaged that the residuary body would have a role for superannuation, debt, central facilities and support.

As the Bill has progressed, the Government have had to face the fact that there will continue to be a countywide operation of many services and that in preparing the Bill in such haste and with such venom, and refusing to look at the good work of the GLC and the metropolitan counties, a great many specialist services provided by the councils, often unnoticed and unsung, were overlooked. Those services may be unnoticed at the moment, but were they to be abolished their absence would soon be noticed.

Such services had to be given a parent body and the Government realised that it would not be possible to provide for their control by districts, because they could not operate at district level, and the Government found it inappropriate to set up joint boards. Following the excellent report of the Select Committee on Science and Technology of the other place, the Government have widened the role of residuary bodies and these are now to provide professional and technical services to the successor authorities.

We welcome the wider role given to the residuary bodies, as far as it goes, and the fact that the services which faced a break-up and annihiliation are to continue. It is worth quoting, as I think I am allowed to do, the view of the Select Committee on Science and Technology of the other place. It said:

"the Committee repeat their conviction that the administration of local goverment in Greater London and the metropolitan counties depends for its effeetiveness on preserving the integrity of many of the specialist services built up by the GLC and the county councils. These authorities have demonstrated their ability to respond positively to the challenge of scientific and technical development. Further challenges lie ahead. The great conurbations require specialist staff and facilities to meet them. Economic, efficient and forward-looking services demand excellence, integration and continuity. The existing services should be improved not by being dismembered, but by being encouraged to progress. Centres of excellence are slow to develop but easy to destroy."

They would have been destroyed had the Government's initial proposals remained in force. However, the residuary bodies will not be just clearing-up organisations. They will supervise the services that are to continue in existence for the local authorities within their area.

We have always objected to the fact that the residuary bodies were to be appointed by the Secretary of State. However, although we disagreed with that idea, we could see some logic in it, given that they had a residuary role to perform. Now that they are to have a continuing role to perform it is unacceptable that all their members should be appointed by the Secretary of State. He will undertake to run the local authority services in the areas of the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties. That is wrong. The Government tell us that their aim is to devolve powers to the local authorities. If so, they ought to accept this modest amendment, which would make the members of the residuary bodies the nominees of the new joint committees which they have established.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): This is an important issue. Our position has been made clear in the debate: that directly elected authorities will become indirectly elected authorities by means of this strange beast, a creature of the Government, the residuary body.

I wish to draw attention to two specific aspects of the problem, to which I hope the Minister will pay careful attention. It was said during the Report stage in the other place by the Minister of State's colleague, Lord Gowrie, that many of the people who are now employed by the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils will be employed by the residuary bodies. In planning the handover — the amendments refer to the method of the handover—it is vital that as many jobs as possible should be preserved. Those with technical expertise are irreplaceable for servicing whatever services remain to be run on a metropolitan countywide or Greater London councilwide basis.

As the transition to the residuary bodies and the joint committees, as envisaged in amendment No. 48, is planned and as we consider the membership of the joint committees and their method of working, they should be given the task of reflecting upon the way in which they can most effectively implement the ring fencing of many of the posts by ensuring that they are offered to those who would like to continue to use their expertise in local government.

Disagreement has been expressed by some employees of the seven local authorities. As was mentioned by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), although many hon. Members have been well briefed by officers of the metropolitan counties and the GLC, sufficiently interested efforts have not been made by the unions representing those who are employed by the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties.

There have been notable exceptions. The Minister may remember that in Committee I moved amendments which, as he will know, emanated from NALGO in Greater London, and amendments were tabled in another place emanating from NALGO in the west midlands which were of interest and relevance to every person employed as a local government officer — people who were not supported by the NALGO national leadership. I say for the record, and without wishing to re-open old wounds, that many of the people in NALGO representing staff of the local authorities were disappointed that they were not better supported by their natural supporters, as they presume them, the Labour party, in this House and in the other place.

As I should like everybody to seek to remedy the position, I shall quote from Abolition News 6, a NALGO news bulletin produced by the west Midlands county branch abolition staff protection sub-committee dated only a couple of months ago. Indeed, there are later editions up to the most recent, Abolition News 8. Abolition News 6 says:

"We were desperately disappointed with the Labour Party's showing. We had all hoped for some action on the staffing issues, yet it's become plain both in the Lords and in the earlier debate in the Commons that they are not interested in talking about staff. This is at odds with the Party locally, who are very understanding and, we believe, genuinely anxious to help as indeed are a number of our own Councillors. We are sure they feel rather let down as well."

It goes on to say, having condemned NALGO nationally, and commended my alliance partners and my party:

"The Government, of course, are laughing. Not only have they avoided an embarrassment in the Lords, they have scored a number of points off the Opposition in doing so, and have managed to show the Labour peers''concern' for staff."

It goes on to leave the members to judge for themselves the party's performance and the arguments about staffing.

The tragedy was that in the other place staffing came up on the day of the Ascot gold cup or some such important national event. Therefore, the Tory party decided to spin out the staffing debate, which is always less controversial, and got everybody back after Ascot for the crucial votes on the subsequent amendments concerning the residuary body. As a result, there was no informed or expert debate there either.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist)—I warned him that I would mention him, and I hope that it does him no harm — has regularly and consistently argued the case for people employed in local government in the seven authorities in question. He has done so justifiably because the Government's figures at the beginning were clearly wrong, and they had not thought through the implications for staffing. We have been watching the draining away of experienced officers. I was talking the other day to a senior legal officer of the GLC who was watching his colleagues disappear, leaving for jobs which are certain as opposed to staying in jobs which are uncertain and without any definite future, and leaving behind the others to try to hold together the muddle that is of the Government's creation.

While it is clearly not in question that local government is about services, and the jobs are there to provide those services, the Government have not understood the need for those people who will be necessary in these after lives that the Government will have us create by the amendment. The joint committee and the subsequent residuary bodies are being prepared for that, and people are not being given the opportunity to apply.

My main criticism goes to the Government, but it also goes to NALGO nationally which voted, by way of resolution at the annual conference, that its staff and members should boycott subsequent bodies. With no vested interest, I beseech NALGO to change its mind. This is not in the interests of local government officers who have given months, years or decades of service to local government in some authorities which, whatever their history, are among the most competent and experienced authorities in Britain with the greatest expertise. It is not in the interest of the members of staff for the union to tell them that they must have nothing to do with the successor authority.

10.30 pm

Mr. Tony Banks: Why does the hon. Gentleman think that the national conference of NALGO is any less concerned about its membership than he? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the union has decided that it has found the best way of protecting its members' jobs?

Mr. Hughes: I accept that the national conference of NALGO should be as concerned as I am. It should be more concerned, because it has a specific responsibility. However, if the Bill is enacted, the national conference will call for all-out industrial action. If it believes that that will advance the cause of its members, it is mistaken. I am not saying that the national conference is not interested. I am merely saying that its tactics are wrong and that I hope that it will think again. In the interests of the continuance of service in whatever form the Government have contrived to give us local government — a form for which no Opposition Member has argued—we want the best people doing the jobs that remain.

[Mr. Hughes]

I plead with the Government to let the joint committee and the residuary body pass on early information on the jobs that will be left. Secondly, let those who represent the work force ensure that they allow its members to service theo successor bodies for the short interim period that will ensue. If the Bill is enacted without the Lords standing up to the Government again, we shall not have regional government in London. In the interim at least we shall have local government officers carrying on the services which were administered in readiness to re-enter a greater and better regional body which parties other than the Conservative party will bring about sooner than the Government would like.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I shall begin by referring to ring fencing and stating that for several years I was one of NALGO's two parliamentary advisers. Those were in the days when NALGO was composed far more of officers who served their councils rather than their political masters. The real danger is that NALGO is beginning to drift into political subservience. I am not so worried by the remarks of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) about some local government officer leaving the service. Some of the creatures appointed by Mr. Livingstone as assistant directors have been placed for their political knowledge. The sooner they go the better. In that way no one will have to pay compensation to them, unlike some of the creatures who were appointed to London Transport by Mr. Livingstone, to whom we had actually to pay money.

Having had experience of the previous reorganisation of local government, I appeal to NALGO and the staff union at county hall, which still exists despite the efforts of Livingstone and Co. to denigrate it, to remember that their first duty is to the public that they serve and the public that pay their salaries.

Mr. Tony Banks: Like they pay us.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: If the chairman of the GLC would care to intervene, I shall be delighted to give way to him.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon Gentleman does not give way usually.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The hon. Gentleman is too concerned about prostituting that high office that was once honourable actually to intervene.

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I ask the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) to withdraw his last comment. It is a complete reflection on me as a Member of the House.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The office of chairman of the GLC has been a highly honourable one and I am talking of the office and not the holder. I can visualise Sir Isaac Hayward and Bill Fiske whirling round in their graves if they knew of the way in which the office was now being used. I withdraw nothing from what I have said.

Mr. Straw: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance. There are rules concerning the use of unparliamentary language. Hon. Members heard the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) claim that another hon. Member was prostituting an office that he holds. I submit that that is unparliamentary language and that the hon. Gentleman should be required to withdraw the expression.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): It may have been strong language, but there was nothing unparliamentary about what was said.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: If it will help, I certainly make it clear that I mean no personal imputation against the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who decorates functions in the City when he turns up in his limousine and white tie and tails.

It is important for the staff to have their future safeguarded. That means that the information required by the London boroughs and other organisations should be swiftly provided.

Mr. Nellist: Does the hon. Gentleman think that the staff should have their futures safeguarded? How many staff should have their futures safeguarded? To which services does he refer? At which level of which metropolitan county and the GLC should they be safeguarded? For 15 to 18 months during the passage of this and previous Bills neither the Secretary of State nor the Minister has said which workers in which departments in which county council have a future to be safeguarded.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: That is a reasonable intervention, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I say that I can speak only from my knowledge of London. Until the information is supplied in detail from county hall, no one can give an accurate answer.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I shall not give way again. The hon. Gentleman can speak later if he wishes. Until county hall responds to the questions which the boroughs have been asking for months, no one can give the detailed answers which the hon. Gentleman and many others would like. It is certain—this is on the record—that we shall not make the mistake that we made last time in the re-organisation of London local government, when everyone's job was automatically guaranteed and when my borough of Camden finished up with three directors of finance and with one town clerk and three associate town clerks. That will not happen again.

The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) raised the issue of ring fencing. At the moment, he is with his natural allies — the alliance — and I hope that he joins them soon. We need to ensure that the information comes forward. If NALGO is prepared to do the job that it once did, I believe that its members will co-operate.

The hon. Member for Blackburn quoted selectively, at great length, from the report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology. The report, which has been quoted three times already tonight, speaks in terms of deciding "to concentrate on a selection of case studies".

Who made the selection? The report states that it does not "touch in depth on the general subject of waste disposal". It is an interim report. The inquiry is "incomplete". Most of the evidence is "as yet unpublished". The Committee did not wish to pre-empt its "final report". The document is valuable as a guide, but not as anything authoritative. The House would be well advised to do no more than look at it as a guide, and not as a bible.

The hon. Member for Blackburn referred to the residuary bodies. I am glad that they are to be self-destructive—the sooner the better. I am equally happy with the appointment of Sir Godfrey Taylor as the provisional chairman of the London residuary body. Two things will happen. First, the intention of the House that borough government shall predominate in London as quickly as possible will come about. Secondly, I believe that that particular residuary body——

Mr. Tony Banks: Earlier in his speech the hon. Gentleman referred to Mr. Livingstone appointing his creatures. Does he not feel that Sir Godfrey Taylor, as a rabid Tory, is just the creature of the Secretary of State?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: There is a great difference between a paid civil servant in local government——

Mr. Tony Banks: I see.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: As the record of any Government will show, if one is appointing a body to carry out one's policy, one appoints the best qualified people. I remind the hon. Gentleman that some people might have thought it fairer if the Government had appointed Mr. Livingstone as chairman of the residuary body! Quite a few people might have said that! The difference between the chairman of such a body and a civil servant should be clear, even to the hon. Gentleman. Again, that is proof that the blurring of the lines between politics and civil servants and local government officers has gone too far.

I hope that the residuary bodies will do their work more swiftly than the Government envisage. I believe that in London at any rate we can look forward to a three-year rather than a five-year life. In the end what matters is the information coming out to the boroughs from county hall and the districts in the other metropolitan counties.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I should like to refer to residuary bodies as they apply to west Yorkshire. It is understandable why much of the debate has properly concentrated on London, as it seems to have done during all the discussions in the past year, but there are places away from London. West Yorkshire is one of them.

I should like to refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. Members for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate referred to NALGO. I was surprised at what he said. All that I know as a politician—and that is the reason why I am here—is that NALGO voted nine to one against affiliating to the Labour party. The hon. Gentleman also referred to his experience in the local government reforms of the past 20 years. I know that he has great experience. The first reform was in 1963, which set up the Greater London council. They got it wrong. I have always been sorry that Middlesex was abolished, for example. Whatever doorstep I go on in my county of west Yorkshire, in the old borough of Morley, which is now part of Leeds, nearly everybody tells me about their view of the mistake that was made in 1974. It looms much larger in those people's mind and experience than many of the issues that we raise on the Floor of the House. There is local feeling about local government reform.

In the House, we have a happy knack of getting it wrong. We get it wrong when we put the experts in, because the experts often know nothing about local government, but think that they are translating the views of some large company, with marginal analysis on how to get things efficient and so on. But the people who know about the services that they get know that the House has made a mistake. We are now doing it in a completely different way, but we are making the same mistake, and equally getting it wrong. Nothing that I have heard in the past year will convince me otherwise.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I have been consistent throughout. I opposed the creation of the GLC from the very outset. I was a borough man in those days, and that is a view that I have always kept.

Mr. Rees: On that occasion, which was just before I went to Yorkshire, I had a feel for the old county of Middlesex and I thought that Herbert Morrison was not just being dog in a manger about the old London county council. He was right about it. It could have been changed in more appropriate ways than were used at the time. That is why I am glad to hear from my hon. Friends, especially our Front Bench, that we are not merely talking of recreating the GLC in future, but of creating a strategic body that will be studied afresh. The GLC was not right, and the way in which the Government are abolishing it is wrong.

I live in Bermondsey when I am in London, and I was surprised at the story of Tories going to Ascot. I am a devotee of the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley), and thought that all that had changed. I thought that those Tories were now sergeant-majors, suburbans, and the children of the people for whom the Lord Chancellor rang his handbell at conference years ago. I can only assume that some of the old gentlemen Tories are still present in the other place. They are the sort of chaps who do not make snide remarks at by-elections about the marital status of candidates. In other words they are gentlemen, whatever else they may be.

10.45 pm

When I first went to Yorkshire 25 years ago I was surprised to find a spirit afoot there that was akin to that in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The only bit of Yorkshire left now is north Yorkshire. In one of the Government's good centralising activities, Yorkshire was finished.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): With respect, that is not accurate because the Government did away with north Yorkshire and made an abortion called Cleveland.

Mr. Rees: That is another matter and, in the hon. Gentleman's view, it probably proves that local government reform was a mistake.

It is extremely sad that only north Yorkshire is left. Last night I went to Huddersfield to hear the Huddersfield choral society, and all Yorkshire was present. When the choir sang the Hallelujah chorus, I thought, "I wonder what smart remarks that lot down in London would make about this." It was Yorkshire, but because of the Tory Government there is nothing but north Yorkshire left. That illustrates the mistake being made in this reform.

How will the residuary body work regarding the reorganisation of the police? Last night at the concert I asked many people what would happen about the west Yorkshire police, whether its headquarters would remain in Wakefield, and how the five district councils would deal with policing. Nobody seemed to know. I am convinced that the reorganisation of the police in west Yorkshire cannot be left to appointees of either the Secretary of State for the Environment or the Home Secretary.

[Mr. Rees]

The question does not merely relate to policing and the number of policemen under each district council, but to the financing of the force. Under the existing west Yorkshire police, policing is provided for all parts of west Yorkshire, but not according to rateable value. Anyone who expects Leeds to pay more towards the precept that will go to the policing authority to provide more policing in Kirklees under the new arrangement, will find a different attitude and separate financing.

Who will advise on the policing aspect? Will it be Her Majesty's inspector for that part or the inspectorate in London? It cannot merely be the chief constable. In west Yorkshire we are extremely fortunate with our chief constable. The force did extraordinarily well during the miners' strike, calling in outside policemen perhaps only once. The policing was carried out with great sympathy and understanding, and I am extremely proud of the West Yorkshire police. I used to be responsible for practical policing, and I am extremely concerned about the West Yorkshire police because, apart from reading little bits in the newspapers, I do not know what is going on.

It is important not to put too much power in the hands of the Home Office. We should not allow abolition to become a ratchet step towards a national police force. What matters are local police forces and local committees. The only reason I have spoken tonight is that we have heard so little about the effect of the changes. It would be much better to allow elected representatives from the district councils to take part in police planning, because they will know far more about local needs than will any appointed person. We should remember the mistakes that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate agrees were made in the past. It is one thing to get the drainage system wrong; it will be bad for west Yorkshire if police operations are arranged badly as a result of this aspect of local government reform. I agree with my hon. Friend for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) that elected local representatives should sit on the residuary bodies.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): With the leave of the House, I shall comment on the interesting points made by the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees). I assure him that the residuary bodies will have no relationship with the police. The police will be governed by the joint boards that are established by the Bill. It might help the right hon. Gentleman to know that, in relation to west Yorkshire, to which he and I are completely devoted, the arrangements of the joint board will allow representation from each of the district councils in the area. There will be five representatives from Bradford, two from Calderdale, two from Kirklees, eight from Leeds and three from Wakefield, in addition to which there will be 11 magistrates.

I should also inform the right hon. Gentleman that the arrangements for the provision of the police will not alter geographically, and that the arrangements for the tripartite system will remain intact—the 50 per cent. funding from the local authorities, which will be precepted by the joint board on to the individual districts, and the 50 per cent. central Government funding.

Although the police authority will be a different body, it will still be formed largely of district council representatives and magistrates under the general Home Office arrangement that pertains now. The arrangement in west Yorkshire will run as well as it does today.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: For three years, the finances of the body, which, as the Minister of State rightly said, is not the residuary body, will be controlled by the Home Office.

Mr. Shaw: The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that, for three years, the Home Secretary has a residuary power to oversee the financial arrangements, should he be so minded, but it is hoped that the arrangements in relation to the efficiency and operation of the force will not require that intervention.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Although I represent a Leicestershire constituency, before I came to the House I was a member of the Greater London council for four years, during which time I chaired the housing committee and assisted in the dispersal of the housing stock to the boroughs. Therefore, I believe that I know something about the subject and have had much experience of the body which we are seeking tonight finally to abolish.

I wish that more members of the public knew how much support Labour Back-Bench Members are giving to their Front-Bench spokesmen tonight.

We have heard screams about lack of democracy. I expected more London Members to be on the Opposition Benches which are almost empty except for that occupied by the chairman of the GLC—I presume that he is called "chair" not "chairman".

Mr. Snape: How long has the hon. Gentleman been there?

Mr. Ashby: Longer than the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). In my days the chair of the GLC was made of bog oak. I wonder what present members feel when they address that bog oak chair and call it "chair."

When I heard the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) I thought, "These councils come and these councils go — but fortunately the services continue." I pay tribute to the high quality of GLC staff. At the officer level it was as good as we could yet anywhere in the country. It was of very high standard. I am confident that those with whom I worked will continue to serve the GLC to the end in the spirit and tradition of the service.

Mistakes have been made. Mistakes were made in 1964 and 1974. They were intended to put right local government and they are accepted as being mistakes. When the Greater London council was created in 1964 it had many responsibilities such as for ambulance services. Within a few years it had shed that service and by 1978-79 it was beginning to shed other services.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman should not use the word "shed" in relation to services by county hall. To my certain knowledge the GLC, of which I have been a member for many years, has never willingly given up its services. In most cases the services have been taken from county hall by Governments of both colours.

Mr. Ashby: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The services were given up willingly. I willingly negotiated with others the giving up to the boroughs of the GLC's housing stock. That was willingly done. One of the greatest housing empires—260,000 houses—was handed over to the boroughs. That move was resisted, but sense prevailed and only the other day Tower Hamlets finally took the last of the housing stock into its department. In the end this was done willingly because there was a housing department for the boroughs and a housing authority for the GLC. There is no reason for such duplication.

We are talking about the 1964 Act. In that year a fundamental mistake was made. We created large boroughs and the Greater London council because it was thought that one body should represent London. That was a mistake. Having created this great council, similar to county councils, we were left with the GLC which is an anomaly.

The GLC was given wholly unnecessary duplicated powers, and after 20 years we have now reached the sorry stage of needing to abolish it.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that he would like regional councils instead, but what would they do beyond what the boroughs already do? The same duplication would be bound to occur.

11 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: Regional government, as most other countries of western Europe know and enjoy it, would have no duplicated powers with the boroughs. Powers would be devolved to it which are now exercised from Whitehall but which are better exercised at a regional level, leaving to the boroughs the services which are best run at a level closer to the people who use them.

Mr. Ashby: With the greatest respect, the hon. Gentleman knows that that is nonsense. In other European countries the boroughs do not have the powers that ours have. Our boroughs have education responsibilities but in almost every other European country those responsibilities are carried by the state. I cannot see what additional powers a regional authority would have apart from one or two wider planning functions which could be dealt with just as effectively by regional conferences as and when required rather than by setting up a regional authority with a vast bureaucracy to support it.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am trying to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument carefully because I know him to have been a reasonable person as a GLC member, although something seems to have happened to him since then.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of services being willingly given up the GLC. He knows that the GLC never willingly gave up its responsibilities for water and sewerage services, ambulance services or transport. As for duplication, why was transport taken from the GLC? Where was the duplication there?

Mr. Ashby: Responsibility for transport was given to the GLC late in its life, in the mid-1970s——

Mr. Snape: It was in 1968.

Mr. Ashby: I thought that it was a little later. At any rate, London Transport was run with great difficulty by the GLC and the end of the GLC's responsibility for transport came when we saw people being appointed to the board on a purely political basis, people with no ability to run anything, and the whole thing became a farce. The Government then rightly took back what had been given because London Transport was not being run properly for the benefit of the people of London. Like most Conservative Members, I use public transport in London. As chairman of the GLC the hon. Gentleman uses his limousine most of the time, but some of us have to use public transport and it is being run as well now as it ever was under the Conservative administration at county hall. I cannot see that anything has altered.

Mr. Snape: The fares have gone up.

Mr. Ashby: How many of the items covered by the residuary bodies have ever appeared on a GLC agenda or even on a GLC committee agenda in their own right? None have appeared more than once in every four or five years. Why do we have to have a special body to deal with an administrative matter? Why do we have to turn discussion of these residuary matters into a great big talking shop? The Labour party has endeavoured feverishly to put across the Government's actions as anti-democratic.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Ashby: The alternative to the GLC would be abolition of the boroughs. That would be the only way in which to have unwasteful government. One can imagine the hue and cry from Opposition Members if we tried to do that and equate London with electricity councils.

If Londoners could remember some of the Labour actions, they would appreciate the need to abolish the GLC. I remember a marvellous occasion—Her Majesty the Queen's silver jubilee. It was a time of great rejoicing in the capital and many people were out in the streets enjoying themselves. In the same year, the Conservatives gained control of County hall. Before that, however, the Labour GLC was asked if it would like to present a loyal address to Her Majesty. It told Buckingham palace that, if she wanted a loyal address, she should drive up to County Hall and get it for herself. That was a disgraceful action and when we came to power, we apologised to Buckingham palace and went to present a humble address. We have witnessed such political action time and again. The Labour party wants people who acted in that way to run residuary services, not to ensure that they are wound up but to see that they are built up.

Mr. Nellist: The hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) spoke of political actions. The possibility of people being disrespectful to the monarchy seemed rationale enough to him to stop them, being put on residuary bodies. When the Government introduced these measures 18 months ago, we were assured that it had nowt to do with the political colour of people on elected authorities who might be members of successor bodies. It was all to do with economics. It was all about unnecessary tiers of government. Now we hear the malicious voice of this Tory Government. It is about the fear of changing political attitudes in this country and what can happen to bodies in the future.

The hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West categorised the bodies under discussion in this set of amendments as inconsequential. He spoke about matters as not coming up once in five years in normal council or county council agendas. Once the Bill is passed, the matters under discussion will be compensation, hard debts inherited from the metropolitan county and the former GLC and staffing transfers. They will talk about things like property. The hon. Member may not be aware, but when the West Midlands county council was set up some 11 years ago, it took 10 years to sort out the amalgamation of the property rights of the seven district councils which were the constituent bodies of the now West Midlands county council. We are not talking about a seven-way amalgamation but about a 195 way split, and these bodies are going to have full agendas in the future trying to sort out who owns the different houses and the different bits of property presently under the ownership of the metropolitan counties and the GLC.

[Mr. Nellist]

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the hon. Member aware that at County Hall there is still litigation pending on claims outstanding from the LCC-GLC reorganisation in 1965?

Mr. Nellist: The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) about the 20-years litigation which is still to be resolved, shows the seriousness of the discussion we are having and it ought to be treated seriously by Tory Members. I want to deal with the staffing implications of this clause and its implications in general.

I declare an interest, though it should not be necessary to do so, given the length of time this Bill was in Committee, in that I am a member of the West Midlands county council. I come from a region with well over one-third of a million people unemployed, where one in three families are on supplementary benefit. I come from a city where the unemployment level is 25 per cent. I have one ward in my constituency where the unemployment rate is over 50 per cent.

Here we are in the last 49 minutes of a discussion, and in my area 6,800 people presently working for the West Midlands county council, and tens of thousands who work for the GLC and the county councils in the other five metropolitan areas, still do not know what will happen to their jobs. The 6,800 people working for the West Midlands county council have, in the last two years, seen their lives being shattered by this Bill. Eighteen months ago they listened to the Secretary of State, who has not graced us much with his presence in this debate, though his Minister is still on the Bench, talking about saving £120 million. Now it is down to £100 million. He talked about cutting 9,000 jobs, but the latest figure is 7,100 and still we have not heard from any spokesman, official or unofficial of this Tory Government, on how they arrived at those figures. What is the breakdown county by county or service by service? We had to drag it out of certain Ministers in Committee. The fire service and the police service were not supposed to be having any staffing cuts, but still we have not heard whether that is true for clerical workers as well as for operational staff.

We have heard that cuts are not anticipated in waste disposal and archives, but our consumer services and coroners may cost more. Towards the end of the Committee stage it became clear that highways, planning and administration were the only services the Tories would target. We ought to be aware, as are working people outside this Chamber, that in some of the metropolitan county areas those three Services, if the Government are to meet the 7,100 target nationally for job cuts in this Bill will be making a 35 or 40 per cent. cut in staffing. Is that the real figure? The Minister of State has the opportunity to come to the Dispatch Box now and put at rest the minds of those workers up and down the country who are affected by this clause and the other clauses on staffing. I will give him a chance. What services and which areas of the county are going to be affected by this Bill? The Minister does not know.

Mr. Holt rose——

11.15 pm

Mr. Nellist: I am not giving way after what I have been through today. The Minister is not taking the opportunity that I am offering him. Some Conservative Members have said that the figures cannot be given because trade unionists employed in the councils and the elected leadership of those councils have not co-operated with the Tory Government and given the necessary information. How, therefore, did the original targets come about? How did the Government arrive at the figures of £100 million and 7,100 if they did not have the information?

Mr. Tony Banks: They made them up.

Mr. Nellist: As my hon. Friend reminds me, those figures were made up. Between the Royal Assent and March or April next year people will be asked to do three jobs as a result of the amendment that we are discussing. They will be asked to continue to provide the services that they were contracted to provide. They may be asked to work for a quango, a residuary body or a district council, and they will be asked to provide information to other quangos and Ministers. Those people are working under stress. About 400 workers have left the West Midlands county council during the past 10 months. We are seeing the beginning of the disintegration of some specialist teams. I shall not go into this in detail now and I did not have time to do so a couple of hours ago, but the specialist teams under threat are those engaged in toxic and hazardous waste disposal, the chemists, the biologists, and the hydrogeologists. They are the people who have the skills to deal with matters on a countywide basis. It is the rearrangement of services that the amendment deals with that worries me.

Mr. Holt rose——

Mr. Nellist: I shall not give way, because I have nearly finished. The hon. Gentleman can follow me. This provision is not designed solely to meet the political targets that were dreamed up by Tory Ministers two or three years ago, it is a preparation for privatisation. It is no accident that during the past 18 months that we have debated this matter, we have seen, although not necessarily heard from, those Tory Members whose directorships and consultancies are with the firms that would like to take the pickings from the dismemberment of the metropolitan county councils and the GLC, in the form of such services as those dealing with private waste disposal and highway construction and some aspects of transport. Those Tory Members also disagree with the political policies of the elected leadership of the metropolitan county councils.

We have been told that no breakdown is available of the figures to show how the jobs will go if the Bill completes its passage through the House tonight. Abolition will cost millions of pounds more. Some people say that in the metropolitan county council area it will cost up to £69 million a year more to provide the level of services that is being provided now. All those services will deteriorate and people will lose their jobs.

The Labour party warns the House that that will all be changed when the Goverment are changed within the next year or two. The Bill is not about abolishing the functions of the metropolitan county councils and the GLC but about abolishing councillors and their elected leadership. It is about abolishing the rights of 18 million people to elect the leadership of the metropolitan county councils and the GLC. The lessons learnt over the past 18 months during the passage of the Bill have been absorbed by working people, by those who work for the county councils and the trade unions who represent them. Those lessons will rebound on this Tory Government when we have a change of Government in the next year or so.

Mr. Wareing: When discussing the composition of the residuary bodies the Government are under an obligation to answer the many unanswered questions that have been asked in the House and the other place. We have not discussed economic development at great length when we have talked about the allocation of services among the districts, the joint boards and the residuary bodies.

Labour-controlled county councils have endeavoured to deal with the major social problem of mass unemployment. Since 1979, 700,000 redundancies have been created in the metropolitan area and the number of jobless has doubled to over 869,000. Seventeen per cent. of the work force in the metropolitan areas is unemployed. Many of these areas have an aging infrastructure and aging industries. Youth unemployment amounts to over 344,000 and the figure for the long-term jobless is well over 25,000. In those areas the economic development committees of local authorities have either saved or created 45,000 jobs and at an average of £600 per job this is far more cost effective than any of the regional programmes undertaken by either the Conservative Government or the previous Labour Government.

In areas such as Merseyside people have a right to know whether the residuary body will take over some responsibility for economic development companies, subsidiary companies like enterprise boards, and the Merseyside innovation centre, for example, which attempts to apply new technology to industry. We have the right to know whether or not the residuary body will have some scope in that particular area, because people's jobs depend on it. Small businesses depend upon the assistance of various economic development committees in the metropolitan areas.

I am the last person to promote the idea of a residuary body, but if there is to be a residuary body we should be talking about democratic county authorities. Even though I am not normally in accord with some of the economic ideas of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermonsey (Mr. Hughes), we should be discussing the take-over by democratic authorities of regional facilities, such as water, area health authorities and gas and electricity distributive services. We should be talking about the spread of democracy, but in this last period of debate we have only the left-overs.

If a joint committee for Merseyside were established, and assuming that the district councils had a say in the appointment of its members, it would ask the Government why they are fragmenting the arts and culture services of Merseyside. As hon. Members know, like the GLC area, Merseyside has been allocated a trust which will take over certain museums and art galleries. Earlier this year Lord Gowrie reported in another place that the Croxteth country park and Croxteth hall, which are in the centre of my constituency, and Speke hall, which is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden), would be transferred not to the trust but to the Liverpool city council. It has been said these are not museums of national significance, but what would be the cost to Liverpool?

The crisis which is facing the city of Liverpool has been brought about by the Government's financial constraints. There may be legal difficulties in transferring Speke hall to the Liverpool city council, as it is presently owned by the National Trust, although maintained by Merseyside county council, but Croxteth country park has undoubtedly been developed by Merseyside county council since 1974 in a way that would have been impossible for the Liverpool city council. The Earls of Sefton left the Croxteth estate to the Liverpool city council in the 1960s, and because of the expense involved they found great difficulty in renovating the hall and the area.

The county council has established a visitors' centre, and opened to the public the principal rooms in the hall, opened a rare breeds farm and a riding centre and developed the gardens surrounding this delightful spot, right in the centre of both Merseyside and my constituency. It has been listed by the English tourist board as among the top 20 fast-growing attractions in the country. The country park has recently received the Sandford award for heritage education for its highly successful educational programme. Many schemes have been presented, and much advice has been given by the Countryside Commission.

Some £1 million has been spent on a restoration programme at Speke hall, and the number of visitors to both these halls was above average in a time of recession. I appeal to the Government that, regardless of the difference between us in our reaction to local government reorganisation, they should be looking yet again at Croxteth country park and Speke hall. I hope that the Government will look on the amendment with some sympathy, and that the advice that Liverpool city council is unable to maintain and restore both Croxteth and Speke hall will be accepted.

The danger on Merseyside is that a real asset and part of Merseyside's heritage will simply disappear from the enjoyment not only of Merseysiders, but of people from all over the world, as was shown during the international garden festival. I ask the Minister to think again before he allows to go to seed the good work that has been done over the past 10 years by the Merseyside county council with these assets that are so vital to the people of the region.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am glad that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) has returned, because I shall direct a few remarks to him. He could not have been more wrong when he suggested that I did not have the same sort of respect for the office of chairman of the GLC as either past holders of that office or past leaders of the GLC. He mentioned Sir Isaac Hayward. He will have known that person for more years than I did, but I had the pleasure of meeting him and talking to him on a number of occasions. I like to think that many of the finer points of local government that are enshrined within the GLC are attributable to the standards that Ike Hayward laid down. Although the policies are different, the same standards are being pursued by the present leadership of the GLC. If the hon. Gentleman gets a hint of resentment in my comments, he will, in this case, be correct.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

There is little chance that the London residuary body or the successor bodies will be able to complete abolition and take-over by 1 April 1986. The reasons are clear. Nobody knew what the shape of the Bill would be. During its passage throught Parliament it has been dramatically and fundamentally altered. Staggering changes have been made since "Streamlining the Cities" was published. How could anybody work out what would have happened? We cannot be completely sure, even at this stage. Many hon. Members believe that this is the end of the matter, but the amendments that we have made will go the House of Lords where I feel there will be a backlash. The Bill will then be returned to this House, so we are reaching only the end of another stage in its passage. The Bill contains provisions relating to the implementation of all sorts of orders, so the ramifications of the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils will continue to occupy the attention of the House until 31 March 1986.

11.30 pm

We heard earlier about the position of staff in the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. The staff of the GLC are in an extremely peculiar position. Between August and 1 April 1986 the staff of the GLC will be trying to perform three jobs. First, they will continue to carry out the services and functions of the GLC. Secondly, they will be working directly for a single borough council or a quango. Thirdly, they will have to answer requests for information from the 31 other boroughs, quangos or Ministers who will still be showering county hall with requests. Large numbers of staff will be transferred to the successor bodies, or they will be sacked. My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) tried to get the Minister to say how many members of staff will be made redundant, but he was given no answer. The staff commission has been remarkably quiet. Perhaps we could be told what is happening. It has not been involved in implementing the transfer of staff and shows little sign of having made any plans. Local government will be thrown into complete confusion. The position is bad enough now, but it will get even worse between August and 31 March.

It is not surprising, given the uncertainties, that the GLC is losing a number of its key staff. Not unnaturally, they are thinking about their future careers, their family commitments and their mortgages. That is a normal human response to the problem that the Government have inflicted upon them, and it makes it even more difficult for the GLC and the metropolitan county councils to maintain the services that they are statutorily obliged to maintain until 31 March 1986.

Moreover, the future financial structure of London's government is still uncertain and will remain uncertain until, at the very earliest, December 1985. The boroughs will be unable to decide upon the level of funding of their services until they know their expenditure targets and grant related expenditure assessments, the level of rate capping, where that is appropriate, and the details of the London equalisation scheme. London boroughs will have just three months in which to plan their policies, appoint their staffs and get organised. It is a hopelessly unrealistic timetable. It would assist the boroughs and the residuary bodies if the Department of the Environment could give advice, but the civil servants are clearly driving by the seats of their trousers because they do not know what the future holds and are making it up as they go along, just as the Government have made it up during the passage of this shameful Bill. The quangos, preparatory committees and joint authorities will not even meet until September, so they will have a maximum of seven months to try to implement the change-over.

I suppose that new office accommodation will be found for the London residuary body. In answering one of the few questions that I tabled, the Minister said that County hall might be used as accommodation for the London residuary body. That answer conflicts with another statement that County hall will be sold. Perhaps it will be sold to fund one of the charitable off-shore institutions that Ministers are hoping to set up.

We need answers to these questions. Although we have asked them many times, we have not yet been given satisfactory answers. The files, computer programs, information sytems and legal records that are with the GLC will have to be routed to scores of different destinations and made compatible with the information of the receiving bodies.

Proper joint working arrangements will have to be established, involving the creation of a consensus among the 32 London boroughs of differing political complexions on the polices to be pursued and the level of services to be given. The electorate has given no mandate or guidance on these matters. The Secretary of State will have to give guidance and make decisions on hundreds of local government issues when his civil servants have no direct experience or qualifications to enable them to do so. We have seen how true that is by noting the way in which the bill has been changed during its passage. It bears little relationship to the original legislation. The House is being asked to agree a dog's breakfast of a Bill.

Sorting out all the legal tangles that are involved in local government will cause many problems. We cannot dispose of major institutions and expect no legal problems. The successor body arrangements are not straightforward. We should remember what happened when the GLC was established. We cannot expect major disputes in the courts to drag on for ages.

We have heard a great deal about the co-operation between boroughs that will be forthcoming. My deputy chairman at county hall, the estimable Sandy Sandford, is a good Tory who is wholly opposed——

Mr. Corbyn: There is no such thing.

Mr. Banks: There is. I know at least two good Tories. I admit that one of them is now dead, Sandy Sandford says that there will not be voluntary co-operation, even between Tory boroughs. He speaks as a former chairman of planning at Westminster. He says that the worst problem that he ever had was not with Labour boroughs but in trying to achieve voluntary co-operation with the true blue Tory borough of Kensington and Chelsea. The Minister deceives himself and the House if he thinks that there will be much voluntary co-operation among the boroughs in London or among the districts in the metropolitan counties. It is interesting to note that litigation is still outstanding on the LCC-GLC re-organisation in 1965.

I cite one final statistic in a debate that has roamed wider than I expected. I am grateful for that. The GLC owns 12,234 properties and pieces of land. The legal documents relating to that ownership occupy four miles of shelving. We do not have the time between now and 31 March even to dust all the files in four miles of shelving, never mind come back with an easy transition to the 175 successor bodies that the Minister claims will streamline the structure of local government in London and the metropolitan counties.

The Bill is now more of a mess than when it started its passage through Parliament. The fault for that lies entirely with the Government Front Bench and the people who have supported them because little or no thought went into the proposal. Therefore, the confusion that will undoubtedly come from the enactment of the Bill will be entirely of the Government's making, and they will live to rue the day.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It is perhaps appropriate that the last speech to be made from the Opposition Benches in the long parliamentary proceedings of the Bill should be made by the present and, indeed, the last, chairman of the GLC.

Mr. Banks: Chair.

Mr. Baker: Chair. I am sorry. The hon. Member has been a consistent opponent of the measure. In one little aside a moment ago, he referred to one of the few questions which he has put to my Department on the measure. One of the few questions? He asked well over 1,000 questions on the measure, costing the Government tens of thousands of pounds—he is the last of the big Oscars. He has certainly applied himself with energy to defending the GLC, and I will recognise that fact.

We are now in almost the 340th hour of debate on the measure, including the time spent in the other House. It has been very lengthily debated at all stages—one of the longest Bills for debate that we have had for many years.

The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), in moving the amendments, thanked all those people who had been briefing him over the last year or 18 months. It was a good briefing. We occasionally saw bits of it. It was certainly intense and voluminous. There was a team of 27 from the GLC working on it, I understand. I thought that the work provided by the metropolitan counties was of a better quality, and, for my money, better work. None the less, it was impressive, and, as he rightly said, it is rather unusual with any Bill going through the House for the Opposition to be as well briefed as Ministers.

There was great talk about the destruction of things —the destruction of services and of activities. The one thing that gave me some little pleasure as the Bill was going through and as I looked upon the serried ranks of the PR people in the galleries was that we were destroying the client base of many PR firms by abolishing the metropolitan counties, for they have benefited enormously from this exercise. Indeed, one of the features of this operation is the vast amount of money which has been spent on advertising, some £10 million, and in the course of the last few days, another £95,000 on four-page advertisements in the press.

Mr. Snape: In the midst of these strictures, will the Minister bear in mind that he might be doing a great deal of financial damage to many of his right hon. and hon. Friends?

Mr. Baker: My strictures are the same, whether I afflict my friends or my enemies, when I come to the enormous amounts of money which I think has been wasted in the PR campaign of the metropolitan counties.

If I may remind the House of the purpose of the amendments the Lords amendment allowed the co-ordinating committees to appoint one member, who would obviously be a councillor, to serve on the residuary body. The hon. Member for Blackburn, in moving the amendment some two hours ago, sought to say that all 10 members of the residuary body should be elected councillors. I would resist that. He is aware, but other hon. Members may not be, of the role of the residuary bodies. It is to operate exactly as the residuary legatee of the six metropolitan counties and of the GLC. It is there to wind up the functions such as management of the debt, management of the mortgage book and management of superannuation schemes and pension schemes, continuing functions which, in some cases, as regards the metropolitan counties, could well be taken over by lead boroughs. There is talk of co-operation or lack of it, but outside London I am well aware of various fairly secret discussions which have been taking place among Labour districts where they will volunteer——

Mr. Snape: Name them.

Mr. Baker: They do not like to be named for the simple reason that it is still the official policy of the Labour party not to co-operate. It is the official policy of the national executive not to co-operate. It is the official policy of the TUC not to co-operate. We know that many plans are being laid and that some of the functions which may go to the residuary body in London will be done by lead boroughs in the other metropolitan areas.

I support what the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said about the need for co-operation. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said towards the end of his speech, the Government and the Staff Commission will not be to blame if there is no co-operation. Hostility has been engendered by certain unions but not by all. Some branches of some unions have been hostile, but not all, and have refused to co-operate with the commission or ourselves. The commission has opened discussions with many unions. It has already issued six circulars defining ring fencing. I have heard today that certain Labour-controlled London borough councils will refuse to comply with ring fencing unless directed by the Secretary of State. I understand that one of the west midlands district councils has decided not to co-operate, under pressure from the unions.

It is not in the interests of council staffs or union members to take that attitude. When the Bill receives the Royal Assent—I hope that that will take place next week—I hope that attitudes will change and that there will be co-operation on the part of boroughs, district councils and unions. Some branches of unions have seen me. The west midlands NALGO branch has talked and there has been a series of fruitful meetings and discussions with it. I have talked also to some of the staff associations. That is the way forward.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has written to Mr. Jarvis, the chairman of the trades union local government committee. He wrote:

> "We remain willing to open negotiations with your member local government unions. There are matters on which we are prepared to be flexible in the expectation that your member unions will come to the negotiating table in a constructive and realistic way."

I hope that, now the Bill is almost on the statute book, there will be a change of heart among the unions which are still sticking out to oppose it. Members on both sides of the House are concerned about the interests and well-being of the staff. We have already made arrangements through some of the amendments in another place to arrange early retirement schemes for the successor authorities so that they can take on more of the staff of the authorities that are to be abolished.

[Mr. Baker]

In the way forward, as we move towards the date——

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Baker: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue. As we move towards the date of abolition, which will be 31 March 1986——

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Baker: —I hope that the transition will be smooth, as that will be in the interests of the residents of all the conurbations that will be affected, and of London. It will be in the interests of the ratepayers of those areas and in the interests of the staff of the authorities that will be abolished. I hope that that co-operation will come about.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 188, Noes 316.

Division No. 261] 11.48 pm

AYES

Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Archer, Rt Hon Peter
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell, Ian
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Janner, Hon Greville
Jenkins, Rt Hon Roy (Hillh'd)
John, Brynmor
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Edward
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
Maclennan, Robert
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Rowlands, Ted
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C. (Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steel, Rt Hon David
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Wallace, James
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
White, James
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Allen McKay and
Mr. Frank Haynes.

NOES

Adley, Robert
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baldry, Tony
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Benyon, William
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon

Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Holt, Richard
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Howell, Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Joseph, Rt Hon Sir Keith
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lamont, Norman
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Mates, Michael
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Oppenheim, Rt Hon Mrs S.
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parkinson, Rt Hon Cecil
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Walker, Rt Hon P. (W'cester)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones and
Mr. Archie Hamilton.

Question accordingly negatived.

It being after Twelve o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the order of the House this day, to put the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Schedule 6

WASTE REGULATION AND DISPOSAL

Lords amendment: No. 73, leave out schedule 6.

Motion made, and Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

The House divided: Ayes 320, Noes 187.

Division No. 262] [12.01 am

AYES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony

Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Holt, Richard
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Howell, Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Joseph, Rt Hon Sir Keith
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lamont, Norman
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Mates, Michael
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Oppenheim, Rt Hon Mrs S.
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Prior, Rt Hon James
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Walker, Rt Hon P. (W'cester)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. John Major and
Mr. Ian Lang.

NOES

Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Archer, Rt Hon Peter
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)

Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell, Ian
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Janner, Hon Greville
Jenkins, Rt Hon Roy (Hillh'd)
John, Brynmor
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Edward
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
Maclennan, Robert
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Rowlands, Ted
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C. (Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steel, Rt Hon David
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Wallace, James
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
White, James
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Frank Haynes and
Mr. Allen McKay.

Lords amendment No. 69 agreed to. [Special Entry.]

Schedule 5

Road Traffic

Lords amendment: No. 70 in page 120, line 41, leave out from "(5)" to "or" in line 46 and insert

"Any expenses reasonably incurred by the Secretary of State in exercising the functions transferred by an order under this paragraph may be recovered by him from the local authorities from which the functions were transferred in such proportions as may be agreed between the local authorities"

Motion made, and Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

The House divided: Ayes 322, Noes 183.

Division No. 263] [12.13 am

AYES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy

Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Holt, Richard
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Howell, Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Joseph, Rt Hon Sir Keith
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lamont, Norman
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Mates, Michael
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Oppenheim, Rt Hon Mrs S.
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parkinson, Rt Hon Cecil
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Prior, Rt Hon James
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Walker, Rt Hon P. (W'cester)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Ian Lang and
Mr. John Major.

NOES

Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Archer, Rt Hon Peter
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell, Ian
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement

Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Janner, Hon Greville
Jenkins, Rt Hon Roy (Hillh'd)
John, Brynmor
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kirkwood, Archy
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Edward
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
Maclennan, Robert
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Rowlands, Ted
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C. (Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steel, Rt Hon David
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Wallace, James
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
White, James
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Frank Haynes and
Mr. Allen McKay.

Question accordingly agreed to. [Special Entry.]

Motion made, and Question put, That this House doth agree with the remaining Lords amendments. — [Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

The House divided: Ayes 320, Noes 185.

Division No. 264] [12.26 am

AYES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Best, Keith
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawkins, Sir Paul (SW N'folk)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Henderson, Barry
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Holt, Richard
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Howell, Ralph (N Norfolk)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Joseph, Rt Hon Sir Keith
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lamont, Norman
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)

Mates, Michael
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Oppenheim, Rt Hon Mrs S.
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parkinson, Rt Hon Cecil
Parris, Matthew
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Prior, Rt Hon James
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Scott, Nicholas
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Terlezki, Stefan
Thatcher, Rt Hon Mrs M.
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Walker, Rt Hon P. (W'cester)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Carol Mather and
Mr. Robert Boscawen.

NOES

Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Archer, Rt Hon Peter
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Bell, Stuart
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell, Ian
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Conlan, Bernard
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Janner, Hon Greville
Jenkins, Rt Hon Roy (Hillh'd)
John, Brynmor
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Kirkwood, Archy
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Edward
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
Maclennan, Robert
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Rowlands, Ted
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C. (Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steel, Rt Hon David
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Wallace, James

Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
White, James
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Frank Haynes and
Mr. Allen McKay.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 49 to 68, 71, 72, and 74 to 98 agreed to.

Ordered,

That a Committee be appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to certain of their amendments.—[Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

Ordered,

That Mr. Secretary Jenkin, Mr. Kenneth Baker, Mr. Tim Sainsbury, Mr. Peter Snape and Mr. Jack Straw be members of the Committee.—[Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

Ordered,

That Three be the Quorum of the Committee — [Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

Ordered,

That the Committee do withdraw immediately. — [Mr. Patrick Jenkin.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Observation of transport markets

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 80(5) (Standing Committees on European Community documents.)

That this House takes note of European Community documents Nos. 12451/80 and 9826/84 concerning observation of markets for freight transport by road, rail and inland waterway and of the Department of Transport's explanatory memorandum of November 1984; and supports the Government's opposition to the proposal to make the market observation system permanent.—[Mr. Durant.]

Question agreed to.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Terms and conditions of employment

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

That the draft Job Release Act 1977 (Continuation) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 18th June, be approved.—[Mr. Durant.]

Question agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, notwithstanding the practice of the House as to the intervals between stages of Bills brought in upon Ways and Means Resolutions, more than one stage of the Finance Bill may be taken at any sitting of the House.—[Mr. Durant.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL (REASONS COMMITTEE)

Reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Lords amendments reported, and agreed to; to be communicated to the Lords.

Westland

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

12.39 am

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The subject of this Adjournment debate is the future of Westland, but first the House may want to know of another future, which was established not many hours ago. I am told that at 10.20 this evening the wife of my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) gave birth to a daughter, Helen Grace. I am sure that the House will wish to assure the hon. Member, his wife and Helen Grace of its best wishes.

I am grateful for the opportunity of this debate. I am also grateful to the Minister for Information Technology for his attendance, particularly in view of his past contact with Westland as Minister for Defence Procurement, and to other hon. Members who have agreed to take part in the debate and join me in supporting Westland. The hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) may seek to catch your eye later on, Mr. Deputy Speaker, from the Government Benches, as may the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) from the Labour Front Bench and my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross).

It must be very nearly unprecedented to have so many hon. Members take part in an Adjournment debate. I hope that the Minister will recognise the cross-party support for Westland that this indicates. What is also, I suspect, practically unprecedented is to have such a degree of outside interest taken in such a debate at such a late hour. Nearly 40 of the Westland work force travelled up especially from Yeovil and elsewhere after work today to attend this half hour debate and to show their support for their company and their belief and pride in the work that they do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that he should not refer to strangers in the Gallery.

Mr. Ashdown: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for referring to anybody who may or may not be in the Strangers Gallery. I merely wanted to show that there is support for Westland outside the House. I am sure the Minister recognises that their effort demonstrates the kind of commitment that is one of the greatest strengths of Westland.

This is at once the most difficult speech that I have made in the House and perhaps the most important. Westland is not only the pride of my community, and of others in the west of England; it is also the source of much of our prosperity. But more than that, Westland has served Her Majesty's forces as one of the nation's principal defence industries, with exceptional distinction, most recently in the Falklands, where our helicopters were recognised by all, from the Secretary of State for Defence to the ordinary Royal Marine in the field, to have been one of the principal causes of our victory.

Westland is our only national helicopter manufacturer and our only hope for major participation in the European collaborative helicopter projects of the 1990s. Westland is one of the key components of Britain's aerospace industry. It is one of our nation's first centres of the new technology. Its work force, from specialised design teams to those using the newest technologies on the production line, is loyal, skilled, committed, proud of its work and confident that, as a team, it can keep Britain at the forward edge of world skills in the future.

[Mr. Ashdown]

In short, Westland is not just vital to Yeovil. It is vital to Britain. The first thing, the chief thing, that I want the Minister to do tonight is to say just that: to say to those listening outside that the Government believe that Westland is an important national asset and that they are committed to playing their role in maintaining the overall integrity of the company.

I know, as the Minister knows, that the Government have a confidential report confirming the importance of Westland. I know also that the Minister's Department has shown its confidence in the company by investing in the development of the W30. I know that, whatever the Ministry of Defence does, his Department will want to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that that investment is not lost.

Why is it, then, that throughout the recent crisis we heard not one word from the Government to strengthen the company's position? Why is it that the Government stayed silent and allowed those in City boardrooms a free hand to play fast and loose with a great company's reputation and the livelihood of thousands of workers? Let the Minister tonight make good that deficiency. He knows the company's underlying strength. He knows that its long-term prospects are excellent. He knows that we have a new chairman in Sir John Cuckney. He knows that there is now, throughout Westland, a grim determination to do all that is necessary to ensure the company's future. Let the Government make their contribution tonight by committing themselves, in terms that cannot be misunderstood, to playing their part with the work force and the management to ensure that future.

Let the Minister recognise that one of the chief ways in which the Government can show that commitment is to make a decision soon about the AST404. Is it not the case that Westland has put in the most effective bid for this order? Did not its submission for an uprated W30 meet that specification in detail and in full? Is it not the case that Westland was the only British participant in the competition, and that in purchase price and running costs it was cheaper than the others by up to 30 per cent.? Is not the W30 300 series the best aircraft of its sort in the world, with considerable foreign sales potential? Is it not the case, for example, that Spain, Scandinavia and Australia are almost certainly ready to buy the Westland aircraft as soon as the British Government make up their mind?

The Minister knows that these facts are true. Why, then, just at the moment when Westland was about to put the ball in the net, have the Government allowed the Army and the Ministry of Defence to move the goal posts? Is that an appropriate way to treat a great company which has served Britain so well? I ask the Minister to give us an assurance that he will use his best endeavours to ensure that the AST404 decision is taken soon and in favour of Westland. He should realise that his answer can make a great contribution to a great company, can help sustain prosperity and jobs in the west of England, can support one of our nation's key sectors and can strengthen Britain's defence.

Westland is not seeking charity, nor special treatment —it needs neither. We are asking for a fair chance to do what we do best—make the best helicopters in the world for Britain's defence. All the ingredients are there to ensure the company's future: the product is excellent; the work force is dedicated; the management has a new look; and the determination is evident. All that is missing is a clear commitment from the Government to join us to secure that future. I ask the Minister to provide that tonight.

12.46 am

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): I thank the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and my hon. Friend the Minister for allowing me to intervene briefly. I initially questioned the desirability of debating this subject tonight, but I am sure that, given the all-party agreement about which the hon. Gentleman spoke—I agreed with almost everything that he said—we can produce a positive message.

My hon. Friends the Members for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) and for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) have been assiduous in supporting the view that I shall put across. I think that there is all-party agreement on the fundamental necessity for impressing upon the world Britain's confidence in its single helicopter manufacturer.

Let us be frank — Boeing, Bell, Sikorsky, Aerospatiale, Agusta and MBB have had great difficulty in selling new helicopters. Westland is no exception in supplying a product to an overcrowded market. There has been a baring of the cupboard, and that is all. There has been a revelation as a result of a well-intentioned bid, adding substantial sums of private money to the company's resources. As is the wont of the financial journalists in the City, there has been a slight fluttering in the dove cotes. That is all.

Westland is paying its bill and wages and producing the goods today as it was eight or 10 weeks ago before this incident. The company has grasped this nettle and is having a financial spring clean. There is nothing wrong with that. Westland will not be the first company to examine itself. At the moment, its bankers are standing by it, and that is good and proper.

There is no better person than my hon. Friend the Minister, with his previous experience, to know the ins and outs of the matter and the problems and benefits of Westland helicopters. They are a fine product, and the company has a fine record and fine work force. It will continue to have those advantages. I believe, from my experience, that the services do not understand the helicopter's merits. In previous speeches I have pointed out the relative views taken by other countries of this weapon.

It is all very well for Ministers to say that the services know best. I remind the Minister that the tank was devised by the First Lord of the Admiralty, who was a politician. The British Army went to war on horses in 1939, and 16 of our ships were hit by second world war aeroplanes during the Falklands war. There are moments when politicians sometimes have to know best. I could say that AST404, which was well understood for many years in the Ministry of Defence, is really a bad story of changed minds by senior people at the last minute, which leaves British industry wringing its hands. Furthermore, I pull the leg of my hon. Friend and ask: if the W30 is unsuitable for the British Army, why not offer it to South Africa? I feel that might cause troubles, and then the argument might get turned on its head.

I hope that the Indian order still comes through. It is not impossible. There are uses for this helicopter; it could be bought. There is just one small problem.

I hope that my hon. Friend will spell out a message of confidence in this great company tonight. That is all that it asks. It asks its principal customer, the Government, and its principal investor, the Government, to have confidence in Westland.

12.50 am

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I thank the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) for giving us all the opportunity to take part in the debate, and the Minister for Information Technology for conceding some of his time for it.

I join the hon. Member for Yeovil in congratulating his hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on the birth of a daughter. I assure his hon. Friend that, although she might be a delight now, as girls grow older they become more troublesome, until they get married, and I am told that after that they are always a delight.

Westland is a company of which this country should be proud. It is at the forefront of aerospace technology and is the country's only helicopter and hovercraft manufacturer. Nearly all the helicopters which saw service in the South Atlantic campaign were provided by Westland. Without its products there would not have been a victory, and this country owes a great debt of gratitude not only to the people who flew and fought with the helicopters, but to the work force which backed them up.

Since 1982, about 600 or more jobs have been lost, 500 in the last year, and 300 at Yeovil. About one quarter of Yeovil's work force — members of the Transport and General Workers union, the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs and, the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, the Transport Aircraft Servicing Specialist and other unions — have been employed on the W30 on the strength of anticipated orders from the Ministry of Defence. But now the goalposts have been moved, and we have not really been told why, although some vague, strange reasons about the changes in the Army's demands have come forward.

I put it to the House that the real problem is Trident. The demands made by the Trident programme are affecting every purchase and procurement by the Government. The Royal Air Force is seeking to shed some of its responsibilities because of its £400 million overspend. I notice that it has already passed its responsibility for the Super Harrier to the Navy, and it is doing the same with the tactical transport helicopter to the Army.

We have to ask, as did the hon. Member for Yeovil and the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) why the Government have taken no interest whatsoever in the bidding that has taken place for the future of the company. At £50 million it is a snip for whoever wants it, as Flight International said, yet no major British company has come forward to seek to buy it. Is it because the Government are not prepared to confirm orders to give the company a chance to meet the technological needs of the Army and of the industry and to maintain our own independent service? Is it that they are just not bothered, or is it, because of the pressures on the Ministry of Defence, that they are prepared to buy things off the shelf from the Americans or from other suppliers rather than go forward and maintain what is important for our own strategic employment industries—our own separate and independent helicopter industry? We are talking not just about the future of a number of planes, important though they are, but about the maintenance of an important strategic industry in the country.

We have been told that pressure is being brought to bear to use the Chinook instead of a smaller lighter helicopter, but this does not appear to make any military sense in terms of strategic interest, particularly on the central front. I grant that Chinook is important for its lift capacity, but its primary purpose is as a heavy logistic transporter. It is the battlefield bus, as opposed to the battlefield taxi. It is what the Army is, and was, looking for until the pressure came to bear on the Ministry of Defence.

Heavier helicopters are much more vulnerable to ground fire, which was responsible for the loss of so many helicopters by the Russians in Afghanistan. We have to expect our new helicopters to meet the challenge of the light, quick tactical helicopters on the central front which the Russians are developing. We must be in a position to meet that challenge. It does not make sense to develop a heavy helicopter capable of carrying 44 men when one wants to deliver a platoon of about a dozen or so to important tactical positions on the western front or to confront a terrorist attack.

To deny the Army a tactical transport helicopter is to deny our Army the flexibility and manoeuvrability needed to counter changes in Soviet strategy. That is the important point which we must bear in mind. It is the nature of the helicopter about which we are concerned, its importance to the Army and its role therein, rather than looking for a heavy large helicopter which is vulnerable to ground fire and attack. We should address ourselves to proper military needs instead of acceding to the Ministry of Defence's desire to buy off the shelf in dribs and drabs as it thinks money is available. In so doing it is not recognising the importance of maintaining our helicopter industry.

The Government should say that there is a need to maintain our interest and control over Westland so that we can maintain the industry for the country's defence and maintain the work force at the frontiers of high technology, in which helicopter design and manufacture have a prominent place. Whatever happens, the Government must maintain our control of Westland in Britain. It must not be allowed to pass out of existence or into foreign control.

12.55 am

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): The Minister for Information Technology has had a long day, because he has already had his ear bent by two senior executives of British Hovercraft Corporation during his visit to my constituency about 12 hours ago. I wish to support everything that has been said so ably so far in the debate. I remind the Minister that Westland is the largest industrial employer on the Isle of Wight, with a work force of about 1,500. Anything up to 200 subcontractors of various sorts on the island look to the company for much of their bread and butter. I remind the hon. Gentleman also that in February the average unemployment rate on the island was 17·3 per cent.

The skills of the work force at Westland are undoubted. There is £60 million worth of orders on the Isle of Wight from BHC, Shorts, Boeing and De Havilland among others. That bears witness to the ability and the skills of the work force. The work is mostly in the composite sector and it is carried out in works which were only recently modernised at a cost to Westland of about £5 million. It is referred to as a centre of excellence and I believe that to be right.

[Mr. Stephen Ross]

Hovercraft orders are few and far between but that is hardly the fault of Westland, which has tried everthing that it knows to persuade the Royal Navy of their importance in mine counter-measures work. The principal message that both management and men at East Cowes wish me to convey to the House is the need to keep the firm together. Please do not hive off parts of what is, by common consent, a highly successful company, because of a hiccup over a particular helicopter order. The flexibility within the firm is its strength from the point of view of BHC.

12.57 am

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has initiated an important debate that is reflected by the extremely high attendance in the Chamber. The House will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) and the hon. Members for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) for their contributions. I know that Westland receives tremendous support from many hon. Members, especially from my hon. Friends the Members for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer), and for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham), who are all present in the Chamber. The same can be said of my hon. Friend the Member for Somerset and Frome (Mr. Boscawen), whose position as a Government Whip does not allow him to participate in our debates. My hon. Friend is in his place and he gives considerable support to the company.

The concern for Westland that has been expressed by all those who have participated in the debate is one that is shared by the Government both from the point of view of my own Department and from the somewhat different standpoint of the Ministry of Defence. I wish to clarify the role of my Department in relation to the company and to correct any misapprehensions that there might be on that score.

My Department has a general sponsorship role towards the company, as it has towards other private sector firms. I have much in mind the importance of Westland as an employer, especially in the south-west of England, and as a company upon which many equipment firms depend for their business.

Britain has historically been a leader in aerospace technology. It has a well-established capability in airframes, engines and equipment for both fixed wing and rotary wing aircraft. Westland has a distinguished place in this history. The maintenance of this position depends, as Westland recognises, on being competitive in world markets. It is worth recalling that Westland has made considerable achievements in the export market, often assisted by Government support in the difficult negotiations which such deals inevitably involve. I and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement have taken part at various times in those export negotiations in various parts of the world, in support of Westland.

Since 1960, Westland expertise in naval helicopters has secured 60 per cent. of the light helicopter market outside the United States, with sales of Lynx, and previously Wasps. It has also secured some 30 per cent. of the medium helicopter market with sales of Sea King. In total, some 250 Westland helicopters are in service in some 17 countries around the world, a record that speaks for itself.

We in the Department of Trade and Industry are investing large amounts of money by way of launch aid for Westland's civil helicopter projects. The agreement in relation to the W30 provides for launch aid of £41 million, of which nearly £35 million has already been paid. The civil version of the EH101 helicopter, which Westland is developing in collaboration with the Italian company Augusta, will receive launch aid of up to £60 million, of which £4 million has so far been paid.

That investment surely demonstrates that the Government are giving the company tangible support in its efforts to break into the civil helicopter market. I remind the House that the EH101 agreement with Italy is supported by an intergovernmental memorandum of understanding.

Without doubting the sincerity of what the hon. Member for Yeovil says or his right to raise the matter, I should like to say that he shares with all of us a responsibility not to say anything either here or outside the House that might have a damaging effect on the company, which we all value. Two points that he made rather surprised me. First, he said that the Government had stayed silent during the period when a bid was taking place for the company, as indeed we did. I ask him and the House rhetorically, in the interests of time, to surmise what else would have been proper for us to do. When a private company is the subject of a bid there is no way that the Government can take a view one way or the other.

Secondly, on the AST404, which is within the prerogative of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement, whom I am glad to have with me on the Front Bench tonight, I do not have anything formally to add to what he said in answer to questions in the House on 2 July. However, I should like to tell the hon. Gentleman that the letters AST—I am not trying to be offensive when I spell this out, because it might be helpful to the House—stand for air staff target, and target in defence procurement terms means just that. It is an original concept that is being devised by the services, with a possibility of it being met.

According to the processes in the Ministry of Defence, when further refinement of the staff target takes place, it becomes known as a staff requirement—an ASR, GSR or NSR. At that point, and at that point only, can a document be put out for a competition to be held. The hon. Gentleman might say that there has been a bid, it was 30 per cent. cheaper, or it was the best bid, but that is not so. There has not yet been any question of a competition. If there was an ASR in existence, we would be a stage closer to having a competition, but that stage has not been reached.

The hon. Gentleman must be careful in what he says, at about fanning up the anxieties of the work force of Westland's and his constituents, and suggesting that the company has made a bid when it has not, and that it has entered a competition when there has not been one. That needs to be fairly and clearly stated. As for suggesting that the goal posts have been moved, the Ministry of Defence and the Army Department are refining the staff targets, which is precisely why there is a target, as the hon. Gentleman would know from his military experience.

Mr. Ashdown: The matter must be cleared up. I hope that the Minister will recognise that equivalent anxieties about the way in which the company has been treated in this matter have come both from me and Conservative Members. Does he recognise that the Westland derivative of the W30 fulfilled the AST404 requirement, as it was laid down in detail?

Mr. Pattie: The fact that the hon. Gentleman's anxieties may be echoed by my hon. Friends may mean that several people are under a genuine misapprehension. I am not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman is culpable in this matter, but I am pointing out that two stages must be completed before there is a competition. In suggesting that we should all ensure that we speak with considerable care and responsibility in this matter, I thought that it was correct to get the facts straight.

I am sure that the House would wish me to pay tribute to the contribution of Sir Basil Blackwell to the company in the past, and to offer best wishes for the future to the new chairman, Sir John Cuckney, and the acting chief executive, Hugh Stewart. Sir John has an outstanding reputation in the City and in industry. His arrival has brought stability, following the turmoil caused by the recent takeover bid and its last-minute withdrawal. It is a tribute to the inherent strength of the company that customers have remained loyal, and that there is no suggestion of any loss of confidence by creditors. Sir John will review the company's position in the light of the report that the board has commissioned from Price Waterhouse. At present, we can look forward to a period of stability and consolidation, during which Westland can redouble its efforts to promote its helicopters, especially in overseas markets. That is exactly as my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare suggested. At present, we want a period of calm.

Westland is at present actively pursuing numerous sales opportunities for helicopters abroad. The company believes that there may be potential for sales of up to 140 Lynx aircraft in Europe, the middle east, Asia, Africa and south America, for up to 10 Sea Kings in Asia and the middle east, and for W30s in the United States of America, Europe, the Gulf, Asia, Africa and Australasia.

The House will know of the efforts that Westland has made to secure contracts to supply 21 W30 helicopters to the Indian Oil and Natural Gas Corporation for offshore work, and six aircraft to the Indian Government. The British Government have taken a considerable interest in this business and have, at the request of the Indian Government, agreed that the purchase might be funded out of the aid programme. That offer still stands. The ultimate decision about what aircraft they need must of course rest with the Indian authorities.

The Ministry has outstanding orders for 18 Sea King and six Lynx helicopters, worth about £70 million. There is, of course, a continuing need for spares and support services for the helicopters currently in service, and which will remain in service for many years to come. The Ministry is currently spending some £60 million a year on such spares and support. The Ministry of Defence is also funding development of the naval version of the EH101, which is a key element in the company's future strategy.

I hope that what I have said this evening will demonstrate that the Government are not a disinterested observer in the future of the helicopter industry, but we must not forget that Westland is a private sector company. There is no Government shareholding, and it is not for the Government to intervene in the management of the company or to seek to influence the form its future should take. I believe, however, that with good management and a determination to compete effectively in world markets in collaboration with others on major projects, Westland has a good future to look forward to.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eight minutes past One o'clock.

House of Commons

Tuesday 9 July 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

BRITISH RAILWAYS BILL
As amended, considered; to be read the Third time.

BRITISH RAILWAYS (TROWSE BRIDGE) BILL [Lords] (By Order)

YORKSHIRE WATER AUTHORITY BILL (By Order)
Order for Second Reading read.
To be read a Second time upon Thursday 11 July.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

1. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how he proposes to finance the second year of the youth training scheme.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): We are making some £925 million in 1986-87 and some £1,100 million in 1987-88 available for the new youth training scheme. Employers will also be contributing to its costs.

Mr. Park: What steps does the Secretary of State propose to take to bridge the gap between the current estimated cost of the one-year programme — £781 million — and the £925 million to which he has just referred? Has he received a commitment from the employers, or is this another case of robbing Peter to pay Paul, to the detriment of the trainees?

Mr. King: If the hon. Gentleman looks at the figures, he will find that the £925 million is only part of the cost for part of the year. The academic year overlaps the financial year. The hon. Gentleman knows that the proposals are the unanimous recommendation of the Manpower Services Commission, comprising the Confederation of British Industry, the Trades Union Congress and independent local education authority interests. I am pleased to support them and keen that they should be introduced at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Dickens: Is it not a fact that for the first time in the history of this country all youngsters under the age of 18 now have the opportunity to continue in full-time education, to take a job or to enter a training scheme that is relevant and flexible enough to suit their needs? This is something of which we ought to be proud and which my right hon. Friend ought to be saying from the Dispatch Box.

Mr. King: I try to say it on every possible occasion. This is a remarkable achievement, but we are not resting on our laurels. After the success of the one-year scheme we are introducing the two-year scheme. I hope that it will become a permanent feature and improve the training opportunities and work experience of every youngster who wants to take part in the scheme.

Mr. Mason: Is the Secretary of State aware that I have received complaints that 17-year-olds are being refused places on youth training schemes until all 16-year-olds have been catered for? Is that not foolish when young people have decided to take a further year of education to increase their O-levels so that they will be better equipped for the YTS? Is this a Government directive or a matter for local decision?

Mr. King: They are not being refused places, but 16-year-olds have always been given priority. When we introduced the scheme we guaranteed a place upon it for every 16-year-old, but our ambition was to help as many 17-year-olds as we could. We have fulfilled the guarantee for both the 16-year-olds and the 17-year-olds. There may be a slight blemish in this respect. If the right hon. Gentleman has heard of problems, I hope that he will let us know so that there will be the minimum delay before 17-year-olds are provided with an opportunity to participate in the scheme.

Mr. Favell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that in many cases the one-year scheme has proved to be very successful and that it does not appear to be necessary to have a two-year scheme? For example, in Stockport it is prophesied that over 80 per cent. of those who are on this year's scheme will have a permanent job at the end of it.

Mr. King: The figures for the number of entrants to the youth training scheme going on to full-time jobs are encouraging in many parts of the country. My hon. Friend will recognise that there is wide support among employers and those involved in training for the concept of a two-year scheme, which we are keen to see. I am glad that we have the support of hon. Members. I hope in all parts of the House, and certainly we have the unanimous support of the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Sheerman: The right hon. Gentleman knows that he will have the support of Labour Members if he moves towards a two-year quality training scheme. Is he not misleading the House, however, when the facts show that the present budgeting allows for only a one and a half year scheme, 30,000 places cut from the mode B provision and a reduction from 26 weeks off-the-job training, as recommended, to 20 weeks? That is not compatible with a quality two-year scheme.

Mr. King: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is already seeking to chip away from what is a determined effort to introduce a quality two-year scheme — [Interruption.] Waving a cutting from a newspaper does not demonstrably prove any argument. I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is our determination to introduce a quality scheme. We want to give the best possible opportunity to young people. We believe that the scheme, as brought forward unanimously by the MSC, contains within it the right framework to achieve that objective.

European Community (Grants)

2. Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any estimate of the number of jobs created as a result of grants from the European Community.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): Well over a million people a year are taking part in training or job creation schemes supported by the European social fund. More than 150,000 jobs were created or preserved with help from the European regional development fund between 1975 and 1983. Others were created through infrastructure projects.

Sir Russell Johnston: Given that the Government say that they want to encourage individual effort and that 70 per cent. of social fund money goes to the MSC, will the Minister take steps to ensure that the voluntary bodies promoting employment and training get a better share of the money?

Mr. Bottomley: I will do the best I can.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: As every pound that we receive from the Common Market costs the British taxpayer £1·42, could we not create 42 per cent. more jobs if we did not go through the absurd nonsense of wholesaling cash through Brussels and getting less back?

Mr. Bottomley: Given my limited breadth of vision, I can only tell my hon. Friend that with this assistance we are able to do more than we would without it.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is it not a fact that £20 million has been lost to Britain from the EEC budget because money that was allocated for job creation out of the regional and social funds, which could have been spent at any time up to the end of 1984, was not spent? Has that been due to bureaucratic bungling in Brussels, in Whitehall, or in both?

Mr. Bottomley: It would be helpful if the hon. Lady would write to me with details of the £20 million to which she is referring—[Interruption.] There are a number of reasons why certain things happen, as she will know from her experience. For example, the Commission takes decisions with which we sometimes do not agree. In some cases it is a question of people with allocations not fully taking them up. There may be other points concerned with the case that the hon. Lady has in mind. That is why I said that it would be helpful if she would send me details. I can then give her a full response.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my hon. Friend agree that the taxes levied by the EEC destroy jobs?

Mr. Bottomley: Most public revenues have that effect.

Labour Statistics

3. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of people unemployed, those who have been unemployed for more than one year, those who have been unemployed for more than than two years, respectively, at the latest available date.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Peter Morrison): On 11 April 1985 there were 3,273,000 unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom. Of those, 1,334,000 had been unemployed for more than one year and 790,000 for over two years. Since April the total number of unemployed claimants has fallen by 94,000.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that if the recent welcome rate of reduction in the number of unemployed is maintained, it will take to the end of the century before the number of unemployed reaches the total when the Labour Government left office? In those circumstances, will he say whether he is one of those who believe that the presentation of policies is wrong, rather than the policies themselves?

Mr. Morrison: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman welcomes the fall of 94,000. However, I do not agree that it will take until the end of the century to achieve that level of unemployment with a reduction of 94,000 every two months.

Mr. Latham: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the community programme is a significant help to the long-term unemployed? What is being done to put in place the increase announced in the Budget?

Mr. Morrison: As my hon. Friend points out, we are increasing the community programme by 100,000 places. That process has already started. In June, 5,000 places were filled; by the end of the year 50,000 places will have been filled; and by next June the whole 100,000 places will have been filled.

Mr. Boyes: The Minister must not try to kid the people in my constituency about unemployment falling, because there are now 8,225 unemployed, which is 690 more than last year. A disappointing reply was given to my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) about the £20 million that has been thrown down the drain. How many people does the Minister think could have got jobs out of that money if it had been claimed and spent on job creation?

Mr. Morrison: I appreciate that the part of the country that the hon. Gentleman represents has a difficult unemployment problem. I was in that area yesterday and met many people involved in the job club in the Durham jobcentre, and 80 per cent. of those involved in it were finding jobs. Therefore, it is possible to find employment in the north-east.

Mr. Lyell: Will my hon. Friend confirm that there is a higher proportion of longer-term unemployed in the south than in the north? Can he explain this strange phenomenon and what can be done to prevent it from continuing?

Mr. Morrison: I can confirm that there is a higher number of long-term unemployed in the south than in the north.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister acknowledge that mass unemployment, particularly mass long-term unemployment, was a significant factor in the defeat of the Tory candidate in the Brecon and Radnor by-election? Is it not time that the Government recognised that the people no longer accept their fairy stories about economic success and new jobs being just around the corner? Does he accept that a majority want positive Government action to reduce unemployment, through an increase in public investment rather than tax cuts?

Mr. Morrison: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman chose to remind the House of the Brecon and Radnor by-election, for which the Leader of the Opposition had claimed a great victory. What happened to the Labour candidate? He did not win.

4. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the net change in employment in the European Economic Community and the United States of America, respectively, over the past 10 years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Alan Clark): Information for all countries is available only for years up to 1983. My latest estimate is that in the 10 years to 1983, employment in the European Community decreased by about 1 million, a fall of 1 per cent. In the same period, employment in the United States increased by nearly 16 million, a growth of 19 per cent.

Mr. Taylor: Is my hon. Friend aware of any place, apart from El Salvador and possibly Tibet, with a more dismal record of job creation than the EEC? Would it not be better for the unemployed if the Government were to encourage more trade contact with the growth areas of the world instead of with Europe, which is clearly in structural decline?

Mr. Clark: It is better if trade contacts develop naturally rather than in an artificial atmosphere of Government encouragement. The shift of emphasis from employment in manufacturing to employment in services cannot be reflected in our trading relations with the European Community until the Community relaxes some of its restrictions on the freedom of operation in the service sector.

Mr. Maclennan: Would the Common Market more effectively create jobs if the Government objective in completing the internal market, which the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) is resisting, were carried through?

Mr. Clark: In the last two years, jobs have increased at a faster rate in this country than in Italy, Germany or France.

Mr. Baldry: Does my hon. Friend agree that we would have a better chance of increasing the number of jobs in the European Community if we removed barriers to business in Europe and had an integrated market by 1992, because we wish to remove from business not only burdens but barriers?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is right. The barriers exist principally in the service sector, which is the largest growth sector in the United Kingdom. The meeting of the European Council in Milan issued a statement on this subject, saying that it was looking at the position and was preparing a detailed report on current inadequacies as a result of the growth of employment in the Community compared with its major industrialised competitors. The report also covers new strategies that could be implemented to remedy the situation.

5. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current numbers unemployed; and what this is as a proportion of the work force.

Mr. Tom King: On 13 June 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,179,000, representing an unemployment rate of 13·1 per cent.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Secretary of State aware that the figures that he has just produced are a disgrace to his Government? Is he also aware tha. ne and his Government are massaging the figures by taking people off the register? When will he do a real job as Secretary of State for Employment and get more investment in industry to create the jobs which the unemployed need so desperately? Do something about it.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman calls for more investment in industry, but every hon. Member knows that part of the problem that we face results directly from increased investment in industry, which has created a significant proportion of the increase in unemployment. I wholly repudiate suggestions that the figures that I published last week are not accurate. I have published— [Interruption.] I notice that Labour Members are ready enough to accept the figures when it suits them and that they take pleasure in the figures when unemployment goes up, but they seem to resent it bitterly when unemployment goes down.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there has been a welcome improvement in the number of engineering jobs on offer in the west midlands? However, is he also aware that some jobcentre employees are actively discouraging men over 50, or even over 45, from applying for those jobs, on the ground that they are too old? Will he ask them to desist from that practice forthwith, and, even more important, will he make representations to the CBI to get it to encourage men of maturity as well as men with skills?

Mr. King: I am very concerned about what my hon. Friend says, because it is standard practice that jobcentres are required and encouraged to request employers not to impose such age restrictions. I certainly note what my hon. Friend says. If there are further illustrations of the point that he makes, I should like to hear of them.

Having been in the west midlands this morning and seen the reports of the Birmingham chamber of commerce about the encouraging prospects and the surge of orders from home and overseas, I am encouraged to see the improved prospects for the west midlands.

Mr. Terry Fields: Having been to Birmingham today, why did the Secretary of State not take the train a little further north to Liverpool and, during his travels, read the report of Liverpool's city planning officer, which shows that since the Government have been in power 65,000 jobs have gone from the Liverpool area, including 40,000 in manufacturing industry? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the report suggests that by the time the Government leave office 100,000 people will be unemployed in Liverpool? The Secretary of State cannot blame that on Liverpool city council. When will he do something about it?

Mr. King: I am interested in the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question. If he thinks that the present administration in Liverpool city hall is a positive encouragement to investors and companies to locate in Liverpool, he has a funny idea of the conditions that are necessary for the creation of work and the chances to tackle the serious problems in Liverpool, about which I know as much as any Minister.

Mr. Soames: Will my right hon. Friend remind the House that 65 per cent. of our work force is in work, which is a higher proportion than that in France, Germany or other OECD countries? Does he agree that that is a major coup for the Government?

Mr. King: In the year from January 1984 to January 1985, for which I have the figures, unemployment rose by 140,000—which is a matter of great concern—while under the Socialist Government in France it rose by 250,000. During the past two years, employment in Germany fell, whereas employment in the United Kingdom increased by 2·6 per cent. I take no comfort from the fact that the United Kingdom is doing better than other countries in Europe. All hon. Members know that we need to create more jobs if we are to make the dent that we need to make in unemployment.

Coal Industry Dispute

6. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he intends to reply to the report of the Employment Committee on the reinstatement of National Coal Board employees dismissed during and since the mining dispute.

8. Mr. Merlyn Rees asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the Government's response to the recommendations of the Employment Committee's report on the dismissal of National Coal Board employees.

10. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the Government's response to the recommendations of the Employment Committee's report on the dismissal of National Coal Board employees.

Mr. Tom King: I have read the report of the Select Committee on Employment. The Government are quite clear that reinstatement of the dismissed miners is entirely a matter for the National Coal Board, which is continuing to review all dismissal cases area by area and in the light of industrial tribunal findings. I understand that the NCB has made it clear that there can be no question of re-employing men who have engaged in serious violence against NCB personnel or property. The Government fully support that view.

Mr. Meadowcroft: How worried is the Secretary of State about the threats to the unity of the mining industry from the different practices carried out by different NCB areas, paralleled, alas, by the fragmentation of the National Union of Mineworkers? To what extent is he interested in assisting the mining industry by encouraging the chairman of the NCB to have a policy which does not treat people differently in different areas?

Mr. King: I know that the chairman and the board take that point seriously. Nobody should underestimate the appalling difficulties and serious nature of the problems with which they must deal. I know that in the remarkable circumstances surrounding the appalling dispute they have been anxious to deal with the problem as fairly as possible.

Mr. Rees: Is the Secretary of State worried about the evidence given in the report? Some men who were found guilty and returned to work early have kept their jobs, while others who were found not guilty but who did not return to work have lost theirs. Should there not be a right of appeal outside the NCB—a right based on natural justice—and should not the Secretary of State tell the NCB that?

Mr. King: The right hon. Gentleman knows that the matter must be the responsibility of the management of the NCB. It must deal with the problem and the dismissed miners, who have the normal procedures open to them.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister recollect that the cardinal principle of good industrial relations is that, after a dispute, the watchwords should be conciliation and reconciliation? Does he agree that it is outrageous that not one miner in Scotland has been reinstated—not even miners who stood trial and were acquitted? Bearing in mind some of the Secretary of State's distinguished predecessors, such as the late Lord Monckton, who was Minister of Labour, does he agree that it would be a good idea to put pressure on the NCB to adopt the modest proposals of the Select Committee on Employment and institute a proper overall review procedure?

Mr. King: A cardinal principle of all good industrial relations is always to hold a ballot before taking industrial action. I hope that that will now be firmly established. If there had been a ballot, many of these unfortunate circumstances might have been avoided. The NCB has made it clear that it is continuing to review the cases. It has reinstated significant numbers of miners, and it has looked at the cases in the light of industrial tribunal findings. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find my answer helpful.

Mr. Gorst: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind before he replies to the Select Committee's report that the report was not about the unfair dismissal of miners, for which there is recourse to an industrial tribunal, but about allegations of unfair reinstatement of miners, for which there is no recourse to any tribunal?

Mr. King: I am somewhat surprised at my hon. Friend's question because I have here a report entitled, "The Dismissal of National Coal Board Employees".

Mr. Leighton: Is the Secretary of State aware that the Select Committee report did not consider the merits of the coal strike or violence—it in no way condoned violence—but the quite separate issue of evidence of the manifest unfairness of and glaring inconsistencies in the NCB's treatment of its dismissed employees? Is he aware that in Scotland there have been representations from chief constables and leaders of all the Churches on this matter? Is he further aware that, under repeated questioning, Mr. MacGregor refused to say that he would reinstate those miners whose cases had been upheld by industrial tribunals? In those circumstances, does he agree that the proposal for a review conducted along the lines of the ACAS code, under which each man's case could be represented, is modest? Should he not take heed of that rather than allow this wound to fester?

Mr. King: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. The report did not deal with that. I think that I am not the only right hon. or hon. Member who found it unbelievable that the Select Committee could report on this matter without once considering the appalling violence and intimidation that affected people who were not given any opportunity to say whether they wished to work. That was a grave omission.

Mr. Rowe: Does my right hon. Friend agree with half of the ordinary members of the Select Committee, who believe that it is wiser to leave reinstatement to the NCB area by area? Does he further agree that the sense of that was well demonstrated by the young man found not guilty of murdering a taxi driver nevertheless now asking for reinstatement, although he was clearly considerably engaged in the discussions about that action?

Mr. King: I have already said that these must be matters for the NCB. It has made quite clear the basis on which it will deal with such matters. It is not right to try to suggest that this is some ordinary dispute or incident. We recognise the difficult circumstances that existed. This is the right method by which to proceed. I note that rather more than 400 miners have been reinstated under the procedures operated by the NCB.

Mr. Lofthouse: In view of his office, does the right hon. Gentleman feel obliged to say whether he supports the system under which a person can face trial, be found not guilty but then be found guilty by a MacGregor kangaroo court?

Mr. King: There are times when people are dismissed although charges may not be preferred against them. It all depends on what basis the case was made. I can perfectly well understand that there might be circumstances under which people are acquitted of certain charges but are still dismissed on other grounds.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the working miners of Leicester found the Select Committee report shattering and disappointing? Does he appreciate the feelings of those brave working miners, who saw property demolished, miners being intimidated and violence on the picket line? They find it incredible and unacceptable that miners should now be considered for reinstatement. That is not the way in which to run the country.

Mr. King: The working miners of Leicestershire were not alone in holding that view about the report. The Select Committee system works best when reports are unanimous. This report is clearly not unanimous, as the Committee was bitterly divided. It was not the most successful report of the Employment Select Committee.

Mr. Prescott: Is it not deplorable that the Secretary of State can have a view about a Select Committee's recommendation on procedures for the review of dismissal arising out of an industrial dispute and not give his attitude towards the principle? Since the Secretary of State has made a statement that he is considering new legislation to deal with victimisation by the trade unions of those people involved in industrial disputes, is he prepared to consider victimisation by the employers and ensure that all employers abide by the recommendations of ACAS dealing with unfair dismissal?

Mr. King: As the hon. Gentleman knows, that is already law, and there is access to industrial tribunals.

Mr. Wilson: Why will the Secretary of State not pay any attention to the questions that have been raised about the Scottish situation, where there is to be no review, where there is to be no reinstatement and where Scottish miners, some of whom have not been convicted of any offence, seem to have been singled out for discriminating treatment? Does not the Scottish situation require his immediate intervention?

Mr. King: My understanding is that the individual cases in Scotland are being reviewed on the same basis as elsewhere.

Youth Training Scheme

7. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received concerning the proposed two-year youth training scheme.

12. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on progress in setting up the second year of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend announced on 1 July that he had approved the broad framework of the Manpower Services Commission's proposals for a two-year youth training scheme. These were drawn up after extensive consultations with employers, trade unions, local authorities, education interests and others.

Dr. Godman: In these consultations, has the Minister outlined what steps are to be taken to ensure that the training element in this two-year scheme will be improved, and has he given guarantees that those youth trainees completing a two-year youth training scheme will be offered a job?

Mr. Morrison: As far as the quality of the training is concerned, 20 weeks is the minimum for the two-year scheme. As to the certification, we are working on that so that they have a certificate at the end. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there can be no guarantee of a job at the end of the scheme, but certainly it enhances the job prospects of all the 16 and 17-year-olds who go on it.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The second year youth training scheme will be the greatest help to school leavers seeking a job. However, is my hon. Friend aware that in Germany the two-year scheme costs £3,600 per trainee, the bulk of which is met by the employer? In sharp contrast, our scheme will cost £3,800 per trainee, most of which will be met by the Government. Does he agree that this shows not only the Government's commitment to training but also that we can expect employers to invest far more in training in the future?

Mr. Morrison: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend that the German example of employers making a major contribution is something to be followed, and we have reason to believe that in this country the employers will be making a significant contribution to the two-year youth training scheme.

Mr. Ron Brown: Is it not the case that the YTS is simply a front for cheap labour and a means of keeping down wages in order to establish a new-style Hong Kong in this country? That is the reality of the situation and why so many youngsters in the country realise what the Government are up to. It is a simple con.

Mr. Morrison: The answers to the hon. Gentleman's first three questions are no, no and no. So far as the trainees are concerned, he may be aware that some 84 per cent. think that the scheme is worth while or very worth while, so again he is wrong.

Mr. Colvin: Can my hon. Friend tell the House how many places on the two-year YTS are likely to be made available by the armed forces, and if critics of that form of sponsorship criticise it as being voluntary national service by the back door, can he see anything particularly wrong with that?

Mr. Morrison: My hon. Friend asks how many places there will be in the armed services scheme. It will be of the order of 2,200. It is a totally voluntary scheme, and he may be interested to know that in the year 1984-85 3,400 youngsters applied to go on the scheme.

Apprenticeships

9. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is satisfied with the current level of apprenticeships.

Mr. Alan Clark: The numbers entering traditional apprenticeships are becoming increasingly irrelevant as a measure of the real level of skills training being undertaken by industry arising out of the reform and modernisation of existing arrangements and the substantial provision of initial skills training under the youth training scheme.

Mr. Alton: Given the Secretary of State's criticism in The Times this morning of the fact that this country spends seven times less than the United States and 14 times less than West Germany on provision for training, does the Minister agree that it is time that we introduced the West German system of statutory apprenticeships, which are the best quality training that can be given? When he describes apprenticeships as irrelevant, does he believe that people who commission someone to work in their homes will be as satisfied with someone from the YTS—worthwhile as some of those schemes may be—as they would be if they had a proper apprentice?

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman referred to a proper apprentice. The whole nature of training has gone through a major sea change which reflects the transition from manufacturing to service industries and from heavy to high-tech industries. The Government have more than doubled expenditure on training since they took office. Government grants are available to help employers with apprentice training but all the money provided has not been taken up.

Mr. Lawler: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way to encourage more apprentices is to encourage more companies to remodel their apprenticeship schemes to incorporate YTS, as has already been successfully done by the electrical contracting industry?

Mr. Clark: Yes, Mr. Speaker. One of the features of the electrical contracting industry's scheme is that it negotiated a completely revised wage structure, which reduced pay from £43 to £27. As a result, first-year apprenticeships have trebled.

Mr. Gordon Brown: With regard to the level of apprenticeships, is the Minister aware that one of the 204 miners sacked in my constituency was a Coal Board apprentice? He was sacked without having the opportunity to put his case to his employer. Does the Minister support employers sacking people without giving them the chance of a fair hearing?

Mr. Clark: I am aware that the House does not like this type of answer, but clearly with such a case the hon. Gentleman must put the argument in writing.

Trade Unions (Ballots)

11. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many trade unions have now applied to the certification officer for reimbursement of the cost of ballots, under the provisions of section 1 of the Employment Act 1980; and what has been the total amount paid to trade unions under this section.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Thirty-two trade unions have applied to the certification officer under the provisions of section 1 of the Employment Act 1980 for reimbursement of costs incurred in holding secret ballots. Payments made total about £1·4 million.

Mr. Hunter: Does my hon. Friend agree that what he has just said irrefutably demonstrates the wisdom underlying the 1980 measure and provides further evidence of the Government's success in reforming previous employment legislation?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, Sir. In particular, it deals with those people who are unwilling to come out and say openly that they oppose secret and democratic ballots, but argue against them on the ground of cost. They have no argument on the ground of costs and they had better come clean and say whether they believe in secret ballots.

Mr. Prescott: Is the Minister aware that the latest ballot conducted by the General Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union cost £250,000, and that the result, whether the vote was taken at the work place or by secret ballot, showed a 9:1 ratio in favour of maintaining a political fund? Is that not an adequate answer to the scurrilous charge made by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) during a previous Question Time about an unfair ballot?

Mr. Bottomley: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman wants or expects me to become involved in a spat which he may have in the House with other political parties. At some convenient moment, will he say whether he believes in ballots and whether he draws the same conclusion as I did—that if one spends £250,000 giving a one-sided argument one may obtain a one-sided result? One of the important issues that people should consider is whether they believe that their trade union fulfils its purpose by being associated with one political party and whether the trade union leadership is willing to accept that it has members who support different parties and who may change their allegiance. Trade unions would be better advised to pay more attention to such people.

Mr. Fry: Is my hon. Friend aware that in a ballot on the future of the political donation, ballot papers were sent to my constituents who had not been members of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers for four years? Does that not show that there is a need for ballots to be properly organised, otherwise people who are not members of a union can take part in elections for officers and decisions on the political levy?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend makes a sensible point. Even with full postal ballots there are difficulties. Mailing lists can get out of date. For example, I recently received a letter addressed to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) who in 1968 held the job that I now have.

Equal Pay

13. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Employment what comparisons he has made with other members of the European Community with regard to the progress towards equal pay for women.

Mr. Alan Clark: All member states of the European Community are required by article 119 of the Treaty of Rome and the equal pay directive to provide equal pay for men and women doing equal work.

Mr. Freud: When does the Minister intend to amend the Equal Pay Act so that women in this country have a primary right to receive equal pay for work of equal value?

Mr. Clark: I do not know where the hon. Gentleman has been for the past two years. We have complied with the ruling of the European Court of Justice and introduced those provisions by an order which makes that a requirement on employers. If an employee feels that an employer is not complying with the provisions ,we have set up tribunal machinery to ensure compliance with the European Court of Justice ruling.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 9 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Wareing: Does the reported decision of the Secretary of State for the Environment to scrap the present system of constraints on local authority finance through penalties and targets denote the first part of the Government's U-turn in response to their failure to hold the seat in the Brecon and Radnor by-election? What further concessions are likely as the Government go further down the slope towards electoral disaster?

The Prime Minister: No final decisions have yet been taken on the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that on 16 January 1985 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment said:

"I should like to be able to abandon targets and holdback"

but that

"Much depends on the level of local authority spending in the coming year".—[Official Report, 16 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 338.]

Mr. Ian Lloyd: In the context of President Reagan's timely reminder yesterday that the campaign against terrorism worldwide must be indivisible, is my right hon. Friend aware of any event which throws a more glaring light on the squalid and contemptible character of political opportunism than the appearance on a public platform in the centre of London, with a representative of an organisation with objectives and methods indistinguishable from those of the IRA, of a member of the Privy Council, the Leader of the Opposition? Can my right hon. Friend do anything to ensure that the authority and prestige of the Privy Council are not illegitimately transferred in that way?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has made his point very cogently and I am glad that he has brought the matter to more public attention.

Mr. Hattersley: Does the Prime Minister endorse the judgment of her Chancellor that ours is the most successful economy in western Europe, or have her civil servants had the opportunity during her busy day to explain to her the phoney nature of the statistics on which that claim was based?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor was endeavouring to point out the fact that no other country in Europe has such a good record as Britain in the creation of new jobs in the past year.

Mr. Hattersley: It is clear that the Prime Minister has not read what the Chancellor said. He said that we had the best growth rate in western Europe, but the statistics, which I assume were available to him, show that only one EEC country had a worse growth rate than ours. Does the Prime Minister endorse or repudiate the Chancellor's manipulation of the figures?

Secondly, while we are on the subject of Government achievements, will the Prime Minister now answer the question that I asked her 10 days ago, but which she ducked twice then and has continued to duck, and confirm that she has presided over the highest ever levels of unemployment, company liquidation, real interest rates, mortgage rates and manufactured trade deficit in the history of this country?

The Prime Minister: May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that we have also presided over record output, record standard of living, record investment and record overseas assets.

Mr. Hattersley: I simply ask the Prime Minister to answer the question that I have now asked her on three occasions: are the allegations that I make about the record catastrophes over which she has presided true or false?

The Prime Minister: I do not influence the right hon. Gentleman's questions. He must not influence my answers. [Interruption.] We have record output, record standard of living, record investment and record overseas assets. I only regret that the Leader of the Opposition is not here so that I can say it to him.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that lower taxes achieved as a result of the privatisation programme would be valuable and welcome, but that the only way to secure for the longer term a low-taxation economy, with all its benefits for employment, is to hold absolutely firm against the pressures for raising public expenditure, and to reduce public expenditure as a proportion of gross domestic product?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir. I believe that most people would prefer more net take-home pay. The only way to achieve that is to reduce taxation or increase growth in the economy. Both need room to be made for private enterprise and growth in the private sector.

Mr. Steel: Does the Prime Minister recall telling us last Tuesday how glad she would be to welcome here the Conservative candidate for Brecon and Radnor as the new Member of Parliament? As in her newspaper interview yesterday she dismissed with contempt some of her colleagues as flexi-toys, have not they been proved right in suggesting that she is out of touch with the electorate? How would she describe the people of Brecon, now that they have spoken for Britain?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate the winner of the Brecon and Radnor by-election on his victory. I note that the tenure of those in seats won by Liberal and Social Democratic candidates in by-elections tends to be rather short, as my hon. Friends the Members for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Macfarlane), for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson), for Crosby (Mr. Thornton) and for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) will testify.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: Has my right hon. Friend yet had time to reflect upon the demand from the Director General of the Confederation of British Industry for an immediate 2 per cent. cut in the base rate? What reply would she give to him, bearing in mind the fact that many of the world's economic indicators, including oil, continue to present a confusing picture, and our own inflation rate still requires a firm hand?

The Prime Minister: I think that my hon. Friend found the reply in his last few words. Our own inflation rate still requires a very firm hand. As my hon. Friend is well aware, it is not possible to say anything about the interest rate from this Dispatch Box other than that one does not wish it to be high for a moment longer than the inflation rate requires.

Q2. Mr. Skinner asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 9 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Prime Minister recall that, in the 1970s, many hon. Members on both sides of the House tried to take the lid off the Crown Agents scandal? Is she aware that another City scandal, relating to Johnson Matthey Bankers, has not been properly dealt with in the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or by herself? Is she further aware that yesterday 135 hon. Members tried to table a motion which would have enabled the House to debate the matter during our proceedings on the Finance Bill today? Why does she not do the decent thing and tell the Governor of the Bank of England to publish the Price Waterhouse report, so that we can know the truth about this sordid affair? Or is the real truth that some of those City crooks are a little too close to home for comfort?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is well aware that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a full statement to the House and was questioned on it. I have nothing further to add to that statement.

Q3. Mr. John Townend asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 9 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Townend: When will the Government stop giving the impression in the country that public expenditure is being reduced when the facts show that public expenditure is inexorably increasing? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the Fowler review produces substantial savings in social security, which can be used to take the low-paid completely out of tax?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, the Chancellor's policy is to restrain total public expenditure, but within that total to carry out our pledges on priorities. My hon. Friend will be aware of what those pledges were: defence, law and order, the Health Service and pension provision. Those have been fully honoured within the total restrained public expenditure, and it is still our policy to endeavour to make further reductions in direct taxation. Had the Labour Government's rate of taxation held, people would be paying £6 billion more in income tax than they are now.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Does the Prime Minister now believe in the middle way? If she does, will she define it?

The Prime Minister: I believe in the right way. It is the way in which we are going.

Q4. Mr. Colvin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 9 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Colvin: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to reflect on the meeting yesterday with the Chiefs of Defence Staff, contrasting the Conservative party's united policy on nuclear deterrence with the divided policies of the SDP and the Liberal party? Will she acknowledge that although middle-of-the-road policies may be all right for some, driving all over the road is dangerous for everyone, and that the more help the Liberal party can get from the British School of Motoring, the better?

The Prime Minister: I do not know the policies of the Liberal party or the SDP on nuclear deterrence. They seem to be at sixes and sevens. The Conservative party is the only one that has a firm policy. The Government's policy is that of a firm independent nuclear deterrent, the firm defence of everything in which we believe and honourable and loyal membership of the NATO Alliance.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Prime Minister aware that, following Brecon and Radnor, many Labour supporters would welcome the appointment of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry as chairman of the Conservative party? Is she further aware that Labour supporters could hardly ask for more than she and the Secretary of State being principally responsible for putting across the Government's message?

The Prime Minister: Labour supporters have nothing to boast about at present.

Mr. Dykes: On economic management, is not the reality that we need all the instruments of economic demand management, including lower interest rates, lower taxes and more capital spending on public and private account to create new jobs?

The Prime Minister: I would dearly like to have more capital spending, but not more total spending. My hon. Friend will be aware that if we want more capital spending, we must have less current spending, unless we put a higher burden of taxation on the working population. We are not entitled to put a higher burden of taxation on the 40 per cent. of pensioners who pay income tax, or on the 41 per cent. of those who pay income tax but who earn below average male earnings. My hon. Friend will find that we are following the right overall policy.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the right hon. Lady aware that, although reductions in income tax for the lower paid will be generally welcomed, it is grossly offensive to the bulk of wage and salary earners to presume that their first priority is a reduction in income tax? Most people are not so greedy and selfish as to have that as their main aim. They would prefer action by the Government to put the unemployed back to work.

The Prime Minister: I believe that most people think that they are entitled to a larger share of their hard-won earnings in their own pockets. If the right hon. Gentleman takes a different view, perhaps he will say how much tax he would levy on those many people who would prefer to have their taxation reduced.

Q5. Mr. Dubs asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 9 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Prime Minister aware that during the first five years of her Government the crime rate increased by nearly 40 per cent.—about double the rate during the five years under the last Labour Government? Despite all her talk about pledges on law and order, more money for the police, and so on, is it not a fact that the criminals have never had it so good?

The Prime Minister: I believe that we have never had a more effective police force or one with higher morale and greater efficiency. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would join in congratulating the police on their excellent record.

NEW MEMBER

The following Member took and subscribed the Oath:

Richard Arthur Lloyd Livsey, Esq., for Brecon and Radnor.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &C.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the nine motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Fire Protection) (Ships Built Before 25th May 1980) Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Fire Protection) (Amendment) Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Fire Appliances) (Amendment) Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Agricultural Products Processing and Marketing (Improvement Grant) (Amendment) Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Agriculture and Horticulture Development (Amendment) Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 1025) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Agriculture Improvement Regulations 1985, be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Agriculture Improvement Scheme 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 1029) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Severn Bridge Tolls Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 726) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Maximum Number of Judges (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the two motions on European Community documents.

Ordered,

That European Community Documents Nos. 9153/82 and 6544/83, draft Directive and Amendment on crude oil saving through the use of substitute fuel in petrol; and 8369/83 and 7959/84, draft Directive and Amendment on rationing for commercial and road transport between Member states in the case of fuel shortage, be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.

That European Community Documents Nos. 10211/82, draft Directive concerning the labelling, presentation and advertising of [illegible], cider and perry, and 9452/83, two draft Regulations laying down rules for the description and presentation of wine, grape must and special wines, be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents. — [Mr. Garel-Jones.]

Criminal Justice (Scotland) (Amendment)

3.33 pm

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to impose a mandatory minimum sentence of three months' imprisonment in respect of persons of 21 years of age or over or of three months' detention in respect of any person who is not less than 16 but under 21 years of age who is convicted of the offence of breach of the peace or any offence involving violence against a third party committed within the relevant area of a designated sports ground or a public service vehicle or railway passenger vehicle being operated for the principal purpose of conveying passengers to or from a designated sporting event.

The purpose of the Bill which I seek to introduce is to amend the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act. It is yet another measure of a sort that we have seen before the House this Session to stamp out football violence. As the nation watched with growing disbelief the shame of Britain at the Heysel stadium some months ago, two important lessons hit home. The first was that football matches were without doubt the chosen arenas for those who have the 20th century gladiatorial instinct. The second was that our complacency on this problem has endured for too long.

We have seen considerable progress with the passage of legislation, with all-party support, to ban alcohol at designated sporting events throughout the United Kingdom. It seems almost unbelievable that what we were told by England and Welsh Members a few months ago was impossible is now in legislative form and will be on the statute book before the end of the Session.

We in Scotland have had the benefit of similar legislation for about five years, and it has worked well, but each of those five years is a silent witness to our incapacity and unwillingness until now to grasp what has been an ever-increasing and growing problem throughout the United Kingdom. However, the Bill applies especially to Scotland. It is a timely reminder that we in Scotland risk falling into the same complacency trap. We pride ourselves on having avoided it, but unfortunately football violence is again escalating within Scotland.

There is a new villain who is attending Scottish football matches, and he is called the soccer casual. He is dressed in smart clothes. He is usually dressed in denims and a cashmere sweater. He is fairly respectable looking. He will have a short haircut and often he will be middle class with a considerable amount of money in his pocket. He is also brutal. He is a sort of Sunday supplement soccer hooligan and he is new on the Scottish scene. For him, fines are no deterrent. It is a badge of honour for him and his friends to appear before a court, to be found guilty of an offence and to be fined. These new hooligans collectively shrug that off. If we are to tackle this new menace, we shall need a new form of specific deterrent.

The problem is a real one. During a recent Scottish sheriff court case, a document was provided to the court which showed clearly that Aberdeen soccer casuals were intent, having run riot in Scotland during the past year, on taking the problem south of the border. The document revealed that they were issuing a challenge to fans in England to try to meet the standard of behaviour that they had been displaying in Scotland.

The Bill seeks to impose mandatory minimum sentences on soccer thugs. It will do two things. First, I believe that it will underline our determination as a legislative body to fight soccer thuggery wherever and whenever it occurs. That will be apparent in the United Kingdom and, at a sensitive time, abroad as well.

The Bill will support our police forces, which are finding it difficult to cope with the new phenomenon of the soccer casuals. It will provide a sharp edge to their efforts to isolate and to stamp out this form of violence. It will emphasise that no act of violence, however small, can be tolerated within the grounds of a football stadium. However small the initial act of violence, it will not matter. The lesson that we learnt from the events within the Heysel stadium was that small acts of violence can lead to larger riots. If we are to see soccer progress and to continue as something approaching a national sport, we cannot allow violence to continue.

Many of our football clubs, including many in Scotland, are rising to the modern challenge of football thugs. In the Aberdeen football stadium a substantial amount of investment has been made and the club has shown its willingness, and its faith in its supporters, to stamp out hooliganism. Football clubs which attempt to do this deserve the support of legislation. When the Aberdeen football club sends its supporters abroad to European events, it sends them as ambassadors for Aberdeen and Scotland as well. However, unless we stamp out the menace of soccer casuals, that could change.

The Bill is a step towards bringing the family back to the football stadium in Scotland and towards re-establishing the image of one of our most important national sports. I hope that it will receive the support of the whole House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gerald Malone, Mr. Michael Hirst, Mr. Albert McQuarrie, Mr. John Corrie and Mrs. Anna McCurley.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Gerald Malone accordingly presented a Bill to impose a mandatory minimum sentence of three months' imprisonment in respect of persons of 21 years of age or over or of three months' detention in respect of any person who is not less than 16 but under 21 years of age who is convicted of the offence of breach of the peace or of any offence involving violence against a third party committed within the relevant area of a designated sports ground or a public service vehicle or railway passenger vehicle being operated for the principal purpose of conveying passengers to or from a designated sporting event: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 25 October 1985 and to be printed. [Bill 186.]

PROCEDURE (FUTURE TAXATION)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to matters which may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain provisions taking effect in a future year with respect to the exemption from capital gains tax and corporation tax on chargeable gains of gains on disposals of gilt-edged securities and qualifying corporate bonds.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

WAYS AND MEANS

STAMP DUTY (RENOUNCEABLE LETTERS OF ALLOTMENT ETC.)

Resolved,

That provision may be made restricting the exemptions from duty provided by section 65(1) of the Finance Act 1963 and section 14(1) of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1963.

GROUP RELIEF

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to relief under section 258 and the following sections of Chapter I of Part XI of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 (group relief).

WITHDRAWAL OF CERTAIN TAX CREDITS

Resolved,

That provision may be made for and in connection with the withdrawal in certain cases of relief under section 86 of the Finance Act 1972 (tax credit for certain recipients of qualifying distributions) in respect of distributions made on or after 1st April 1985.

SECURITIES (No. 2)

Resolved,

That charges to income tax and capital gains tax may be imposed by provisions about transactions occurring on or after 1st January 1985 in relation to securities.—[Mr. Moore.]

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

Not amended (in the Committee) and as amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

3.41 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I accept that your discretion in which new clauses should be debated, is absolute, but I wonder whether you could give me some help, as I am in extreme difficulties. New clause 14 stands in my name and in the names of 133 of my right hon. and hon. Friends. Its purpose is to reduce the tax liabilities of Johnson Matthey on the ground that its shareholders have been the subject of fraud by people to whom loans have been made by the auditors and directors.

I do not intend to deal with the merits or otherwise of the clause, but when it was found yesterday that it was not on the provisional selection list I wrote a letter to you, Mr. Speaker, saying that right hon. and hon. Members were putting their names in droves to it. In fact, 134 right hon. and hon. Members have now put their names to it. This is an unusually high number and shows the extraordinary strength of feeling by the Opposition about this matter.

When I came in this morning I understood that you were having another look at the list. As new clause 14 was not on the list, I have been back to Hackney and discussed the selection with some of the people there. They have said to me, possibly wrongly, that they know that my intention, as a representative of the poorest borough in the country, is to criticise some of the richest and most powerful people in the City. They believe that the Establishment will not let me get away with this. You know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I had a brush about whether or not there is fraud in this House. He was wrong and I was right. I have here a file which contains only a fraction of what I know about fraud at Johnson Matthey. We are discussing a Finance Bill to which a new clause has been tabled which I am told is in order and 134 right hon. and hon. Members wish to discuss it, and it is extraordinary that it is not to be called. We need your help on this matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could find a way round this problem. The Bill is to be discussed not only today but tomorrow, which means that there will be ample opportunity for you to have consultations and to find ways and means by which this matter can be discussed in the House. It has not been dealt with properly. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) has information which is very important. The proper democratic processes should be carried out. We have had only a statement on Johnson Matthey. We have been refused a debate by the Government. It seems that we are being gagged everywhere we go.

It is well known that many people prominent in Tory circles have some connection with Johnson Matthey and what took place. We are concerned about the fact that the Governor of the Bank of England, Leigh-Pemberton, was put there by the Prime Minister because he was, in her words, "one of us."

[Mr. Dennis Skinner]

It is imperative, therefore, that we debate this matter. We appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to find a way to enable this issue to be dealt with, if possible as we discuss the Bill.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): You will know, Mr. Speaker, that I was the hon. Member who originally tabled the nine new clauses in an effort to extract a debate on Johnson Matthey. However, of the nine, only two were found to be in order. I tabled those new clauses because people inside and outside the House were asking why Parliament had so far failed to discuss the matter.

Time and again the Leader of the House has refused at business question time on Thursdays, when answering questions from my hon. Friends and me, to allocate time for a debate. Thus, the only means available to us to secure a debate was to table the new clauses. We hoped that, if they proved to be in order, you, using your discretion, Mr. Speaker, would allocate time for such a debate.

While not questioning the decisions that you make, Mr. Speaker — and I am sure that in making them you consult widely with those concerned with all the issues —I gather that it is within your power, even at this late stage, to reconsider your selection. Overnight, 134 of my hon. Friends put their names to the new clauses. At least another 50 would have signed had there not been a deadline of 9 pm in the Public Bill Office for the submission of names. Indeed, as many as 200 might have submitted their names by this morning.

Is that not an indication of the concern among hon. Members about the need for this whole issue to be fully discussed? In the light of that expressed concern, will you reconsider your decision, Mr. Speaker? The country wants to know what has happened. People cannot understand why Parliament refuses to debate the subject, particularly as, potentially, several hundred million pounds of public money is directly involved in saving this bank?

Mr. Speaker: I received a letter from the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) asking if I would look into the matter again. I have spent a considerable time considering the matter. I well understand the interest of hon. Members and I appreciate that overnight a large number of hon. Members added their names to the new clauses. However, I am not able to change my selection, and I have nothing further to say on the subject.

Ordered,

That the Finance Bill, as amended, be considered in the following order, namely, New Clauses in the name of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer (NC24, NC30 and NC32), other New Clauses except that in the name of Mr. Roy Hattersley and relating to mitigation of corporation tax liability of industrial and provident societies and housing associations (NC9), that excepted New Clause, Amendments relating to Clause 1, Schedule 1, Clauses 2 to 4, Schedule 4, Clauses 5 and 6, Schedule 3, Clause 7, Schedule 4, Clause 8, Schedule 5, Clauses 9 to 12, Schedule 6, Clauses 13 to 23, Schedule 7, Clauses 24 to 30, Schedule 8, Clauses 31 to 40, Schedule 9, Clauses 41 to 45, Schedule 10, Clauses 46 and 47, Schedule 11, Clauses 48 to 53, Schedule 12, Clauses 54 and 55, Schedule 13, Clause 56, Schedule 14, Clause 57, Schedule 15, Clauses 58 to 63, Schedule 16, Clauses 64 and 65, Schedule 17, Clauses 66 and 67, Schedule 18, Clause 68, Schedule 19, Clauses 69 to 73, Schedule 20, Clause 74, Schedule 21, Clauses 75 to 81, Schedule 22, Clauses 82 to 89, Schedule 23, Clause 90, Schedule 24, Clauses 91 to 94, New Schedules and Amendments relating to Schedule 25. —[Mr. Peter Rees.]

New Clause 24

RENOUNCEABLE LETTERS OF ALLOTMENT ETC.

'(1) Subsection (2) below applies where there is an arrangement whereby—

(a) rights under an instrument are renounced in favour of a person (A),

(b) the rights are rights to shares in a company (company B), and

(c) A, or a person connected with A, or A and such a person together, has or have control of company B or will have such control in consequence of the arrangement.

(2) The instrument shall not be exempt by virtue of section 65(1) of the Finance Act 1963 (renounceable letters of allotment etc.) or section 14(1) of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1963 (corresponding provision for Northern Ireland) from stamp duty under or by reference to the heading "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891.

(3) References in this section to shares in company B include references to its loan capital to which section 126(1) of the Finance Act 1976 does not apply by virtue of section 126(2) or (3) (convertible loan capital and excessive return capital).

(4) In this section "shares" includes stock.

(5) For the purposes of this section a person has control of company B if he has power to control company B's affairs by virtue of holding shares in, or possessing voting power in relation to, company B or any other body corporate.

(6) For the purposes of this section one person is connected with another if he would be so connected for the purposes of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979.

(7) This section applies to instruments if rights are renounced under them on or after 1st August 1985, except where the arrangement concerned includes an offer for the rights and on or before 27th June 1985 the offer became unconditional as to acceptances.'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This new clause brings to an end the device which goes under the name of the pref-trick, which can be used to avoid the payment of stamp duty on a company takeover or merger in circumstances where relief for papers and paper exchanges would not be available. The pref-trick takes advantage of an exemption from sales duty for renounceable letters of allotment and similar instruments.

The clause accordingly withdraws the exemption where these documents are used in connection with a takeover or the acquisition of a minority holding following a successful bid. It closes a loophole which had become evident. It follows from the arguments that I adduced in Committee in support of the purpose of clause 75, which was clause 74 in the earlier printing of the Bill, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): The Economic Secretary begged as many questions as he answered in that brief introduction of the new clause. Why has it taken so long for the Government to take action to close this loophole? He spoke to the House as if it had recently emerged, but the loophole was known in the accountancy profession more than a year ago. An article in the magazine Taxation on 11 August 1984 drew public attention to the loophole. Members of the Opposition are surprised that it has taken nearly 12 months for the Government to take action. One wonders why this new clause is not included in the Bill. Surely the Government had enough notice. If they were not given this advice by civil servants, they could at least have been informed through reading the press. It is amazing that it has taken so long for the Government to close what is admitted by them to be a loophole.

My second point concerns another loophole, another variant of the pref-trick. If it has taken the Government nearly a year to move as a result of this loophole being publically disclosed in August 1984, may we assume that it will take them the same time to move to close the loophole described in the magazine Accountancy Age last week when a Queen's Counsel pointed out that the pref-trick could continue?

Although this new clause closes one aspect of the loophole, it is still open to a purchasing company to avoid duty by subscribing to a few shares in the target company and for the people who control the target company to pass a resolution transferring the value to the purchasing company. In that way there would be a clear avoidance of stamp duty. Will the Economic Secretary say what action he proposes to take in 1985 to deal with a loophole which has been discovered in 1985?

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Terry Davis) asks why the new clause did not appear earlier and was not incorporated in the Bill. The Government and the Revenue were aware for a long time that there were schemes afoot which might be able to circumvent the proposals announced by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary dealing with the pref-trick. Clause 75 is one of two legs which deal with this problem. It makes exemption legal for paper mergers or takeovers. The counterpart of that is to remove the exemption from sale duty for renounceable allotment letters.

I wish it had been possible to bring forward proposals at an earlier date, but because they are technical it took time to get them into the correct form. I should have liked to be able to announce this at the Committee stage when we were dealing with this subject, but it would have been wrong to have done so before the Government were ready with their solution which is now before the House.

The hon. Gentleman drew my attention to an article in Accountancy Age on 4 July. If he looks at that carefully, he will see that the author is not suggesting that the pref-trick can be used if the House accepts new clause 24. What is suggested is that there might be other ingenious methods devised to circumvent the stamp duty provisions. Clearly those are at this stage hypothetical, but the Revenue will remain fully alert to the possibility and I hope that if any valid or potentially successful means of circumventing the provisions as we are proposing them should emerge the Government will be able to take whatever action is necessary.

Mr. Terry Davis: That was a most unsatisfactory response from the Government and a very poor start to the Report stage. Are we being told that the Government have brought forward a one-legged Finance Bill? Why was it not possible to include this new clause when the Bill was published? Surely the Government had enough time between August and March to draft a clause for the Bill. Will the Economic Secretary tell the House why it was not possible to come to this conclusion before? Why were not the Government ready before July 1985?

How much money has been lost since August 1984? How much money has gone through this loophole during the past 11 months, and how much will be lost as a result of the ingenious scheme described in Accountancy Age last week? Why will not the Government shut the door before the horse bolts?

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Gentleman asks about the new scheme, but it does not yet exist. There have been suggestions in Accountancy Age that such devices might be invented, but unless and until they come forward the Government cannot respond to them.

The problem about new clause 24 is that it is always very much more difficult to close potential loopholes than to make basic provisions in the Bill. The substantial provision in clause 75 validates the availability of exemption from stamp duty that was planned last year. New clause 24 deals with an exploitation of a particular technique attached to the pref-trick system, and until that has been properly analysed and the way to deal with it has been settled it will not be possible to introduce a new clause, although it was announced last month and not today so that it is effective from 27 June.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Will the hon. Gentleman answer the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis)? Has he been able to make any assessment of the gain to the Revenue as a result of this course?

Mr. Stewart: I am not able to make an exact assessment. It is likely that some transactions that have taken place during the past few weeks would have taken advantage of the new scheme with which new clause 24 deals. I am not able to give a specific answer. If I am able to say more, I shall write to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis). He will appreciate that there is some difficulty in a case such as this, because if it is established that in one or two specific cases such a cost to the Revenue has been created it would be through the divulgence of the tax affairs of an individual taxpayer.

Mr. Terry Davis: As it is understood that the tax affairs of individuals are not disclosed to Ministers, how does the Economic Secretary propose to gather evidence about whether this ingenious scheme is being used?

Mr. Stewart: The Inland Revenue is always alert to the ways in which these schemes are being used or are potentially able to be used. I shall look to its advice.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 30

GROUP RELIEF: MODIFICATIONS

'(1) Section 258 and the following sections of Chapter I of Part XI of the Taxes Act (the enactments relating to group relief) shall have effect subject to Part I of Schedule [Group relief] to this Act.

(2) Section 263 of the Taxes Act (exclusion of double allowances etc.) shall be amended in accordance with Part II of Schedule [Group relief] to this Act and in that Part—

(a) paragraphs 9, 10 and 13 have effect in relation to any claim with respect to an accounting period of the surrendering company which begins on or after 1st August 1985; and

(b) paragraphs 11 and 12 have effect in relation to any claim with respect to an accounting period of the claimant company which begins on or after that date.

(3) In subsection (2) above "the surrendering company" and "the claimant company" have the meaning assigned by section 258 of the Taxes Act.'.—[Mr. Moore.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 56, 159 and 160.

Mr. Moore: Those hon. Members who were not on the Committee will, I hope, appreciate the detailed points that we have set out to help them in this unavoidably complex sector. The proposals given effect to by this new clause and schedule are relatively straightforward. Their main purpose is to allow companies that are at the same time both in groups and in consortia greater flexibility over the use of group and consortium relief for current losses. These are relaxations we have been urged to make in many representations and they will, I am sure, be widely welcomed. They should be particularly helpful to those industries, such as shipping and the emerging cable TV industry, where there are large-scale business ventures for which consortium arrangements are appropriate. These changes will also complement those we introduced last year in section 46 of the Finance Act 1984 which increased the maximum permitted number of member companies in a consortium and allowed some of the members to be non-United Kingdom companies or individuals.

These proposals are those that I announced during consideration of the Bill upstairs we intended to bring forward on Report. As I said then, we have for some time recognised that there is a good case in principle for these changes. The problem has always been that of finding workable solutions that do not entail adding further and excessive legislative and administrative complexity to what is already, technically, a very complex part of the tax code—I would not for a moment underestimate the added complexity encompassed within the new clause. For this reason, we decided initially that first priority in this year's Finance Bill had to be given to other matters. But in view of further representations on this matter since publication of the Bill, both from outside bodies and in consideration of the Bill upstairs, we believe it is right to act now without further delay.

As was argued so ably in Standing Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) and the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), who took an active part in our deliberations at that time, consortium arrangement can be of considerable commercial importance. Indeed, there are many new projects in a wide range of vital industries which are of such a scale that they can be financed only by the use of consortia. However, the effect of the present rules is such that companies concerned may not always be able to make full use of relief for current tax losses in this kind of arrangement, and our proposals are designed to remove these anomalies whilst—and this was the point which the hon. Member for Sedgefield quite rightly raised in Committee—seeking to ensure that in total no more than the right amount of relief is given and to the right companies. That is equally important.

4 pm

In this new clause and schedule we are proposing two main relaxations to the group relief provisions. Both of these proposals concern cases where a company is at the same time in the same group as one or more other companies and is also either a company jointly owned by a consortium or one of the joint owners of a consortium company.

I will deal with the changes very briefly rather than go into the detail we went into in Committee. First, under the present rules, if such a company has a loss or certain other excess reliefs, that loss may be surrendered to members of its own group as group relief, or it may be surrendered between the jointly owned consortium company and the companies which own it as consortium relief. But it cannot be surrendered partly as one and partly as the other. That is to say mixed surrenders are not at present permitted. For the companies concerned, this has meant that loss relief has been given later by carry forward rather than sooner by surrender sideways, in the current period. The first relaxation we propose is to allow such mixed surrenders, subject to certain conditions.

Second, at present, if a member of a jointly owned consortium company cannot make use of its share of that company's loss perhaps because it too has losses in the corresponding period, then its share can only be carried forward or back by the jointly owned consortium company. It cannot flow through and be claimed by other companies in the consortium member's group. Similarly, losses cannot at present flow through in the reverse direction, where a company in the consortium member's group has losses and the jointly owned consortium company has profits. This has meant that groups have had to think very carefully about which group member should own the group's interest in the consortium. The choice has often had to be dictated by tax rather than commercial reasons, and if the projections of future profits and losses of companies in the group turned out to be wrong—and they often do—this relief has been lost. The second relaxation we are now proposing will make it possible for consortium relief to flow through in these circumstances, in both directions, again subject to certain conditions.

These, then, are two desirable relaxations. We did not have the privilege of the company on the Standing Committee this year of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), but I know that he was associated for some years with amendments on this subject. I am sure that the relaxations will also be warmly welcomed by people outside. Generally speaking, their effect will be to enable the companies concerned to get relief for any losses earlier than would otherwise be possible. These changes are simple enough in concept. To achieve them, however, I fear that, as Members will see, some fairly complicated legislation is required. This is partly because we are here dealing with possibly quite complex configurations of companies. But it is also because we need—and I stressed this in Committee—some new rules and some tightening up of certain existing rules to ensure that only the right amount of relief is given, and to the right companies, where there are these now somewhat complex mixed and multiple claims.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): Identifying the problem which the new clause addresses was relatively easy, but, as we thought, a solution has proved extremely difficult. These are complex legislative provisions and I should like to put one or two questions to the Financial Secretary about them, in order to make sure that at the same time as we are dealing with an anomaly we are not opening up undue possibilities of avoidance.

The two problems with which the new clause deals are mixed claims. The first is where the consortium company makes a loss and is prevented from surrendering it to its subsidiary company or to a member company. It can surrender it to one or the other, but not to both. The second problem relates to flows, where a member company in the consortium has no profits against which the consortium company can set off losses, but members of the same group as that consortium member company have losses. This clause would enable flows across group members. The effect of new clause 30 is essentially to allow a consortium company to be treated as a full group member so that losses can be spread.

In general, we consent to the proposition advanced by the clause, but I should like some assurances on the record about avoidance or abuse. When we discussed this matter in Committee, the Financial Secretary rightly said that only a proportionate share of the losses of the consortium company should be allowed to be spread over the member companies or companies within the group of the consortium company. I should like an assurance that that is what these complicated legislative provisions do. If the amount of legislative print is any guide to the strength of the anti-avoidance provisions, they should be very strong indeed. However, as we know only too well, if even a small chink of avoidance appears the purpose of the clause can be subverted. I therefore ask for an assurance on the spreading of the proportionate share of the overall losses.

Am I right in thinking that the group or consortium relationship must exist throughout the entirety of the relative accounting period? That is important for avoidance purposes.

Finally, I asked upstairs what the cost, if any, of the introduction of this type of clause would be, and I was told that it was unlikely to be significant. On more detailed consideration, is there any flesh that the Financial Secretary can put on the bones of that remark and tell us exactly what we are debating? Such a clause is necessary because of the anomaly which had to be dealt with. We would like assurances that we are not initiating further anomalies at the same time as abolishing this one.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): This new clause shows that the Treasury is one Department where we have to persist for probably double the time we have to persist with any other Department. I welcome the change of emphasis on the part of the Treasury.

Over the years the lack of this consortium relief has inhibited the expansion of some businesses. I am delighted that this is going to be remedied. No matter what this clause does—I am as much against avoidance as anyone else in the House—it will mean that a loss can only be used once. If a loss is incurred in a consortium and it is used, then, provided it is not used again, there cannot be any avoidance at all.

I take the point that it must be in the same accounting period, but any loss in a consortium should be used to the best advantage. In many cases, losses are made in building up expansion of the business, and it is doubly expensive if that loss cannot be set off against other profits.

I welcome the new clause and congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing it.

Mr. Moore: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). As I said earlier, he has been a persistent advocate in this area and it is nice to see his advocacy rewarded. I cannot, of course, assume, as he does, that it takes longer to persuade the Treasury to come to a rational set of conclusions.

I should like to give an unreserved assurance to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). In Committee, he asked us to look carefully at the possibilities of avoidance. The Government were doing this when I commented on the other new clauses at which we were looking. In so far as the sharing of losses is given, I unreservedly say yes and yes again to the timing of the clause relating to companies years.

The hon. Gentleman will note the particular care that was taken to ensure that "entry in, entry out" was not an avoidance possibility. Devising the proper legislative solution caused great difficulty.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield also asked about cost. I had better not say more than I said in Committee. One feature of the clause is to tighten as well as to relieve. As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South said, this is an area of potentially greater use, with larger projects, so there could be more opportunities for business, but the amount of revenue theoretically at risk is insignificant.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield will remember that we are talking only about the cash flow impact—a timing impact — because the inability to take reliefs in the mixed surrender and flow-through manner merely delays the ability of a company to take relief and does not deny it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be satisfied with those assurances.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 32

EXEMPTION FOR GILT-EDGED SECURITIES AND QUALIFYING CORPORATE BONDS

"(1) In section 67 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 (gains on disposals of gilt-edged securities and corporate bonds held for 12 months not to be chargeable gains)—

(a) in subsection (1) the words from "except" to the end of the subsection shall not apply if the disposal occurs on or after 2nd July 1986; and

(b) subsections (2) and (3) shall not apply in relation to disposals on or after that date.

(2) With respect to disposals occurring on or after 2nd July 1986—

(a) in section 270 of the Taxes Act (charge to tax on certain disposals of United Kingdom securities) at the end of subsection (6) there shall be added the words "or qualifying corporate bonds, within the meaning of section 64 of the Finance Act 1984";

(b) in section 84 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 (compensation stock), in subsection (4) for paragraphs (a) and (b) there shall be substituted the following paragraphs—

"(a) shall, so far as possible, be identified with securities which were issued to him as mentioned in subsection (1) above rather than with other securities of that kind, and

(b) subject to paragraph (a) above, shall be identified with securities issued at an earlier time rather than with those issued at a later time"; and

(c) in Part II of Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1984 (re-organisations etc. involving qualifying corporate bonds) in paragraph 10(1)(c) for the words from "if" to "that section" there shall be substituted "on that subsequent disposal section 67 of the principal Act".'.

—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, we may take Government amendments Nos. 43 and 44, 79 to 82 and 112 to 122.

Mr. Rees: The new clause amends section 67 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979. The amendments are consequential.

The purpose of this complex of provisions is to take gilt-edged securities and corporate bonds, which are defined in the 1979 Act, out of charge to capital gains tax. That will have the desirable consequence of simplifying the scope of the tax, but the main reason underlying the new clause is that there has been a certain asymmetry, because gilt-edged securities and corporate bonds have not been within the charge to capital gains tax if they have been held for more than 12 months, and it has been found increasingly that those who wish to take a loss on such securities have disposed of them within 12 months and those who wish to take a profit have disposed of them outside 12 months. If follows, therefore, that the Inland Revenue has been conceding losses for tax purposes, but has not been recovering capital gains tax on disposals.

The problem will be accentuated by bond washing and by the indexation provisions. The simplest, cleanest and best solution was thought to be to take gilt-edged securities and corporate bonds out of charge to tax after 2 July 1986 in respect of disposals. The postponement is necessary so that we do not alter the rights or expectations of those who have bought securities up to now.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): It has been suggested in the financial press that the Treasury has done the impossible and abolished a tax while increasing the yield to the Inland Revenue. Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that an increase in yield will result from the abolition of the tax?

Mr. Rees: I wish that I could give precise figures. It is likely that there will be an increase in the number of transactions of various kinds and it is just possible that that may increase the yield of capital gains tax. Certainly, there should not be a loss, because taxpayers have been more disposed to take their losses within 12 months and their gains outside 12 months. Therefore, the Inland Revenue has been conceding relief and not taking tax on disposals. My hon. Friend's analysis is correct, but I find it difficult to put a precise figure on the likely outcome.

4.15 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): We are glad to welcome the new clause. I am sure that the Chief Secretary will cast his mind back to the Committee of the whole House when I referred to the abuse of creating artificial losses by transactions in high-coupon gilts. I mentioned "Gremlin Corner" in Taxation of 4 May which described this method.

The article stated:

"Another tax planning point is that it will be possible to create . . . an artificial allowable loss by purchasing a high-coupon gilt and selling it within the year (but after 27 February 1986)."

The Chief Secretary said that he would think about what I had said. I am glad that his thoughts have borne fruit, though they seem to have been some time in coming to fruition. It appeared from the Inland Revenue press release of 29 May that the Government were still thinking about the matter and it was not until 2 July that the changes were announced. I am not sure why that thought process took so long; perhaps the Chief Secretary will tell us.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield mentioned the comments of the financial press. The Financial Times said:

"The consequence, the Treasury estimates, will be a significant increase in the long-term yield from capital gains tax."

In view of what the Chief Secretary said earlier, I am not sure why the Financial Times refers to Treasury estimates. However, I hope that there will be a "significant increase in the long-term yield from capital gains tax".

As the Chief Secretary knows, I am constantly anxious about the small amount of revenue that seems to be collected from capital gains tax. The yield has declined from 1 per cent. of total revenue in 1976-77 to an estimated 0·8 per cent. in the current year. I am glad that the Chief Secretary has stopped another form of abuse and we hope that the yield will be increased, though the right hon. and learned Gentleman seems unsure about the amount by which it will be increased.

The Financial Times said:

"The main victims of the abolition of the tax on gilts will be the insurance companies. They are the largest group of gilt investors, owning nearly 30 per cent. of outstanding stock. For every one of the last 16 years they have been able to cut their total capital gains tax . . . bill by generating capital losses on their holdings of gilts."

If they are to be the main victims, the potential long-term gains should be quite high.

On the assumption that the Chief Secretary will collect more revenue, what does he propose to do with it? We shall have several suggestions to make during debates on other new clauses, particularly the one on work place nurseries. When the Chief Secretary has decided how much he will get, perhaps he will smile more kindly on our new clauses. The Opposition has many good causes, unlike the Government. I hope that the Chief Secretary will take this opportunity to provide the money that poor people desperately need.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall respond briefly to explain why there was a delay. I will plead guilty to an even longer delay, because although we were enthralled by the possibilities of tax avoidance which the researches of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) had unearthed and which were disclosed in Committee, I had foreshadowed in my speech on Second Reading on 8 May the possibility of action. The hon. Lady will appreciate that these matters are of some complexity. We felt that it was right to try to devise the right solution, and we hit on this solution only after considering the possibilities. I hope that it commends itself to the House.

As to what we would do with increased revenue, I must tell the hon. Lady that we continue to adhere to the principle of Gladstonian finance. I say that to bring the alliance, or the sole Liberal Member present, alongside us on this matter. We pay the revenue into a central fund, and do not believe in the hypothecation of tax, although we could, if it were in order, have an interesting debate about whether we should.

Although many good causes will be advanced—I am sure that on reflection the hon. Lady would not claim a monopoly of good causes for the Opposition—I must respectfully decline to say to what particular good cause any or part of the general funds, which might be thought to represent this, may be devoted. We shall bear in mind any useful suggestions from either side of the House.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend comment on the corporate planning point and the abolition of CGT for that? Will he confirm that this is a further measure which the Government are taking to reactivate the market, and that the Government remain committed to the reactivation of that market?

Mr. Rees: I hope that that will be a further attractive consequence of the measure. It was not the Government's principal motive, but my hon. Friend, with his usual sharpness of perception, was right to draw attention to it. We hope that the market for this kind of bond will loosen up. It is noteworthy that the markets and financial commentators generally have viewed the clause with a certain amount of approbation.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

WORKPLACE NURSERIES

'(1) In section 62 of the Finance Act 1976 (exceptions from general charges on benefits) after subsection (8) there shall be inserted the following subsections:

"(9) Section 61 above does not apply to a benefit consisting in the provision by the employee's employer of day-care facilities in a registered nursery for a child or children of the employee where such facilities are provided for the children of staff generally.

(10) The provisions of subsection (9) above shall be deemed always to have had effect."

(2) In section 72 of the Finance Act 1976 (interpretation of the Chapter charging benefits) after subsection (12) there shall be inserted the following subsections:

"(13) For the purposes of this Chapter "a registered nursery" means a nursery registered with a local authority in accordance with the provisions of the Nurseries Act 1948 as amended.

(14) For the purposes of section 62 nursery facilities shall not be regarded as not provided for the children of staff generally when the employer is not able to offer a place in a registered nursery to the children of staff generally solely because of the limited availability of such registered nursery places at or near to the employer's work place or near to the employee's home.

(15) For the purposes of subsection 62(9) above "child" means such person in respect of whom the employee is entitled to relief under the provisions of section 14 to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 or would be so entitled but for the employee's being married."

and the present subsection (13) of section 72 shall accordingly become subsection (16).'.—[Mr. Terry Davis.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Terry Davis: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take new clause 4 — Exemptions from general charges on benefits (registered nursery)—

'1. In section 62 of the Finance Act 1976 (exemptions from general charges on benefits) after subsection (8) there shall be inserted the following subsections:

"(9) Section 61 above does not apply to a benefit connected with the provision by the employee's employer of day-care facilities consisting in a registered nursery for a child or children of the employer where such facilities are provided for the children of all staff generally.

(10) 'Provision' in subsection (9) above shall not be confined to the provision of facilities on the employer's premises but shall include payments made by the employer in respect of the provision of day care facilities made available by any other person.

(11) Payments made by any employer in relation to the provision of day care facilities in subsections (9) and (10) above, whether meeting a liability of the employer or of an employee to whom those facilities are made available, shall not be assessable on the employee under schedule E."

2. In section 72 of the Finance Act 1976 (interpretation of the Chapter charging benefits) after subsection (12) there shall be inserted the following subsections:

"(13) For the purposes of this Chapter 'a registered nursery' means a nursery registered with a local authority in accordance with the provisions of the Nurseries Act 1948 as amended.

(14) For the purposes of subsection 62(9) above 'child' means such person in respect of whom the employee is entitled to relief under the provisions of section 14 to the Incomes and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 or would be so entitled but for the employee's being married, and who is below the statutory school entry age."

The present subsection (13) of section 72 shall accordingly become subsection (15).'.

Mr. Davis: The purpose of the new clause is to overrule the decision of the Inland Revenue and the Government to make people pay income tax on the contributions which are made by their employers towards the cost of providing workplace nurseries. As the name suggests, a workplace nursery is usually provided at the place of work—an office, factory or hospital—for the children of the people who work at that location.

Usually, the cost of the nursery is shared between the employee, or parent, and the employer. I emphasise that the parent pays. Almost always the parent makes a substantial contribution towards the cost of providing the workplace nursery, and pays from his or her income after tax.

I emphasise that many employers see the provision of nurseries as being in their interests, especially when their employees possess scarce skills. It is often in an employer's interests to encourage women to return to work after childbirth as quickly as possible. Some employers also recognise that it is in the interests of the community and society to provide genuinely equal opportunities for women, and that unless nursery places are provided for women with children, women cannot enjoy equal opportunities with men.

Trade unions and employers often recognise that it is in the interests of society to provide nurseries so that single parents can take up opportunities for employment. I am thinking of the widowed, the divorced and the separated. Single parents are usually women, but sometimes men, who have been widowed, divorced or left with the custody of children. Generally speaking, women are left with the responsibility of bringing up children after a marriage has ended through death or some other event.

It is therefore recognised that it is in the interests of those single parents to be able to take employment, and to do that they need the facility of a nursery. During the past 30 years, progressive employers, who recognise their social obligations, have increasingly provided workplace nurseries.

Mr. Eggar: I follow the hon. Gentleman's analysis, but if he uses those premises, why does his amendment not go further and, for example, cover the position where an employer may choose to provide not a workplace nursery, but a child minder to look after a child?

Mr. Davis: The clause does not cover that because we are dealing with a change in the practice of the Inland Revenue which concerns workplace nurseries. Money paid by an employer to an employee to employ a child minder has never been relieved of income tax, but for decades employers' contributions to workplace nurseries have been tax-exempt.

[Mr. Davis]

Mr. Tim Smith: They have not.

Mr. Davis: As is often the case, the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) chooses to intervene from a sedentary position. I hope that he will seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so that we can analyse his speech. It will be the first time that he has spoken in such a debate.

The Government should encourage the provision of workplace nurseries, which are especially important for single parents. It must be in the Government's interest to encourage single parents to support themselves and their families instead of forcing them to depend on social security. It is also in the community's interests for single parents to be given the opportunity to serve it. That is nowhere more true than in the National Health Service.

I would have expected the Government to support me, but 18 months ago a decision was taken to charge income tax on the contributions of an employer to the cost of providing a workplace nursery. I emphasise that the tax applies only to someone who is paid or receives a total of £8,500 a year, but in calculating that income the Inland Revenue takes into account the employer's contribution to the cost of providing a workplace nursery. Therefore, a person is taxed both on his wages and on the employer's contribution to the nursery.

It is common for a well-run nursery to cost £4,000 a year per child. [Interruption.] I realise that I am telling the hon. Member for Beaconsfield things that he does not know, but the Financial Secretary will endorse my figures.

Mr. Tim Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he is advancing the cause of an elite minority? The number of taxpayers affected by the new clause is about 2,000.

Mr. Davis: We shall see whether the people involved are called an elite minority by my hon. Friends and, indeed, Conservative Members because I shall put that point to the hon. Gentleman later. If an employee pays £30 a week towards the cost of a nursery and the employer pays £50 a week, the Inland Revenue adds £2,600 to the employee's wages in calculating the liability to income tax on the employer's contribution to the nursery. If somebody is paid £120 a week, or £6,000 a year—a fairly low salary for a typist in central London — that person becomes liable to income tax on the employer's contribution towards the cost of providing a place for a child at a nursery.

It was the Government's view, and I believe it still is the Treasury's, that liability to tax has existed since 1948. I regard that as a half-truth. Perhaps the liability existed in theory, but it did not exist in practice. There is plenty of evidence to support my contention. It is well documented that the Equal Opportunities Commission was advised by the Inland Revenue in 1979 that there was no liability to income tax on an employer's contribution towards the cost of providing a workplace nursery. The Consumers Association was advised several times that there was no liability to tax. It was so advised from 1976 to 1982 and included that advice in the Which? magazine tax guide.

4.30 pm

I do not blame the Inland Revenue for giving such advice. Workplace canteens were exempt from liability to tax in 1948, as were car parks, social clubs and sports facilities. It can be argued that the benefit of such facilities is small, but that is not always so. It can be extremely expensive to provide a car park, expecially in central London. It can also be expensive to provide sporting facilities if they are used by a minority of employees.

It should be clear that the Opposition are not suggesting the imposition of tax on car parks, social clubs, sports facilities or even the office or factory canteen. However, we believe that workplace nurseries should be put on exactly the same basis. For several years, the Inland Revenue advised that workplace nurseries were in the same category as canteens and other benefits for which concessions are given on an extra-statutory basis. In a letter of July 1984, the Financial Secretary admitted to me that the advice was given by "mistake".

The Inland Revenue decided to levy tax when, in 1983, it received a specific inquiry about tax liability on workplace nurseries from an employer. I refer, of course, to the Kingsway children's centre. We went into detail about that centre in Committee and on Report one year ago. I shall not repeat the facts, but there is a mistaken belief that workplace nurseries are an issue only for people who live in London and that they are provided for employees of organisations such as London Weekend Television and trade unions such as the Nationl Association of Local Government Officers.

There is also a mistaken belief that workplace nurseries are provided only for single parents. Nurseries are provided throughout the country for people in many different types of employment who are as likely to be part of a two-parent family as a one-parent family.

I have discovered that such nurseries are often provided in the National Health Service. There is a workplace nursery at the All Saints hospital in Birmingham. I am not telling the Inland Revenue anything that it does not know —it is not my task to set it on the parents who are enjoying the benefit of a workplace nursery. There are 56 children at that nursery and there is a waiting list of 40. Parents who are able to send their children there pay £5 a day, or £1,250 a year.

Nobody knows how much the hospital contributes. It has never previously been thought necessary to spend time calculating the cost of the nursery. Everybody involved in running the NHS in the west midlands accepts that the nursery benefits the NHS and people working in it. Most of the parents who send their children to the nursery work at All Saints, at Dudley road hospital, or as community health visitors. A health visitor is paid about £6,000 a year. If the hospital can calculate its contribution, it is likely that those parents will be charged income tax.

Most of the parents are nurses, who are paid even less than health visitors. Some are student nurses or student doctors. Most parents are not one-parent families, and often have returned to the hospital to take a further course of training. The Government now insist that the hospital calculates the cost of running the nursery so that they can tax each parent on the benefit. If parents cannot afford to pay, the Government will drive them to use unqualified child minders.

The All Saints day nursery might be unique in Birmingham, but it is not unique in the west midlands. Parents pay similar sums of money for a nursery at Sandwell district hospital, and nobody knows the cost to the hospital. It benefits about 35 children. Such provision means that the children of doctors, nurses, health visitors, cleaners, domestics and a carpenter mingle. They stay open from 7 am until 6 pm, thus enabling the parents to work the unsocial hours often associated with hospitals.

At worst, the Government's decision to tax employers' contributions to workplace nurseries will drive single parents back on to social security. At best, it will create work for the NHS simply to tax nurses and others who work for it. Such people serve the community. In the person of the Secretary of State for Social Services, the Government have made life difficult enough for those people recently. The Financial Secretary is now adding to their difficulties by insisting on taking his cut from their wages.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): The purpose of my new clause 4 is identical to that of new clause 1.

I wholeheartedly support the Government's desire to tackle tax perks. Pay perks are divisive and distortive. We must tackle wage inflation if we are to compete effectively with our overseas rivals, but it is pointless exhorting hourly paid employees to accept wage constraint if they can see middle managers and others enjoying pay perks.

The question, however, is whether employer help towards the provision of nursery places is a perk. I submit to the House that it is not and accordingly should not be taxed as if it were. Employer help towards the provision of nursery places is a means of enabling many to participate in the labour market who would otherwise be denied that opportunity.

Let me illustrate. If I am a middle manager, my employment is not dependent upon my having a car. I would doubtless in most instances get to work by train or by bus. The provision of a car is in part a perk. It is part of my remuneration package and thus should clearly be taxable. However, a single mother with a child or children below school age is in a different position. The mother's ability to participate in the world of work will be dependent on her finding someone to care for her child or children while she is at work. The provision of a nursery place is not part of her remuneration; rather it is a means whereby she can participate in work. Without it, she would not be able to work whereas without the company car the middle manager would still be able to work.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I am a little perplexed at the distinction that my hon. Friend seeks to draw between those who are making use of workplace nurseries and those who choose to live in a place where public transport is non-existent and who have no transport of their own. In those circumstances, of their own volition they have placed themselves in a position where it is more difficult or impossible to put themselves in the labour market. I cannot see why my hon. Friend seeks to draw a distinction as to the taxable nature of the benefit in kind where it is provided by an employer on the basis that he describes.

Mr. Baldry: That was not, with respect, the distinction I was seeking to make. A middle manager with a company car would be able to work whether or not he possessed that car. There are many single mothers who, if they did not have access to nursery provision, would not be able to work. Therein, in my submission, lies the difference between a perk which should be taxed and a facility to employment such as the employer helping to provide nursery places — which, in my view, should not be taxed.

Put another way, creches should not be taxed because they are not benefits in the sense of conferring any actual advantage on the employee; rather they are facilities which remove an impediment to the employment prospects of some groups in the community.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister recently told the House:

> "This country has the second highest proportion of women in the labour force in the European Community. The long-term trend is towards an increase in the number of women at work." —[Official Report, 27 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 1076.]

I know that my hon. Friends on the Treasury Benches wish to see the maximum possible flexibility in the labour market and to remove any conceivable barriers to the supply of labour. Much of the flexibility at present in the labour market is brought about by the participation of women, and an increasing number of women working part time. How then is it sensible to erect a barrier to such flexibility by a fiscal device involving, in budgetary terms, such a small return to the Treasury?

Further, as a member of the Select Committee on Employment and a secretary of the Conservative Back Bench Employment Committee, I am constantly exhorting employers to invest more in the training of their staff. However, in an era of new technology, it is often necessary for employers to invest sizeable sums of money in the training of personnel to operate expensive equipment. Employers are likely to be less than enthusiastic about adequate investment for training if women staff are unable to work because of children, and the employer's investment in that training is thus lost.

Let me give another example. As a community we spend a sizeable sum of money each year training nurses —a three-year training period—but how many trained nurses do we lose each year because, although they would like to continue at work even part-time, they are unable to do so for want of someone to look after their children? What is the cost to the National Health Service of the loss of such trained people? The point has been well made in a recent study of the Blackshaw day nursery at St. George's Hospital—a workplace nursery meeting the needs not of any élite group but of women shift workers in the National Health Service and enabling them to remain in work and, more importantly, the National Health Service to retain skilled employees. In my submission, it seems to make no sense to deny single mothers the opportunity of employment, so that they then become a liability on the state and in receipt of supplementary benefit, and thereby further frustrate flexibility in the labour market.

The amendment is a simple and, I hope, thoughtful and common-sense proposal to exempt workplace nurseries from tax where all employees can participate in the workplace nurseries. I emphasise to my hon. Friends particularly that the amendment has the support of many, including the Association of County Councils when it was under Conservative control, the Association of Metropolitan Counties and many of those particularly concerned with specialist interest employment matters. It has the support of those concerned to ensure the maximum training and the maximum flexibility within the labour market. That includes the Institute of Personnel Management and the Industrial Society. I hope that it is an amendment which will attract the support of the House.

[Mr. Baldry]

4.45 pm

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): I support new clause 1. The question we should be asking ourselves is whether the Government should use the tax system to hinder the development or the existence of workplace nurseries. The answer, of course, is that they should not.

The facts are these. Most parents work or at least are looking for work. Most mothers work; many mothers with children under five also work. They work because they have to make ends meet and because they want to work. They have every right to work and we need their work. The economy and all the services in this country would collapse if women withdrew from the labour market tomorrow. We also know that the first five years of a child's life are vital for its mental, physical and social development. We know that they thrive on learning from and playing and mixing with other children, especially if they have plenty of space, trained staff and good equipment. It gives the child a head start in life to go to that sort of nursery. That is why parents who care about their children and who are responsible want the choice of decent nursery provision.

A Government survey showed that over 90 per cent. of parents — we are not speaking about a small rump of parents—wants some sort of nursery provision for three, four and five-year-olds. It also showed that nearly 50 per cent. want places for children under three. Instead, the situation is that the child of the working parent has to make do with a patchwork of arrangements. They may be looked after by a child minder who is usually not properly supported or supervised by the local authority, or by relatives or friends, but that is becoming increasingly difficult with the breakdown of old communities. The working mother tears her hair out; it is almost invariably the working mother who tears her hair out. Because of the deep division of labour that exists in the home, mothers still have the primary responsibility for looking after children. I hazard a guess that if child care were shared equally between men and women, the new clause would be accepted with no problem.

Despite the overwhelming demand for decent nursery provision, there is virtually none. Britain's children are Europe's poor relations when it comes to nursery provision. Many Tory-controlled local authorities offer no nursery classes or schools. Gloucester does not provide one nursery class or school for children under the age of five. That is not because there are no children under the age of five in Gloucester, but because the local authority will not meet their needs. There is only one social services day nursery place in Gloucester for every 1,000 children under the age of five.

Mr. Eggar rose——

Ms. Harman: I shall give way when I have finished dealing with Bromley. Bromley has 188 nursery places. It is currently applying to the Secretary of State to close them all. It will join Gloucestershire at the bottom of the league. That is the background against which we must consider the new clause.

Mr. Eggar: No one denies that there is a need for people to look after the children of working mothers and fathers, but I have reservations about the fact that we are going out of our way to single out a group of people who are fortunate enough to have a nursery place at their place of work. I am also rather confused by the way in which the Opposition's amendment is drafted. The hon. Lady and I have children of about the same age. If we had a nursery in the House of Commons and wanted to bring our children in after the period of day care had ended, we should not benefit from such a concession because we have to be here in the evenings. Why have the Opposition drafted the clause so specifically?

Ms. Harman: The point to which I am addressing myself—the hon. Gentleman should recognise that it is of paramount importance — is whether the Government should use the tax system to hinder the existence and development of workplace nurseries. That is what the new clause aims to prevent.

We must increase parents' opportunity to choose decent nursery provision for their children under five. We must judge the aim to exempt employers' contributions from tax against that background. We should have a workplace nursery here to help all the women who work as secretaries, cleaners and canteen staff and keep this place going. There are plenty of rooms available.

Mr. Eggar: What about men?

Ms. Harman: I have already explained that unfortunately there is a deep division of labour within the home and that therefore the responsibility for rearing children almost entirely falls upon women. It would be good news if hon. Members would join me in a campaign to end male absenteeism in the home. I shall have to ask the hon. Gentleman's wife when I next see her whether he plays his full part. I bet that he does not.

The House should follow the GLC's example. It provides an excellent workplace nursery. The new clause would encourage those who are trying to increase a provision which meets the needs of children, which is good for them, and which meets the requirements of working parents. I hope that the House will support the new clause.

Sir William Clark: This is an interesting debate in which to take part. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) was not serious when he suggested that we should have a nursery here.

Mr. Eggar: I did not make the suggestion.

Sir William Clark: Nevertheless, the suggestion was made. Many members of the public think that we already have a nursery — and a badly behaved one on some occasions.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will resist the new clause. There are so-called perks — a company car or a payment to BUPA. Nearly every member of the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunication and Plumbing Union has a BUPA subscription paid by his or her employer on which tax is paid. It is no good the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) nodding his head. Of course they pay tax.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I was not nodding; I was shaking my head.

Sir William Clark: The hon. Gentleman is wrong.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House what percentage of the EETPU membership has signed up for BUPA? That policy is not being pursued by the union, of which I have been a member since 1953.

Sir William Clark: I am sure that the House is grateful for that information. In many cases BUPA contributions are paid by employers. In one of the wage negotiations with the EETPU, part of the deal was that BUPA contributions should be paid on behalf of employees.

For many years it has been the policy of successive Governments to tax any perk, in whatever guise it comes. We should be considering the exemption limit. That has nothing to do with nurseries; it covers the whole range of perks. I accept what the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) said about the amount having to be added to the salary. There is nothing unusual in that. If it is decided that a perk is part of one's salary, its value must be added to the cash that one receives. That may bring one over the £8,500 limit. That limit is out of date. It has not been changed since 1979. In 1979, the average industrial wage was just over £100 a week. Today it is nearly £200. If it was right to set the limit at £8,500 in 1979, it should now be uprated.

Taxation is supposed to be fair for every taxpayer. It is wrong to single out nurseries. The crucial point is that if a nursery is subsidised, it is a perk. Many nurseries are not subsidised. My information is that there are 75 to 80 subsidised nurseries. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said that they covered about 2,000 children. That is a minority. Of course we want women with children to be able to work. If one singles out those people who are fortunate enough to work for someone who provides a nursery, what shall we do for the mother who does not have that facility?

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Increase child benefit.

Sir William Clark: The fact that the Labour party is expert at spending other people's money emerges in every debate. When it comes to spending its own money, it is a little more reasonable.

If we say that a workplace nursery is to be tax-free, what about the mother who does not have a nursery at work? What shall we do for her? What if the Inland Revenue were to say that there would be a child-minding allowance for those who keep their children near home when they are at work? What would that cost the Exchequer? I have tried to find out. It would increase public expenditure by over £2 billion if we were to make nursery places available for all children.

I understand that many of these nurseries are super and cost a great deal of money. In many cases the subsidy is about £2,000 or £2,500 per child. The subject of perks raises a different argument, but if we tax employees' perks, no perk should be excluded. I hope that my hon. Friend will resist the new clause. The fact that the cost is shared is immaterial. If an employer supplies to an employee something worth £80 and that employee pays £40 of the cost, he is enjoying a £40 perk.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): It is pleasing to hear the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) supporting benefits in kind. I wish that he had supported them in 1976 when the Labour Government introduced legislation and he voted against many of the provisions. Is there a difference between the benefits in kind which were taxed then and this particular benefit? People may be taxed on the cost of travelling to work on the basis that they can or should move their abode closer to their place of work, but it is almost impossible for a person with a child to avoid incurring certain expenditure in relation to child care.

5 pm

Sir William Clark: Every working mother suffers that disadvantage, because if she goes to work she must find someone to look after her child. She may find a minder locally or a relative may help out or, if she is very fortunate, she can take the child to the works nursery. I assure the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) that I am not advocating perks. If perks are taxed, every perk should be taxed. There should be no exemptions.

One of the reasons why the perks industry has grown so alarmingly since the end of the war stems from the high rates of taxation that we have suffered under successive Governments. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to reduce taxation. If taxes were reduced to a reasonable rate—for instance, a starting rate of approximately 15p in the pound rising to no more than 40p to 45p in the pound—we could remove all perks, because people would have enough money to provide their own amenities. It is a retrograde step to single out nurseries, which are an emotive issue, and set one taxpayer against another—the working mother with a nursery against the working mother without a nursery. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will resist that step.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): This is an important debate and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) for the way in which he opened it. I should like to criticise the use of the word "perk" by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). It is wrong to regard the provision of work-place nurseries and its possible taxation as a benefit to those who take advantage of it as being on all fours with other forms of perk of which I am extremely critical. The argument for this tax relief—it is not a perk—is a social argument. Has the Treasury consulted the DHSS to ascertain that Department's view on the need to encourage workplace nurseries wherever possible?

My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) said that at present this tax hinders the development of a socially desirable asset. From experience in my constituency I have felt very strongly about this for some time. With my hon. Friend th Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) I went to see the Under-Secretary of State for Employment. I was trying to persuade the Manpower Services Commission to provide a nursery at the local skillcentre in Deptford, but I had no success. Fortunately, however, we were able to get the assistance of the local councils in that endeavour.

I appreciate the importance of providing workplace nurseries because I have seen the conditions in which so many women live in my constituency and elsewhere. They are very often cooped up in high-rise flats, hardly able to get out and enjoying, if I may so describe it, lonely conditions which are hardly conducive to bringing up young children. I want such women to be able to earn their own living and to provide for themselves. The hon. Member for Croydon, South said that the Labour party wanted to spend other people's money, but the Government are spending our money providing supplementary benefit and other benefits for women who are prevented from working by the lack of workplace nursery provision. I want such women to have the opportunity to train at skillcentres to make themselves more employable and perhaps to find employment, but their prospects are not bright if the potential employer does not provide a workplace nursery.

[Mr. Guy Barnett]

One of the arguments in favour of the new clause is the desperate shortage of day nurseries. In many parts of the country they do not exist at all or are in short supply. There is an excellent day nursery in my constituency, the Vanbrugh day nursery. It is an excellent institution but there is a waiting list and it cannot meet the need. I am not sure of the figures for my own constituency, but in many London boroughs more than 30 per cent. of families are single-parent families. If we do not make proper provision for the under-fives there will be a major social problem.

The day nursery in my constituency is inadequate, nursery schools do not meet the needs of parents because of the hours when those schools take children and many people feel disturbed at the possibility of children being with unqualified child minders. The question is whether we want to encourage the development of workplace nurseries and to continue to make proper provision for those already using them.

There is a strong argument for workplace nurseries, whatever outside provision there may be, because it is important for children under the age of five to see as much of their mothers as possible. The mother should be within reach so that people in charge of the nursery can get the mother to comfort her child if it is upset. It is easier for the mother to take her child to work than to take it to a nursery first and then go to work. Workplace nurseries would also assist in family development. The cost of not providing workplace nurseries is incredible when one considers the waste of the skills, training and qualifications of women who are prevented from working because they have young families when they might otherwise be working in a private company or a public institution such as a hospital.

Just before the debate I received a letter from a constituent. I shall conclude by reading from that letter because I think my constituent's case is probably typical of the cases of many hundreds of people in my constituency and throughout London. Referring to her little boy, she said:

"I could not face leaving him with a childminder who I cannot help believing is an alternative mother and it would sap my confidence as a mother. It was hard to leave him at the nursery when he was eight months old; now 14 months later I could not take him from his friends and leave him with one strange woman. I would therefore have to give up work as a principal local government officer in Urban Renewal in one of the most deprived boroughs in the country. I will not be able to adjust."

There is someone whose valuable services in a deprived inner London borough would be lost because she recognises, as I hope I do, too, the special value of workplace nurseries for the under-fives.

Therefore, I have no hesitation in giving my full support to the new clause.

Mr. Tim Smith: It is remarkable that the Opposition should have selected for a major debate on Report the taxation of the benefit in kind of the provision of workplace nurseries. A wide range of subjects could have been chosen. Unemployment is now over 3 million. At the time of the Budget, the Opposition criticised it for its lack of measures for dealing with the jobs problem, although there was a major extension of the youth training scheme and fundamental changes in national insurance contribution charges. Therefore, it is remarkable that on Report the Opposition should choose as a subject for major debate the provision of workplace nurseries.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is an attack on the Chair and the selection of amendments. I should be grateful if you would bring the hon. Gentleman back in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have not heard the hon. Gentleman criticise the selection of amendments. I understood that he was discussing the priority that the House placed on the debate that is now taking place.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will have noticed from the Amendment Paper that the only new clause tabled by the Opposition relating to unemployment is new clause 7, which simply calls on the Chancellor to include in the Financial Statement and Budget Report——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It might help if we got back to the nurseries. We are discussing new clauses 1 and 4.

Mr. Smith: The point that I am trying to make is that at a time of major unemployment the Opposition have selected a new clause that affects the interests of just 2,000 taxpayers. The interests of 2,000 taxpayers are at stake. That is the best estimate. The number could be less because it relates to the provision of 2,000 places in workplace nurseries. Therefore, the number of taxpayers affected could be less.

Ms. Harman: The hon. Gentleman might be talking about 2,000 taxpayers at the moment, but what about the movement to try to expand workplace nurseries? Many hundreds of thousands of people might find themselves in that situation. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will address himself to that very important principle.

Mr. Smith: I am doing that at the moment. I am discussing those whom the Opposition are seeking to help —those 2,000 taxpayers. Are they the people in greatest need? I believe that they are not. They are an elite minority. We have already heard that some of them are enjoying a benefit of £4,000 a year, which is twice what it costs to send a child to a public day school in London. It is a very substantial benefit.

If the new clause were accepted, a massive anomaly would arise. What would we then say to married women who are forced to go out to work and have to leave their child with a child minder or employ a nanny? They are the people who suffer hardship or are in real difficulty.

I believe that, as a matter of principle, all benefits in kind should be taxed, including the two that are currently excepted—the 15p luncheon voucher and miners' coal. No encouragement should be given by the system of taxation to employers to pay people in kind. Such benefits create distortions in the labour market and inhibit mobility. The tax base needs to be widened and tax rates reduced.

The new clause would favour a privileged elite. I am astonished that the Opposition should even suggest that the House consider it.

5.15 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I was surprised that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) has not looked more carefully at the Standing Orders that govern our debates and does not appreciate some of the difficulties facing the Opposition in tabling amendments on the key issues in the Budget. If he had looked more carefully into those problems, he would appreciate that we do not have all that much choice of areas that we can debate.

I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) has tabled the new clause on workplace nurseries, because it gives the House the opportunity to address itself to one of the central issues —the provision of nurseries—which is of fundamental importance to our economy. My hon. Friend suggested that workplace nurseries were a growing phenomenon. I suspect that he is wrong. In the north of England, one of the tragedies is that the number of workplace nurseries that have closed exceeds the number that have been opened. In the Lancashire textile mill towns, and, I suspect, in the Yorkshire mill towns, we have seen the demise of many traditional workplace nurseries. That has been unfortunate for people in those communities. Not only jobs but the benefit of the nurseries have been lost in those areas.

The House should recognise the importance of the nursery not just to the parents but to the children. The children can benefit from a well-run and well-supervised nursery. The tragedy is that nursery provision in this country lags badly behind all the other EEC countries. We should look at every possible way of expanding and improving nursery provision, whether it be workplace nurseries, nursery schools or day nurseries. The sad fact is that here little more than 22 per cent. of children get the opportunity to experience proper nursery education. In France and West Germany, by the time children are three, and certainly by the time they are four, the figure is almost 100 per cent.

Let us look at what has happened in this country in recent years. For the children, the provision of nurseries has improved marginally, in that many of the local authority nursery schools have gone over to part-time provision. However, that has an adverse effect for parents. Although it may allow more children part-time places so that they can experience learning through play in nurseries and learn to work with other children, it makes it harder for parents to take a job and take children to part-time places in a nursery. We should consider how to improve the facilities for parents and give them support in caring for their children.

Studies such as the "Head Start" studies in the United States and recent work at Bristol university make it clear that the child benefits from nursery provision—not just at the time or in the next few years in school, but throughout his lifetime. From those studies it was clear that people of 19 and 20 still appeared to have advantages over contemporaries who had not experienced nursery education. If we have any real belief at all in equal opportunites, we should make it absolutely clear that we consider the provision of nurseries essential to ensure that everybody has the same career prospects.

I recognise that there is considerable muddle about charges for nursery provision. It is worth noticing that most workplace nurseries make a charge, and there is some subsidy, although I suspect that often the subsidy is not particularly accurately calculated. It has more to do with wage negotiations. If the Inland Revenue tried to be fair, it would run into many problems. The on-costs of a mursery are sometimes loaded and sometimes offloaded.

We also have to recognise that for many parents the choice is between the workplace nursery or a local authority day nursery. Throughout the country there are fantastic variations. Some local authorities impose substantial means-tested charges for day nurseries and others provide the places free. Therefore, there would be anomalies between those who had to pay for places at a workplace nursery and those who were fortunate enough to get free day nursery places.

When children go to a state school, they receive free nursery education at the age of three. It is illogical for the Government to say that if one has a child of three, one can send him to a nursery school and there is no charge. It is considered to be not a perk, but a basic requirement. However, if one saves the state from having to make that provision and takes one's child to a workplace nursery, that is considered a tax perk. That is an odd anomaly. There is no merit in the Government's proposal for taxation. If there was any merit, it would be logical only for those from nought to three years old. But from the age of three onwards, for the fortunate children who live in the bigger, Labour-controlled cities, where nursery provision is available for about 60 to 70 per cent. of children, rather than in some of the Tory shires — such as Gloucestershire — where there is almost no nursery provision, there would certainly be some anomalies.

We must also recognise the considerable advantage——

Mr. Tim Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman advocate tax relief on the payment of fees to private nursery schools where there is no state provision?

Mr. Bennett: I thought that we were talking about private nursery schools provided by employers. In most cases, they are private institutions, although I realise that some are provided by the National Health Service and other such organisations.

We must recognise the benefit of workplace nurseries to children. Nothing is more demoralising for a child than to be trailed to a local authority nursery, which is often in the opposite direction from its mother's workplace, and involves the mother or the father having to leave home earlier to take the child to nursery and perhaps having problems picking him up at night. There are considerable advantages in the workplace nursery, to which the child can be taken with the minimum difficulty and which provides the parent with the opportunity to see the child during the day. Instead of removing what they call a concession, the Government should reaffirm their faith in nursery education and consider improving its provision. They should certainly not consider taxing it.

I should like to put some questions to the Minister about how the change will work in practice. What happens if a husband and wife, who have one child, are both at work and the wife decides to take the child to a nursery at her workplace? Will the amount of tax be decided according to her income and the cost of the nursery place, or will it be based on the combined incomes of both parents? The fact that, at present, it is more likely that the nursery will be provided at the wife's workplace will affect both parents' opportunity to earn money.

[Mr. Bennett]

What will be the position of the people at the margin? Now that the limit is set at nearly £8,000, many more people will be at the margin. In the north of England, many people are employed in piecework, especially in the machining and textile industries. With piecework, there is always the incentive to try to earn a little more, but if earning more money means that one will be pushed over the threshold, it may be an expensive extra piece of work. Will the limit be decided on weekly earnings or on annual earnings?

I support the new clause. I suggest that the House should make it clear that it believes that all people should have equal rights to job opportunities. Careers should not have to suffer because of the problems of finding proper child care facilities.

The final point to remember is that nursery education is extremely beneficial to children. The Government should be offering incentives, not disincentives, for its provision.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) reminded the House that Britain has the second highest proportion of working women in Europe and a high proportion of working wives and mothers. One reason for that is the substantial tax advantages enjoyed by married couples when the wife works. Such a couple enjoy the higher married person's personal allowance and the wife's earned income allowance, which is the same as having an additional single person's allowance. The advantage is substantial when it is compared with the income of a family organised on more traditional lines, where the husband and father works to earn the money and the wife and mother works in the home and looks after the children. They have only the personal married allowance. I look forward with great interest to the Green Paper on reform of personal taxation foreshadowed in the Budget, and to the proposal, which I hope it will contain, to introduce greater equity into the taxation of the incomes of married couples.

In the context of such taxation there is no justification for enshrining a substantial additional tax advantage for working mothers, albeit the new clause relates only to a small and privileged minority. As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) reminded us, the new clause will affect about 2,000 children and their parents. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) spoke of how important it is for young children to have their mothers close at hand and advocated the workplace nursery. I take what is possibly the unfashionable view, but not necessarily an unpopular one. I believe that it is preferable for pre-school age children to have their mothers close at hand, for the mothers of those children not to work and not to park them at workplace or local authority nurseries, but to care for them in the home.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): What does the hon. Member intend to do with the 1 million one-parent families?

Mr. Watts: This is my personal view. I accept that it is a matter of personal choice how each family organises its life. If a mother wishes to work, I would not wish to place any legislative barrier in her way. However, I do not believe that there should be any encouragement by granting an additional tax benefit, such as that contained in the new clause, to mothers of young children to work and not to care for their children in the home.

Mr. Randall: I had not intended to take part in the debate, but after hearing some of the comments from Conservative Members, I cannot refrain. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) made a caring and compassionate introductory speech. Subsequent speeches seemed to be divided into two rough areas. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) said that the argument was a social one, but the Government have presented the argument in financial terms. No wonder the Conservative party is seen as hard and uncaring, with a philosophy based on greed and self-interest. I hope that the debate will be reported fully so that the public will realise that the Government are hard and uncaring and consider matters in purely money terms. That is very sad.

Hon. Members have discussed various schemes in Britain, but we are obviously doing much worse than other European countries. France, Denmark and Holland make educational provision for between 20 and 30 per cent. of their two-year-olds; we make no provision. Belgium, France and the Netherlands make educational provision for more than 95 per cent. of their four-year-olds. The comparable figures for West Germany and the United Kingdom are 75 per cent. and 56 per cent. respectively. Under this Government, the kids are being deprived.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) should have done his homework before coming to the Chamber. I know that sometimes we all make impetuous speeches when we are perhaps fired with enthusiasm.

Mr. Sedgemore: The impetuous speeches are all from the Government side.

5.30 pm

Mr. Randall: There are others as well.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield should have made his arguments a little clearer. He said that the matter was not worth considering because it dealt with a mere 2,000 children. As a Socialist, I cannot think in those terms. If 2,000 young children can benefit and only a small amount of money is involved, why can we not just go ahead? Two and a half weeks ago in Committee the Government gave £50 million per annum to the land and property speculators through the abolition of the land development grant; yet they cannot afford to give money to the nurses and the less well-off. The bored children who should have proper care at workplace nurseries when their parents are working are deprived.

The hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) sounded as though he was going back into the last century. He felt that there was no justification in taxation terms for going ahead with the scheme, so he would vote against the new clause. The hon. Gentleman thinks in terms of the taxation system and money. That is the Conservative party's graven image. I appeal to hon. Members to support the measure.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) complained that the Labour party was good at spending other people's money. That is a myth that the Conservative party used in the 1983 general election and that it tries to perpetuate while it continues with this immense drift of wealth from the less well-off to the rich. Although there is only a small number of workplace nurseries, it is part of the Conservative party's ethos not to help the people on low incomes but to transfer the money to the rich. The Conservative party has shown that it is not a thrifty party by the way in which it spends the revenue from North sea oil on unemployment. This is the essence of the new clause — opportunities should be provided for mothers and fathers, especially in single-parent families, to contribute to the economy. That is a laudable aim. The argument advanced by the hon. Member for Croydon, South does not stand up.

We are considering whether to provide nurseries in workplaces for which the employers and employees will pay. We are asking for tax relief on the contributions. The new clause is attractive in that it provides a genuine opportunity for women to do what they want to do. We talk about equal opportunities and freedom of the individual — this is what it is all about. It is not about the opportunity for one person to rip off someone else. That is the interpretation offered by the Government. Freedom of the individual involves economic freedom to do the job that one would like to do.

People with considerable skills live in Britain—for example, doctors and nurses. Partly because of cuts, some hospitals are short of nurses with particular skills. It takes a long time and considerable expense to train a nurse. In terms of economic arguments, it would seem wise to use those skills rather than have them constricted within the family framework because there are no opportunities to provide care for children while parents are at work.

Women will be the main beneficiaries of this scheme, although it applies also to some single-parent families. There has been a growth in jobs in certain sectors that predominantly employ women. That scope for job creation could be enhanced by providing the appropriate tax relief for these nurseries. Jobs are being created not only in the supermarkets and service industries but in the electronics industry. Too few women are employed in the high-tech industries. There is a dearth of women taking engineering degrees. To have a good high-tech industry it is important to provide opportunities for women.

The hon. Member for Slough said that we should keep the women in the home and that he did not care about all the problems about which the Labour party waffles on. He represents an area where, last year, house prices increased by 17 per cent. and where women are contributing to mortgage repayments. The hon. Gentleman says, "You cannot do that. You stay at home." This means that people have to live on faggots and peas and in a deprived way.

Mr. Watts: I am sure that when the hon. Gentleman checks the Official Report tomorrow, he will see that I said nothing about keeping women in the home. I said that it had to be a matter of personal choice. It is not a choice that should be influenced by an additional substantial tax benefit to working mothers.

Mr. Randall: Perhaps we should go to women who make big contributions to the household mortgage repayments by working but instinctively want to stay at how with their children because there are no workplace nurseries. I am sure that a substantial number of people in Slough feel that way. They are deprived.

Conservative Members have referred to car parks, social clubs and sports facilities. That is a fair point to raise if one wants to invoke the financial or economic arguments. However, I am not inclined to do that. I shall vote for the measure for purely social reasons, because that is the civilised thing to do. Why are the benefits of car parks, social clubs and sports facilities not taxed? The Government are hindering the development of workplace nurseries through their taxatarion system. Why are workplace nurseries treated differently from car parks, social clubs and sports facilities?

The present tax arrangements will have two consequences. First, they might lead to nurseries closing through lack of demand or because the employer decides that their penal nature makes the arrangement unattractive. Alternatively, the nurseries will be used only by the children of those on higher incomes. The Opposition believe in a more equitable and fairer society. Why do we not have an arrangement whereby those on lower incomes will or could benefit? In clause after clause there is a shift of wealth from the poor or the less well off to the very rich. The workplace nursery scheme, which has great potential, is being throttled before it has had time to blossom. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will support the clause.

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): The new clause asks for total exemption of nursery taxes. I do not want to go that far. My hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) and I tabled a new clause which went, in a slightly different way, to equate the taxation of nursery provision more to the taxation of company cars. Unfortunately, that was not selected. I shall try closely to confine myself to new clause 1.

It was only 18 months ago that the Treasury decided to tax workplace nurseries. The effect of that was a sudden blow to many who might have been paying £20 or £30 a week in contribution towards a workplace nursery. They found themselves having to pay £15 a week more at the top of the scale. That is a large amount of money to find. The qualifying earnings figure is £8,500 and the difference in take-home pay can determine whether it is worth carrying on with that job or not. We are seeing the return of punitive taxation. It has existed theoretically since 1948 but it is only now that the Treasury has decided to introduce it in practice.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Does my hon. Friend agree that the £8,500 limit is part of the problem? I believe that that limit was introduced by the Labour party when it was in power. I hope that the Government will pay urgent attention to dealing with the problem.

Mr. Stevens: I agree with my hon. Friend that the £8,500 is part of the problem. The Government's approach —it is one that I do not disagree with—is to try to cut out perks in general by making them subject to tax or providing that they be paid directly in cash. The effect of keeping the £8,500 limit since 1978 or 1979 is to bring more people into a tax bracket, but surely workplace nurseries are subject to different considerations. Why has the Treasury decided to tax now? Is there a suspicion that workplace nursery provision will expand and will be used by more than the present 2,000? I believe that the provision will expand unless taxation is introduced which prevents that.

There are problems with skills because we can have too many of one type and too few of another. The new technologies will be taught to comparatively few in the first place, but often to youngish people, both male and female. Companies that want to keep those people at work for the maximum time will look more and more towards provisions such as workplace nurseries to enable them to derive the maximum advantage from their skills. Companies will learn to provide nurseries on a wider basis to get the best return on the investment that they have made. It must be helpful overall for the country to ensure that the facility exists.

[Mr. Stevens]

A top-end assessment of £4,000 in London has been suggested and that could apply. I suggest that that is an assessment of cost and not of worth. Cost and worth are different things. A person may be paying a contribution of about £30 a week but how much is that benefit really worth? It might cost about £80 a week to achieve the standards in workplace nurseries that are required by the Department of Health and Social Security but it could be worth less than that. The worth of the facility is no different when it has to be produced to a higher standard than in many factories. If people work in a better looking office than another one, how much is it worth to work there? It is an attraction, but it does not lead to a decision to move to it. The assessment that some would make of the value of the facility and the amount to be charged could be unfair. That is why my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden and I were seeking to impose a ceiling of £1,300.

5.45 pm

There is a definite advantage in having the facility of a workplace nursery but I believe that it should be a limited facility in terms of the assessment that should apply. That is what I would have preferred for this debate but unfortunately our amendment was not selected. The principle of being able to tax indefinitely on the provision of a workplace nursery will be detrimental to those who are using it now, to future users, to the development of that facility, to the retention of skills where they are wanted and perhaps to training if there will be doubts about how much it is worth to train to a higher level. Those are the disadvantages of this type of taxation. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider putting a ceiling on the taxation of workplace nurseries if he refuses the non-exemption. I have reservations about total exemption.

I want to draw the attention of the Minister to transitional arrangements. If the Bill is passed as it stands, those who took jobs with a company with a workplace nursery will be faced, over the next year and in the future, with a high taxation level. That taxation level will be one for which they did not bargain.

In many instances, when new forms of taxation are introduced, a transitional period is allowed. It will not be unfair to consider allowing a transitional period at least for those who have children in workplace nurseries now. I should be obliged if the Minister would make a statement on any thoughts he may have on a transitional period for those people.

I urge my hon. Friend to consider carefully the damaging effect that this type of taxation would have. No one likes, more than I do the idea of a stable background of a married couple with a family where the woman spends a fair amount of time at home looking after that family, as was suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). Both society and this House, in its legislation, have sought to introduce extensions and a choice. We have chosen to do that and we have a duty to take account of that and respect the problems and the developments of workplace nurseries and the needs of our industries in that area.

Ms. Richardson: I agree with many of the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens). It seems that he does not wish to go as far as the Opposition's new clause, but is prepared to go a little further than his right hon. and hon. Friends. I agreed with him until he uttered his final remarks. He referred to the need for the mother to remain at home, wherever possible, during the early formative years of the child, but he emphasised that there should be a choice. The difference between us is that the Opposition believe that if it is a two-parent family, fathers should share in the care of their children. We would encourage both parents to have a caring and sharing role, wherever possible. Both the father and the mother should have the opportunity to work and to look after their children.

This is the second time that this debate has been held. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) and perhaps other hon. Members will recall that a similar debate last took place in July 1984. It lasted from about 2 or 3 am until about 8 am. I am pleased that today it is taking place at a more reasonable time. Despite the almost empty Press Gallery, I hope that attention will be drawn to this matter in tomorrow's press. It is vital to many women, not only to those who use workplace nurseries but also to those who feel that they may want to use them and who may wish to encourage their employers to consider providing them.

In last year's debate, 99 per cent. of the speeches—all of which supported the principle—were made by Opposition Members. Only one Back-Bench Conservative Member spoke in that debate. Today we have heard the views of a few more Conservative Members. I do not like most of their views, but I am pleased that the view of at least two and perhaps three Conservative Members is the same as that of the Opposition on this important subject. Our debate in 1984 did not shift the Government. During the last 12 months, the anxieties of parents with children in workplace nurseries have not diminished.

I spoke only two weeks ago to a parent who visited me here. She has a child in a workplace nursery and she feels that a sword is hanging over her that might drop at any moment. If the Government do not consider sympathetically the Opposition's case for not taxing workplace nurseries, she believes that her life could fall apart. She is a nurse and she worked very hard to obtain her qualifications. She is a one-parent family. Her child is in a workplace nursery but it is an effort to meet the cost of the nursery care out of her pay.

If she had to pay extra tax on top of the charges already made, she would have to give up her job. She does not want to do so for a number of reasons. First, she believes that the National Health Service provides a service that should be supported and that she has a contribution to make to it. Secondly, she believes that she has a right to work. Thirdly—this, she told me, is the most important point of all—during the period that her little girl has been in the nursery she has benefited greatly. She knows that her mother is working nearby. As an only child, she is benefiting from being with other children and from growing up in those surroundings. She said that it would be a great pity—indeed, worse than that—if she was unable to afford to keep her child in the nursery.

The Government are cutting off their nose to spite their face by refusing to remove this tax and by refusing to recognise that its existence is a disincentive if people with children wish to go to work. The Government may indeed lose a small amount of revenue, but if parents have to give up working, the Government will lose even more in tax. Tax is paid by parents who are in work. They also make national insurance contributions. They are also valuable members of the work-force.

The hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) spoke to new clause 4. I commend to hon. Members who are so bitterly opposed to it a very interesting piece of research into the child care needs of NHS shift workers who use the Blackshaw nursery centre. It may provide them with an eye-opener in terms of good practice in the provision of child care nurseries. This centre was the first of its kind and was opened in January 1982. It is funded by the Department of the Environment and the London borough of Wandsworth through an urban aid grant. This purpose-built nursery is situated in the grounds of St. George's hospital, Wandsworth. It has a professional staff and it is managed by a voluntary management committee, consisting of members of the community health centre, the local workplace support group and other support groups. It is very well run. It was provided because of the child care demands of the people who work in and around the hospital. My hon. Friend the Member for Hodge Hill might care to note that the nursery is open from 7 am until 10 pm, a period that covers almost the whole of the hospital's work shifts.

Let us not run away with the idea that those who use these nurseries do not pay. They certainly do. Some Conservative Members think that this is a buckshee provision — that charity is being provided for these women. It is not a charity or a perk. I object to the word "perk". It should be regarded as the beginning of extended and better child care provision for children throughout the country in order to allow women to exercise their right to work, train and retrain. If we are to make it possible for women to work, we must not decide the fate of women and children on the narrow basis of how much money the Treasury might or might not lose. We should examine the problems of working parents, in particular working mothers.

I was privileged this morning to attend an exhibition that is being held in East Ham town hall by the engineer's and surveyor's department of the London borough of Newham. It has mounted an exhibition of the work it is doing to encourage women to train as scientists and engineers. I remind the Government that this is the International Year of Youth. As it has encouraged women to enter the engineer's and surveyor's department, it decided to mount an exhibition, and this morning it invited a large number of schoolgirls to visit the exhibition. It is considering having creche facilities, which is the right way to approach the matter. If we are to encourage employers to operate genuine equal opportunities, we must face up to the needs of working parents.

6 pm

Many groups have supported the workplace nursery campaign. But in addition to the women's groups, mixed groups, community health councils, community groups of all types, parents and other individuals, the campaign has had some unlikely allies, and I say that meaning no disrespect, for example, to the Institute of Personnel Management. Not only are employees protesting about the present situation, but in some instances managements are complaining about the approach of the Government. They, as employers, want to adopt good practices, but they are not being allowed to do so. The Institute of Personnel Management, in a paper dated 1 May referring to remarks made to a Select Committee, said:

> "In the industrial revolution, it was employers who sent little boys up chimneys and it was governments who brought in legislation to stop them. Now, employers are seeking to provide welfare facilities and arrangements which enable people to work and to use their talent in the cause of increasing Britain's productivity and economic performance, and it is government that is trying to stop them."

In other words, the view of the Institute of Personnel Management — not simply of a community health council or a group of women—is that the Government are wrong in their present policy. The Institute paper continued:

> "The taxation of creches is socially, morally and economically wrong. They are not benefits in the hands of the recipients. They are welfare and employment facilities which remove impediments to the employment prospects of certain groups in the community."

The most outrageous feminist could not have put it better. That is precisely what we want, in the public and private sector, but the Government are preventing that from happening. The institute ended by appealing

> "to the Government in the interests of the use of talent, the mobility of labour and good employment practice . . . now to introduce an amendment to the Finance Bill."

That body—if not Conservative, then normally cautious in matters of this type—is strongly in favour of the case we have made.

I shall not understand the Minister if, when he replies, he says that the private and public sectors do not want this type of nursery provision. It is clear that they do. If the Government are serious about providing employment possibilities with choice for everyone in the community, they will accept our amendment.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) reminded hon. Members that when I last entertained the House to my views on this matter it was about 5 o'clock in the morning. On that occasion she spoke a little before that. It is more comfortable to be addressing the topic in the afternoon.

In the intervening year, hon. Members will have been the recipients of a considerable quantity of misleading, biased and incorrect information from various campaigns——

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Such as the Treasury brief?

Mr. Hamilton: I never speak to a Treasury brief, as the hon. Gentleman should be aware.

Hon. Members have been the recipients of much misleading information, much of which has been reiterated by Opposition Members today, as it was when we debated the matter a year ago. It cannot be disguised that the potential beneficiaries of the change in the law that is being proposed by Opposition Members would be a small number of fortunate individuals. The number is estimated at present by the Inland Revenue at 2,000 people in respect of about 70 nurseries throughout the country. It is clear that the lowest paid employees, even under the present state of the law, are not subject to tax on a benefit provided by an employer where it constitutes a nursery facility of the type that we are now debating.

[Mr. Hamilton]

I found it grotesque that the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman)—who, alas, is no longer in her place—should say how important creche facilities would be, for example, for Members of Parliament. When one considers the income of hon. Members, it seems grotesque that many low-paid people should be called on to pay through their taxes for benefits for those who earn considerably more.

When we consider that one starts paying income tax in Britain at about one third of the average wage—a level which is far too low, in spite of what the Government have done to raise it over the years—it seems wrong, even on Socialist principles, to require people in those circumstances to pay for benefits which many can afford to pay for themselves.

There is also a point of principle involved here. It is an extremely inefficient way of targeting benefits on people who are on below average incomes to do it through the general tax system in the way that the new clause proposes. Similarly, it is a shame that we did not do something to cut down on child benefit in the recent social security reviews, because at least three quarters of what is paid out in child benefit goes to those who are in no serious need. Therefore, it would have been better had we used that money, for example, to raise income tax thresholds or to reduce rates so as to take out of the charge to tax many of those on low incomes to whom I have referred.

What is proposed in the new clause — and in the special pleading for the various, no doubt worthy, causes which are brought to our attention from time to time when tax concessions are sought — is a return to the truck system, so that the employer, instead of giving the employee the freedom, by being paid in cash, to choose what to buy with that cash, ties him to certain forms of expenditure that the employer, not the employee, decides is good for him. In the middle ages, the majority of the people of Britain were adscriptus glebae—bound to the land—and that would be the result of the new clause if it were extended into a more generalised principle.

We must debate this issue as a question of principle, because if the tax system is not based on some principles, it degenerates into a welter of special pleading and benefits. That has undermined our whole social security and tax system, and I am pleased that at last we have a Government who are determined to start tackling the accumulation of special advantages that are given to individuals on no special principle.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) said that there had been a change in the practice of the Revenue in relation to the taxation of employer-provided workplace nurseries. He seemed to imply that in the past such benefits in kind had been exempt from tax. That has not been the case. It is a course over which we cantered last year in considerable detail, when the Financial Secretary explained the position, and nobody has come forward to refute what he then said.

There are two types of benefit in kind for tax purposes, which are treated in different ways. First of all, there are those that can be converted into money. Benefits in kind that can be converted into money have always been taxed on the amount of the benefit in money terms. Secondly, there are those that are not convertible into money, and workplace nurseries would come into that category, along with, for example, board and lodging provided by an employer, or travel, meals, uniforms, education, and so on and so forth. These are personal benefits in some sense and cannnot be exchanged for money.

Those non-convertible benefits in kind, on the general principles of income tax, have never been chargeable to tax but since 1948 a special regime has applied to company directors and those classed as higher paid employees. So, those who are not company directors or higher paid employees are still not within the charge to tax in respect of the employer-provided workplace nursery. It is interesting to point out that a Labour Government brought about the change to correct what I think was an imbalance whereby one form of remuneration was taxed on a different basis from cash. That is a fundamentally illogical principle and one which strikes at the whole basis of fairness in the tax system.

Mr. Sedgemore: It appears to be one of the hon. Gentleman's major points that this is not a new tax. I served on the Committee last year and took part in the debate when the Minister appeared to say the same thing. I gave evidence to the Committee that there were 98 workplace nurseries in Britain where tax was not being paid or collected. How does he square that with this not being a new tax?

Mr. Hamilton: If the benefit in kind is not drawn to the attention of the Revenue it can hardly be expected to tax it. I have no window into the mind of individual taxpayers and how they fill in their tax returns but in so far as it was generally assumed not to be a taxable emolument, taxpayers did not fill in returns. [Interruption.] If hon. Members will listen to what I am saying, I am quite prepared for them to intervene later in my speech if they disagree with me. In so far as the Revenue was unaware that this benefit in kind was being provided to particular individuals, it could not be taxed. In many other cases the value of the benefit received might have been too small to make it worth assessing. I do not know. Certainly a de minimis rule is very sensibly applied in other areas of the tax system as well.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Could the hon. Gentleman give the House an example of where the tax was being collected?

Mr. Hamilton: No, I cannot.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. Gentleman cannot because such an example never existed.

Mr. Hamilton: Just because I cannot name an example does not mean that it did not exist. I am prepared to give the hon. Gentleman the benefit of the doubt and to say that in the past people have not been taxed on a benefit which was taxable. That can be for one of two reasons: first of all, that the Revenue did not know and, secondly, that it was not worth collecting. Either one or other of those reasons is the cause. One of the reasons why more people are now in receipt of a taxable benefit in relation to these nurseries is that as incomes have risen and the £8,500 definition of what is a higher paid employee has remained the same, so more people have come into the tax net. Probably the other reason why nobody has been assessed in the past is that a higher proportion of those in receipt of the benefit were not actually within the charge to tax because they were not higher paid employees for tax purposes.

6.15 pm

There is no justification for the hon. Member for Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) to say that the tax position in law has changed or that the practice of the Revenue has changed. All the facts point to the situation being just the same today as it was in any other year since 1948. A great many red herrings have been put forward and hon. Members who support either of the new clauses have sought to draw some comparison with various other benefits, if they can be called benefits, which are provided for employees. We dealt with car parking spaces last year in some detail and once again the tax position is perfectly clear and is on the record. This would also apply to sports facilities and the other examples which have been given this afternoon. For company directors and those who are higher paid employees, such benefits are taxable even though they may not be taxed for the reasons I have just described in relation to workplace nurseries.

Lest he has forgotten, I should explain to the hon. Member for Hodge Hill, as I did last year, that such benefits are not in practice taxed in certain instances because the value of the benefit for tax purposes is so small as not to make it worthwhile collecting. In the case of a car parking space or any benefit where the value is calculated because it is land for tax purposes, section 531 (1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 provides:

"the annual value of land shall be taken to be the rent which might reasonably be expected to be obtained on a letting from year to year if the tenant undertook to pay all usual tenant's rates and taxes, and if the landlord undertook to bear the costs of the repairs and insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary for maintaining the subject of the valuation in a state to command that rent."

In the case of a car parking space it is quite obvious that the gross annual value for tax purposes of a piece of land 6 ft by 12 ft will be tiny and not worth the Revenue's trouble to collect.

Mr. Terry Davis: Are all car parks provided on open land? That is not the case in the City of London. He must have seen a report circulated by the London Amenity Transport Association about the effect of company cars. He must know it has been calculated that the cost of car parks in London can be as much as £500 a year per car.

Mr. Hamilton: In that case it is assessable. If the hon. Gentleman knows of any particular instances where tax is not being charged perhaps he would like to draw them to the attention of the Inland Revenue, which will no doubt be glad to receive the information. The law remains as I have explained it, and that is what we are talking about. The hon. Gentleman said the law has changed. I think I have explained that the law has not changed; neither has the practice. The example of the car parking space is no different, in the way that the Inland Revenue treats it, from the employer-provided workplace nursery.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: How would the hon. Member calculate the value of his own car parking space in the House garage? Can he say what return he makes to the Inland Revenue on that?

Mr. Hamilton: I am not responsible for that calculation. The Fees Office would, I am sure, be able to provide that interesting information. The point remains the same, that if it is taxable it is on the basis that I have described under section 531(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act. As a matter of course the Revenue does not seek to assess individuals where the amount of money involved is very small. In an extraordinarily misleading round robin which was distributed by the workplace nurseries campaign in the last few days, a comparison is sought to be drawn with various other kinds of so-called benefits, which it believes are treated differently from workplace nurseries. It mentions, for example, pensions, which it says are exempt from income tax. I am sure that is a surprise to most pensioners who pay income tax on their pensions. It is a kind of deferred tax in as much as one does not pay tax at the time contributions are paid but ultimately tax is paid in the normal way on receipt of a pension.

Share options are also mentioned. The campaign round robin says, correctly, that they were exempted from income tax last year. What is not said is that share options are subject to capital gains tax, as and when they are exercised, on any capital gain made. That is perfectly proper. Shares are capital not income, so they are subject to the capital gains tax regime and not to the income tax regime. If shares are provided at an undervalue, the individual taxpayer is taxed on a benefit equivalent to an interest-free loan of the same amount as the market value of the shares. That is another example that falls flat on its face.

Much has been made of the system of taxation of company cars. The value of the benefit of a company car is assessed by the Inland Revenue on a scale, and the main reason why it is assessed on a scale basis rather than on an individual basis is the difficulty of apportioning the business and private uses of a vehicle. Obviously, where there is an arbitrary system, such as a scale in this instance, there will not be equality of treatment, but the administrative complications of trying to assess each individual on the basis of the exact proportion of private and business use of the car would be formidable. This is a means of reducing the administrative costs while maintaining equality of treatment.

To try to equate employer-provided workplace nurseries, where the benefit is obvious and easily measurable, with the benefits that derive from the provision of a motor car that can be used partly for business purposes and partly for private purposes is unsustainable. If we were to change the system of treatment of benefits in kind on that basis, we should be able to apply the same system to the whole of the benefits in kind that are provided by the employers. That would be grossly unjust to those who do not receive their remuneration by means of payment in kind but receive it through payment in cash.

In general, there are no exceptions to the rule that a benefit in kind is taxed on the same basis as a cash payment of equivalent amount. There are two exceptions. One is luncheon vouchers, but the exception is less valuable than it used to be because of the 15p a day limit on the value of the benefit, so that it is withering away. The other great benefit is concessionary coal provided the coal miners. I do not wish to intrude too much into the private griefs of the Labour party and dilate on that at any great length, but that concession is insupportable.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): I follow my hon. Friend's argument, which has a great deal of force. However, is there not another point that my hon. Friend should perhaps consider? Where one is dealing with a benefit in kind that forms part of remuneration, one is dealing essentially with remuneration, such as free coal, which can be brought within the Taxes Act. However, the provision of nurseries is not so much a benefit in kind as something that has to be provided to enable the employee to do the work. If one wanted to make a distinction, that distinction could be made.

Mr. Hamilton: That is what it is not. It is not a payment that is made to enable any person to do the job but one to enable a particular individual to do the job, and if everybody were entitled to have his tax based on the cost to him, because of his personal situation, of doing a particular job, there would be enormous opportunities for avoidance and the tax base would be substantially reduced. I am about to point out some of the difficulties that would arise if the analysis made by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) were to be accepted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) seemed to say that if an individual were to participate in the labour market, the costs of that participation should be borne by the rest of the country by means of a tax concession. I put to him, although he did not answer my point exactly, the case of somebody who lives in an isolated part of the country, say Brecon, where there is no public transport. Are the costs of his getting to work then to fall on the general taxpayer? I can see no distinction in principle between an employer giving him a grant for a car, for example, and an employer either giving a parent a grant to send a child to a nursery or providing nursery facilities.

Similarly, I am puzzled, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) was, by the limitations that the Opposition have placed upon themselves through the new clause. Why cannot one obtain a tax relief for child minders or nannies? I know that Mr. Peregrine Worsthorne thinks that the unemployment problem would be resolved if all domestic servants could be employed by means of tax relief. I am surprised to find that Labour Members are in the same camp as that distinguished journalist. That seems ultimately to be the road down which they are going.

What about those who are self-employed, for example, who might be in the same position as the one-parent families about whom the hon. Member for Barking talked? There is nobody to provide a nursery for them because by definition they are not employed. Why should they not get the relief? What about individuals with large families who find it difficult to undertake employment because they have children to care for all round the clock? Will they be able to claim for the cost of domestic servants against their tax bill? What about night shift workers? Will they obtain tax relief for an employee to look after children at night, and so on? What about childless families and those with children over five? Why should they be made to pay for what is, after all, a voluntary act — having a child? Neutrality of tax treatment and remuneration is a valuable and vital principle in our tax system and it would be a great pity if we were to allow this exception to undermine it.

The payments that one has to make to earn one's income are deductible for tax purposes, but here we are talking about a different point. The payments that are made, for example, to pay for a child to go to a nursery are not paid to undertake the job itself. The nexus is the personal position of the taxpayer and not the requirements of the job. If the basis of our tax system is altered to accommodate the change proposed by the Labour party, that would go a long way towards undermining what fairness there is in it.

6.30 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) said that Labour Members had raised a few red herrings. If anybody has drawn a red herring across the debate, it is the hon. Gentleman.

We are debating an important new clause that gives protection to existing workplace nurseries and would support the provision of future workplace nurseries. It is an important new clause that is worthy of support.

To call these nurseries a perk is not a correct description of them. They provide something that is essential to the parent, whether it is the mother or the father, to the employer and, ultimately, to the nation. My hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) made the important point that, while some revenue would be lost to the nation if the new clause were carried, if the parent had to give up work as a result of the loss of nursery provision, the nation would lose taxation and national insurance contributions as a result. This is not just a one-sided story.

The hon. Member for Tatton did not like the reference to car parks, but they are relevant. One cannot just dismiss the provision of car parking spaces for employees as being of no consequence. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) forcefully made the point that parking spaces, particularly in the London area but also in many major cities, are a costly item, although a worthwhile provision for the employee. But we are not talking only about parking places. When I worked in industry we had subsidised public transport to get people to factories. In my case it was because the factory was in a difficult place to get to. Subsidised transport is fairly common and one could argue that the portion paid by the employer should be taxed. I am certainly not advocating that, but it is another example of something provided by an employer, as are workplace nurseries, for the benefit not just of the employee but of the employer.

There are other benefits for workers, such as staff sales, and one would find it difficult to determine whether they were perks and on what basis one would tax them if they were to come into the category to which the Government felt they should extend taxation. As many of my hon. Friends have said in this short debate, there is very little provision for nurseries. We compare very unfavourably with all the other nations of Europe. It is an area of care which we should develop, and the state through the local education authority should be providing more nursery facilities for children under the age of five.

I am fortunate in that I represent a borough in which there is more than average provision for nurseries. But even in Burnley, the provision of day nurseries for people going to work is inadequate. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) said that in the north-west, in the textile industry, and in Yorkshire it used to be a common provision, but as industries changed their nature and had to make economies to compete in the world it was gradually cut out and there is much smaller provision of nursery facilities in those industries now than there was a few years ago.

This amendment is important to the working mother and the working father. It would supplement the provision which is available but which is at a woefully low level. However, there is some provision in the state system and our proposal would supplement and encourage it and ensure that the parent would not have to pay tax on it. The new clause is well worth while and I hope that many Conservative Members will support us when we vote in the Division.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Two major themes have been running through this debate and I should like to comment upon them. First, a number of Conservative Members who oppose the new clause have suggested that the reason for doing so is that they want perks to be taxed. I would take that argument with greater seriousness if they made two points in addition simply to saying they want perks to be taxed. I would take it with greater seriousness if they said that they wanted to see consistency in the taxing of perks.

It has emerged from this debate that there are differences in treatment for, say, canteens, car parks, social clubs and sports facilities and, of course, the case has been quoted many times of the greater benefit of a car provided by an employer. If the argument on perks is to be a strong one, there needs to be an argument in addition to that in relation to consistency. We have heard no arguments from Conservative Members about that.

Secondly, I would be much more convinced by Conservative Members if they showed a greater enthusiasm in their discovery of perks and their willingness to tax perks rather than simply using that enthusiasm in relation to workplace nurseries. Two or three weeks ago I went to watch half a day's play in the test match at Headingley. I should preface my remarks by saying that I paid for a public seat. As I walked round the ground, I noticed that one of the recent developments at the Yorkshire cricket club ground was the provision of private boxes or executive suites. I also noticed the amount of alcohol available. I heard some comments of a nature which in some cases I thought was disagreeable. I wondered how much of it was paid for indirectly through the Exchequer both in terms of tax allowances and untaxed perks. If we were to spend money in that way, I wondered whether it would be better spent on workplace nurseries rather than on entertaining business men at cricket grounds and at other sporting events.

If Conservative Members were consistent in their comments, they would be looking for broader taxation on perks.

Mr. Neil Hamilton rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman because he inflicted upon the House the great benefit of his knowledge for some time, and it might be unfair to my hon. Friends who want to speak if I were to give way.

My first point concerned consistency in relation to perks. My second point relates to the argument that workplace nurseries should be seen as another perk and should be taxed. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) did not answer very effectively—because I do not think he can — an intervention made by the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). The crucial difference—this has been a core argument throughout—between workplace nurseries and other perks is that workplace nurseries are crucial in many cases to enable people to exercise their right to work. We are talking about women in the vast majority of cases.

I do not want to use the term "perk" any further in this debate. I see the right to a workplace nursery as an essenial part of the right to work. If the hon. Gentleman were to say to us that he supported a campaign for local authority provision, we might not be having this argument. But the hon. Gentleman knows that in many parts of the country where his party is in control of local government the provision of nurseries and care for children under five is very limited indeed. What we are looking for in this new clause is not elitist support for a small number of people.

When the Financial Secretary replies, will he tell us how much implementation of the new clause would cost the Exchequer? I suspect we shall be talking about a small sum of money. It is not just a matter of providing for an elite number, which is the argument we have heard from the Conservative Benches; it is a matter of making it possible for more and more women, and in some cases men, to make use of workplace nurseries in order to exercise the right to work. I am making a fundamental argument. Many of us take it for granted that we should have the right to work and that we should have a workplace in which we can develop our talents. It is wrong for the Government and for this House to deny many people the right to exercise that opportunity.

This has been an important debate. What has emerged from it are the different perceptions of the role of women in the labour market held by Conservative Members and Labour Members. Throughout the debate Conservative Members have been saying that they prefer a marginalised role for women in the labour market. They prefer to see women in the home, and, with one or two exceptions, they are not keen to see women develop their talents as of right as they are to see men do so. That difference has been crucial.

The debate has highlighted genuine differences between the two sides of the House and the two major political forces in our society. Those differences will come across to the electorate, and it is not without significance that when we have debates that highlight fundamental differences the alliance is hardly represented in the Chamber and its limited representation is characterised by silence. Many people outside who are keen on workplace nurseries will note that Liberal and SDP Members have hardly bothered to attend and have not yet shown any interest in speaking in this important debate.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Although the new clause is extremely attractive, it is not consistent with existing tax law. My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) was right to say that the new clause goes beyond present tax laws. I was wrong when I intervened during his speech, because I do not believe that one can say that the provision of a nursery is wholly and necessarily for the purposes of employment, in the sense in which that phrase is meant in our tax laws.

The question is whether we need to make a special exemption in favour of nursery provision. Major problems arise. As my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton said, once we concede that nursery provision should be exempt from tax law, we have to ask what we should do about nannies. Are people who employ nannies entitled to set the cost against their income for tax purposes? Then we have to go even further and consider the costs of travelling to work.

[Mr. Douglas Hogg]

The new clause is attractive, but it represents a departure from existing tax law, and I suspect that the ramifications are much wider than the House conceives them to be.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I declare a retrospective interest. Not many years ago, my wife put our first child in a workplace nursery when she went back to work as a nurse at Manchester Royal infirmary, which runs the nursery to cater for the needs of nurses.

No one should believe that workplace nurseries have been provided only through the altruism of employers. Normally, nurseries have been seen by employers as necessary to encourage skilled personnel to return to work. My hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) referred to the tax and national insurance contributions that would be lost if we prevented such people from returning to work. We should also remember that we may be depriving the National Health Service of many skills if we bar employees from workplace nurseries.

The existence of nurseries in the NHS allows many women to return to work. I understand the logic of the arguments of the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), but I hope that he accepts that the major cause of the provision of workplace nurseries has been the fact that employers have had to provide them to attract employees. It is consistent to claim that the existence of those nurseries is part and parcel of the employment. For example, they are not comparable with company cars, which provide a personal benefit.

6.45 pm

There are no circumstances—if they exist, they are extremely marginal — in which an employee uses a workplace nursery to pursue other parts of his or her life or to gain extra leisure time. By definition, a workplace nursery provides a service during working hours. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) said, we are talking not about a perk, but about a service that is part and parcel of employment.

Many Conservative Members have a different concept from Labour Members about the role of women at work and of their right of access to most areas of employment. If the Financial Secretary tells us that the Government will start a massive building programme of nursery provision for children aged three to five, to bring us up even to the minimum standards of our European neighbours, that will be evidence of the Government's good faith and their attitude towards working women and we may not need the new clause. However, we do not expect to hear such an announcement. The Financial Secretary may delight us all, but it is not usual for him to delight the House.

Labour Members see the new clause as a way of increasing the independence of married women and increasing the opportunities of women with children to gain access to employment, which is desirable for the many reasons that have been mentioned, including the need and the desire or right to work.

I echo the sentiments of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central who pointed out that, throughout our debate, attendance on the alliance Benches has been poor. We have with us the Liberals' economic spokesman, the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), and the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who sat with us, on occasions, in Committee. It would be instructive to know where the Liberals stand on this issue. If the Brecon and Radnor by-election had been this Thursday instead of last Thursday, we would have seen a much greater response from Liberal Members trying to show their concern and compassion. We had a full attendance on the alliance Benches earlier, but when we get to serious matters affecting our constituents, particularly those in inner city areas where there is a high proportion of single parent families, no alliance voice is raised in their defence.

Mr. Fatchett: The SDP has not been here at all.

Mr. Lloyd: Perhaps that is because SDP Members have given up on the inner city areas. My constituency is split between two local authorities. One has a poor provision of state nursery places. Not unexpectedly, it is a Conservative authority. People in that part of my constituency need workplace nurseries if they are to have employment opportunities.

I should be happy for us to subsidise nurseries in the way that we subsidise our state schools. Nurseries are important in educational terms. Any parent who has had children at a nursery can see the difference that it makes. Nurseries are not a frivolous provision or a luxury for selfish parents. They are extremely valuable to children as well as being, in many cases, an economic necessity for the parents.

For that reason I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hodge Hill on his new clause. I shall be more than interested to see how many Conservative Members support him in the Division Lobby. I suspect that while we hear plenty of talk from them, they will be noticeably absent from the Lobbies.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Having been thrust into the breach, and as it has been said that although I was present, I had not spoken, I point out that it is right and proper that the House should have the benefit of the alliance's views. I shall recommend my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the new clause.

Dr. McDonald: How many of them?

Mr. Kirkwood: I assure the hon. Lady that my right hon. and hon. Friends will be present for the vote.

I entirely endorse the way in which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) introduced the clause.

There are two issues facing the House. There is the overwhelming social case for workplace nurseries. It has been deployed, and I shall not repeat all the arguments. They centred round the need to develop the position of women in society, especially those with young children. Within that group the plight of single mothers is particularly desperate. I have had constituency experience of that, as other hon. Members will have had. That, combined with the education case, makes it impossible to oppose the new clause.

However, I have reservations about the clause when it is considered from the purely logical taxation point of view. I have listened carefully to the arguments, and to the difficulties to which Conservative Members have referred. I confess that I am worried about extending the principle involved into taxation law. However, if the Government allow some of the other anomalies and tax perks to exist, and if the Inland Revenue does not attack and pursue them vigorously, I do not see why workplace nurseries should be left out of the bag. Until the Government face up to the other worrying anomalies, we should not pass up this opportunity.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether what he is enunciating is a matter of principle or of convenience? I understood him to say that, if the Government pursued other perks vigorously, the workplace provision places should be brought into the tax net.

Mr. Kirkwood: That is exactly what I am saying. [Interruption.] I have a clear idea on the subject. On the basis of the taxation principle — [Interruption.] The House asked me for my views, and while I am now giving those views, I am being criticised on all sides. I cannot win, but we in the alliance are used to being friendless.

The Government should look much more rigorously at some of the other tax perks. The former leader of the Liberal party, my noble Friend Lord Grimond, was keen on that, and made many suggestions about how a Government could eliminate such tax perks.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): Does my hon. Friend agree that it will be sheer humbug if the Financial Secretary tries to persuade the House that his Inland Revenue machine pursues perks rigorously and thoroughly wherever they are found and, therefore, it is important to tax this one, when everybody knows that the substantial use of secretaries, office equipment and so on for personal purposes—sometimes for good purposes—is never tracked down and successfully taxed? In those circumstances, why should the Financial Secretary single out this particular case?

Mr. Kirkwood: My hon. Friend makes the point for me, and much more succinctly.

There are other ways of stimulating and promoting the workplace nursery schemes and provisions, and we should seek to use them. There are probably more effective ways of putting substantial resources into that provision, and we could undoubtedly argue about them. I certainly support Opposition Members. Would the Financial Secretary consider studying the threshold limits, and double or index-link the £8,500 annual income at present laid down? That is only one vehicle that could be used.

On balance, taking a decision on the new clause, I shall recommend my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the new clause. That is a perfectly reasonable position to take.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Will the hon. Gentleman assure us that he is also speaking for his colleagues in the Social Democratic party although most of us accept that the Liberal party has some last vestiges of a social conscience left, we are not so sure about SDP Members.

Mr. Kirkwood: I can do that. The view that we take when the Division bells ring is what matters. I rose only to clarify the position, and it may be that I have not done that. I have sought to explain where we stand on this matter, and we shall certainly support the amendment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It was good to see the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) formulate policy on the wing, not only for the grown-up section, but for the nursery section of the alliance, which has not been represented here today. The fact that he can do that almost by telepathy shows how wonderful policy formulation is in the alliance.

The main interest during the debate has come from watching the party of special pleading on the Conservative Benches. Night after night, this year and in all preceding years, Conservative Members have sat in Committee on the Finance Bill finding every loophole, anomaly and change where there is money to be made, yet they are not prepared to plead on behalf of the special section of society about which we are concerned today. Only one Conservative Member has spoken as the voice of conscience, and all credit to him. All the others have read party briefs, although with a deterioration in style and grammar, because they are on the hard road that must be hoed to reach the dizzy heights of Parliamentary Private Secretary.

Mr. Tim Smith: What?

Mr. Mitchell: Perhaps I should say the hard fields that must be tilled to reach those dizzy heights. Those fields must also be shovelled, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) is good at that. While he shovels, he should consider the small number of people who have come on to the bridge while the ship sinks. It was interesting to see how few people were prepared to join in that scramble.

We have heard no effective arguments against new clause 1, only a series of nit-picking quibbles. For example, one hon. Member suggested that the new clause be widened to include child minders—as if he would vote for it if it did—and another suggested that it should be widened to include nannies, which would guarantee tumultuous votes from Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) said that women should not go out to work. Although the country might be better run if that were true—Derbyshire, South might be better represented—the general proposition is not acceptable to the Opposition. We also heard the quibble about what would happen to mothers who do not get the allowance. Such petty arguments were levelled against a simple and correct principle.

There is an element of special pleading in our argument. There should be universal public nursery provision for all those who want it. The United Kingdom is badly provided for. We lag behind most of the rest of the advanced world. We have already been told that in France and Denmark between 20 and 30 per cent. of two-year-olds get some form of nursery education, and that in Belgium, France and the Netherlands 95 per cent. of four-year-olds get such provision. Only 56 per cent. get it here.

7 pm

The Conservative party cannot have it both ways. Either there should be universal public provision, on which our record is bad, or we should provide incentives such as new clause 1 proposes. Between 15 and 20 per cent. of families are single-parent families. They have special difficulties taking jobs. Therefore, they must be helped by the provision of such workplace nurseries. The proportion of single-parent families in some London boroughs is as high as 30 per cent. What do the Tories want them to do? Depend on benefit? Is it not right that they should stand on their own feet and go out to work? Is it not right that employers should help them in that by providing workplace nurseries? The country needs their skills, and work is better for them socially, psychologically and in every other respect.

It has been argued that only a few people are affected, but inflation has meant that far more people are affected.

[Mr. Mitchell]

Taxation now applies to somebody earning £6,000 a year if the costs of nursery education are added. Those costs are heavy, as workplace nurseries must have skilled staff and good premises — which are often in inner cities and therefore expensive—and be open long hours. The costs of the Kingsway nursery, which started the argument last year, are £345 a month. A person who uses nursery facilities is assessed on the costs as well as on the charge. If those costs are added to a salary of £6,000 it is obvious that many people are taken into tax. The people affected earn less than the average secretarial allowance in London —less than the salary that I hope Conservative Members pay their secretaries.

Provision of workplace nurseries is a matter of social responsibility as it is in line with other aspects of social provision which are not taxed, such as meals, car parks, which represent a substantial benefit in big cities, social and sports clubs and other facilities. Nursery provision differs from them only in so far as it relates to that section of the population which has the disadvantage of being parents, especially single parents. Enlightened employers will want to make nursery provision.

It is better that people should have access to workplace nurseries. They are probably more efficient for the parent than a neighbourhood nursery provided by the local authority, as no extra journeys are involved. Moreover, the parent is on hand in the rare event of problems, and therefore has greater peace of mind. It is not as though we are asking for some ancient provision to be changed. The change came last year with the decision by the Government and the Inland Revenue to make workplace nursery provision taxable. We argued last year where Which? got its information, as it said that for many years the benefit was not taxable. Irrespective of whether that magazine got its information from the Inland Revenue, as it is a popular guide to tax, benefits and allowances, the Revenue must have a responsibility to ensure that misleading information is corrected.

I have not come across a case of people being taxed in this respect before last year. It is Conservative Members who are voting for change. If they oppose new clause 1, they will impose taxation on those who benefit from workplace nurseries. They will be voting against nurseries, care for children and a small, but dependent, section of society which must be helped. They will be voting for male superiority. If new clause 1 is not carried, many nurseries will almost certainly close. People will not pay tax on the benefit because there will be no benefit.

I understand that tax was not collected until April this year and that people have not been coded accordingly until the Revenue finds out what the House decides. The Financial Secretary shakes his head. I shall be interested to hear his reply when he takes off the steel-rimmed glasses through which he has been glaring at us and puts on the mien of a reasonable man explaining reasonable facts to unreasonable people in order to defend an extremely unreasonable stance.

If Conservative Members vote down new clause 1, they will vote for the closure of a comparatively small number of workplace nurseries and unemployment for the people who work in them. If the nurseries remain open, Conservative Members will have voted for a substantial tax bill for those who benefit from them. All that retrograde voting will be in the interest of being loyal to the whim of a Chancellor who clearly, after the last by-election, is temporary.

Mr. Moore: We have had a relatively lengthy but most enjoyable debate because it has been held at a rational hour. I am sure that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) and I and all hon. Members who have participated in the debate will have preferred the time at which the debate has been held this year, remembering that last year the debate was held as the dawn came up.

Let me first answer the question of the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett). Last year I mentioned that the theoretical potential costs involved were about £1 million. Although it is not an insignificant sum to the people involved, it is relatively minor. That is not the point at issue, and I entirely accept the hon. Gentleman's point.

I think that few issues have been clouded with such legitimate argument by those who honourably argue for the benefit of those intelligent employers who seek to offer employee nurseries, and argue in favour of social provision and the relative role of women in society. I see that as a clear set of arguments. I suggest that they have confused that very legitimate set of social goals with the question of the taxability of benefit, which is a very different question.

We have now had for a year or more, to put it no more strongly, the somewhat immoderate comments not of hon. Members but of certain sections of the press which cannot always get the facts right. Facts and principle are important, and I shall try to put the facts and principle on the record.

I thank particularly my hon. Friends the Members for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), for Slough (Mr. Watts), for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). If I may do so without being rude, I distinguish the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham. He said in two minutes what I am afraid I shall take considerably longer to say. Because I have some respect for and enjoy the company of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood)—I know that he is a reasonable, rational man—I hope that he will hold back a little before committing himself and the alliance to the way in which they will vote until he has had the benefit of hearing what I have to say. I am delighted to observe that the hon. Gentleman nods, so there is a chance that rational man will win over what I might call practical man.

It is essential in this issue to start by trying to get back to principle. I thought that there had been a degree of understanding across the Chamber over generations about the nature of employer abuse that occurred in previous centuries and into this century. My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton referred to the Truck Acts and to the way in which employers in the past had abused employees. I thought that there had been a historical debate which joined most responsible Members of Parliament. There was an attitude demonstrated by most hon. Members towards the nature of the principle by which choice should be given to individuals in the spending of their cash so that they were not trapped into the nature of the employment in a paternalistic fashion.

I respected the opening speech of the hon. Member for Hodge Hill, who argued the case reasonably. I shall try similarly to argue my case. I think that both sides of the House shared the distaste for what might be called concealed remuneration, especially when this could be controlled by directors. I thought that there had been a historical acceptance by all parties that pay was preferable and that therefore in equity any benefits paid must bear tax as remuneration. I use not the word "perk", but the phrase "overall remuneration". I accept the point made in that regard by the hon. Member for Leeds, Central.

7.15 pm

I should not be reminding the Opposition of some of the great figures of Labour history, but the problem before 1948—there have been constant references to the 1948 statute, which is the fount of much of this discussion—was that it was very difficult to codify in the statute the attempt to carry those principles into practice. I take the Budget speech of that late great Socialist, Sir Stafford Cripps. I use my first quote to explain why Sir Stafford Cripps argued as he did in the economic statement:

"Under the existing law, it falls upon the Inland Revenue authorities to prove that the payments are not necessary business expenses, and because of the difficulty of substantiating the case it often happens that these payments go untaxed. The majority opinion in industry condemns this practice".

He was then proposing the introduction of the 1948 statute which concerned much that is being debated tonight. He continued:

"It is perfectly legitimate, of course, to deduct by way of expenses, a reasonable expenditure . . . but this right has been noticeably abused by extension to cover the ordinary living expenses of many persons, who are either directors or employees of the companies. This must be brought to an end."

I shall give some more updated examples of the Socialist principle. He went on to say:

"there can be no doubt that many individuals are circumventing the law . . . I propose, therefore, with immediate effect, that all expenses allowances given to directors and others, and all disbursements for their benefit shall be assessed".—[Official Report, 6 April 1948; Vol. 449, c. 70.]

It is important for us to understand the basis of the debate. In fact, there are two debates—a tax debate and a social debate. I have also all the references to Glenvil Hall, the then Financial Secretary, who seemed to carry much of the burden for Sir Stafford Cripps in Committee. Socialist adherence to these principles had not changed. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), a former Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who had to carry the burden of the 1976 issue, confirmed in Committee time and again essentially what I have to say. I accept that he was under pressure from the Conservatives at the time. He carried the principal arguments further forward. In discussions on the Finance Bill 1976, referring to some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, he said:

"ideally all benefits in kind should be taxable . . . in equity all benefits should be taxed together with income. No one had much of a good word for fringe benefits."

Referring to the Conservative party, then in opposition, he continued:

"the Opposition dislike fringe benefits and are prepared to do nothing about them because of the obvious problems, but the Government face those problems and have introduced this legislation which it is my job to defend and explain."

He said later:

"the incidence of fringe benefits has been increasing in Britain over the past 20 years, or perhaps more, and the time has clearly come when fringe benefits need to be taxed in the same way as other emoluments."

I have many other similar quotes of what he said, correctly, in my judgment, as the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in those debates, which I have read with great admiration. He also said:

"We believe that benefits in kind are part of the emoluments of a person. The Opposition and the Government share that view; the difference is that we have decided to do something about it."—[Official Report, 17 May 1976; Vol. 911, c. 1100-5.]

I am not in any way concealing the nature of the criticism that he was addressing to the Conservative party, which was then in opposition. However, he argued rightly about the principle.

Some may say and, indeed, have said — not necessarily tonight but in the past year—that it was never intended to cover this or that benefit. There was no universality about it. They were wrong then in their comments, they were wrong in relation to the debate in 1948 and they were wrong in 1976 with two exceptions on which I shall comment later. The definition was all-embracing then and continued to be confirmed in detailed debates in 1976.

On 15 July 1976 our late right hon. Friend Graham Page, a great man and a man of great courage and consistency of purpose, asked almost the questions we have been asking tonight of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. He referred to clause 56(2) of the Finance Bill which defined what was meant by benefits. He said:

"The benefits to which this section applies are living or other accommodation, entertainment, domestic or other services."

He then said:

"Then follow the words 'and other benefits and facilities of whatsoever nature'."

He then asked the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne:

"Perhaps the Financial Secretary will tell the House what benefits will be included in the wide phrase 'other benefits and facilities of whatsoever nature'."

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said—I could not have said it better—in words that I am sure were given to him and that he no doubt supported:

"It is not possible to categorise all the various kinds of benefits. That is why the words were used in the 1948 Act. They seem, at least in the limited way that that legislation provided, to have given the possibility of taxing the use of these benefits. It is only right that we should use those same useful words in the current legislation".

I am trying to take us back to the universality of the principle that was applied. Having reminded hon. Members of that, I can perhaps try to explain how the Revenue — it is relevant to this point, as all hon. Members who have had responsibility in office in the Treasury are aware — was to assess the value to the recipient of the non-cash emolument and why.

The basis for the taxable benefit was established in the Finance Act 1948 as

"the cost to the employer of providing them."

That point was confirmed by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne in the debate on 15 July 1976 when he said:

"The basis of the assessment of the benefit is the cost to the company."—[Official Report, 15 July 1976; Vol. 915, c. 1016-30.]

Why is that? Clearly, first, because the cost to the employer is equivalent to the extra cash remuneration the employer would otherwise pay. That ensures that payments in cash and kind are taxed equally. Secondly, it ensured that different benefits were taxed fairly in comparison with one another. Thirdly, to tax benefits at less than cost would mean treating payment in kind more favourably than payments in cash. Fourthly, taxing on employer cost provides an objective test of value, removing the need for subjective judgments in that difficult benefit area.

[Mr. Moore]

I have tried to cover the principle, the coverage and the base upon which the costs are assessed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Is not the problem in taking the cost to the employer that there could be two sets of circumstances—the provision of nursery places for a large number of employees and the provision of nursery places for a small number of employees? The cost to the employer might vary depending upon the number of employees and the degree of service but the value to the employee does not change.

Mr. Moore: I accept that there is no perfect solution. In the Finance Act 1948 the attempt to assess the benefit on the basis of employer cost is not perfect. Hon. Members have said that, and I shall return to the point later when I deal with car benefits. There is a difficulty, but the method that I have described at least removes the subjectivity of the relative benefit. We have heard a great deal during the debate about the practice of assessing benefit. The method of assessment has led to much of the misunderstanding about the comprehensive nature of benefit taxation. I shall cover briefly the only main statutory exceptions to which reference has been made, to ensure that we get the point on the record. The exceptions are company canteens, luncheon vouchers and coal miners' coal and its cash equivalent.

Canteens were included in the Finance Act 1948. I think that we discussed in the early hours last year the reasons for that. They related to the food shortages at the time. The luncheon voucher concession flowed from that. That matter was decided in 1949 and published in 1954. The coal miners' coal concession was extended to cover the cash equivalent in 1944. I do not have to explain why at that time coal miners were persuaded not to take coal. It was extended as a published extra-statutory concession to the higher paid, especially, by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne in 1975. I recognise that both exceptions are anomalies within the statute, but they have been continued by successive Governments.

I shall consider the practical applications of the 1948 statute which, after considering the matter for a year or more, I think confuse people into believing that there are many other exceptions, while any thorough analysis—I accept that it is difficult to make a thorough analysis of the issue—shows that the principles and the concept were clearly established in 1948. This has been a useful debate in that context.

Four matters have added to the confusion. The first is the effective working of the de minimis rule. As my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton said, the assessable value of the benefit is usually de minimis. Examples of the practical working of the de minimis rule are employer-subsidised sport facilities and social clubs. There is no question but that they are taxable. Where they are not de minimis—as with an easily identifiable sports facility benefit such as membership of a golf club—a tax charge is clearly sought. Car parking places also come into that category.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton, correctly, took some time to explain that the difficulty was not the concept of taxing; it was the identification of cost. Special rules were therefore devised. Under those rules, the assessable value of a car parking space on the employer's land is taken to be its gross rateable value. Clearly that often turns out to be de minimis to the recipient, but it does not have to be. When a parking space is rented, the matter is straightforward, and the normal rules apply.

The second point—this issue has been raised only once tonight but was debated at considerable length last year—upon which some people confuse the problem of benefits is what I might call office facilities—paper, desks and even air conditioning. Those matters are excluded in so far as they are covered by section 62(3) of the Finance Act 1976, which exempts

"Accommodation, supplies or services used by the employees solely in performing the duties of employment."

I do not have to go into the parallel that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton drew between that and subsidised nurseries.

The third matter, which has created even more confusion—I think one or two of my hon. Friends may have fallen into a slight trap—is car flat rates. Those people who seek what they call a similar flat rate charge for employer-subsidised nurseries are confused. The problem, which was identified by the previous Labour Government, before 1977-78 was caused by the difficulty of charging for private usage by the then method of apportioning cost between business and private mileage, often on the basis of unverifiable mileage records. The Government sought to introduce scale charges. The concept of a full tax charge of 100 per cent. of the availability of the car for private usage is the aim. The Government decided to delay its introduction — I understand this fully—because of the problems of the car industry. However, the concept of scale charges was introduced to overcome the problem of identification. It was an intelligent and sensible administrative method.

The aim of the Labour Government was and of this Government is eventually to charge, in an administratively effective way, 100 per cent. of the private benefit. It would therefore seem pointless for my hon. Friends to seek to pursue that route for employer-subsidised nurseries, as it would merely achieve their present tax position.

The final practical feature of the charging mechanism for assessing the taxability of the benefit which has added to people's confusion is the £8,500 threshold. As a result of this limit many people have become liable to tax and this has caused anxiety to many hon. Members, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South, who asked if that limit was out of date. I remind the House that the previous Financial Secretary to the Treasury, my right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for Transport, clarified the Government's position on this in a parliamentary question in July 1983. He said:

"The earnings threshold has become an anomaly. The previous Chancellor considered abolishing it because the same and correct treatment of benefits in kind will apply to all taxpayers. That should be our long-term aim". — [Official Report, 7 July 1983; Vol. 45, c. 392.]

It is clear that the threshold is an anomaly because some people who receive benefits are not taxed on them. Tax treatment should not depend on a person's remuneration, but it has been immeasurably difficult to abolish.

7.30 pm

It would seem that Governments have decided that sudden change is never right, but if we accept that it is anomaly, it is clearly right not to raise the threshold and thus perpetuate the anomaly. The practical implications of that decision become clear in debates of this kind when many people who were not affected by the 1948 and 1976 legislation now have to come to terms with it.

Before considering workplace nurseries, which are the essential issue in the debate, it is important to stress the principles involved. In the four areas that I have already mentioned—the working of the de minimis rules, the implications of the "solely for employment" rules, the use of the car flat rate scale and the practical impact of an unchanging threshold — the basic principles are unchanged. Those principles were well expressed by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) who, as the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, said to a Committee of the whole House:

"We believe that benefits in kind are part of the emoluments of a person. The Opposition and the Government share that view".—[Official Report, 17 May 1976; Vol. 911, c. 1105.]

I see no reason to change that fundamental acceptance of the principle that he enunciated so clearly.

I shall now deal with the taxability of the benefit of a workplace nursery in the context of that principle. I stress to the hon. Members for Barking (Ms. Richardson), for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) and for Hodge Hill that I am not debating the value of a workplace nursery. All hon. Members are conscious of the need for employers who offer equal opportunities to provide those facilities. We are discussing the taxability of that benefit.

In giving a brief history of the issue I do not want to deal with it in the same detail as I did last year or to refute the comments already made. Suffice it to say that the benefits have been taxable since 1948, and the title of new clause 4 suggests that that is now accepted. However, there was considerable confusion. Some employers may have genuinely believed that the benefit was not taxable while others had paid tax on it. The Inland Revenue launched a special exercise in its tax offices to establish the facts. It was obvious that in many cases the benefit had not been reported to the Inland Revenue either by employers who provided it or by employees who received it. In the special circumstances, because of the confusion and because hardship would be caused by demanding payment for back years, the Inland Revenue decided not to collect tax for the period before 6 April 1985 and that tax already collected would be repaid. Indeed, I recorded that decision in a parliamentary answer earlier this year.

That is a brief history of the benefit as it affects the individuals involved, up to the beginning of this year. My explanations of the taxability of this benefit make it clear why we should not accept a new clause which seeks further to discriminate in favour of an already advantaged—I do not say privileged — minority in this area of employee benefits.

Mr. Shersby: Is there any difference in treatment for tax as between a woman who places her child in a local authority nursery and a woman who places her child in a workplace nursery?

Mr. Moore: There is no taxability on the benefits of a local authority nursery when places are extended to all members of the community. The taxability applies only where it is an employer-provided benefit.

I concur with my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon South that we should contrast the position of the people whom the new clause seeks to advantage with that of the majority of working mothers and mothers who may wish to work. I thought that the debate was supposed to be about mothers who wanted to work, but the new clause seeks to advantage the few who are already in work and whose employer, unusually, provides a workplace nursery. That involves about 2,000 mothers who, if they were taxed on the £2,500 theoretical value at a basic rate of 30 per cent., would be receiving an additional benefit of £1,750 after tax. The position of that tiny group, whom the new clause seeks to benefit, must be contrasted with that of the majority—the 2·2 million mothers with children under five, of whom 600,000 are working mothers. If the benefit were offered not just to the 2,000 who already have a modicum of advantage in their workplace activities but to all those who have the potential to seek work—the 2·2 million mothers — and if relief were given at child minder rates of £30 per week, rather than the full creche cost, the cost would be £1·3 billion.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Stop exaggerating.

Mr. Moore: Reliefs and benefits should have significance for all, not just for the few, although it may be hard for inegalitarian Socialists to understand the truth of real opportunity for all. If the same relief were offered to the 600,000 mothers at work—[Interruption.] It is a compliment to my argument that the Opposition are trying to drown it with infantile barracking. If the 600,000 working mothers with children under five were offered the same benefit, the cost would be £300 million, and if one had any kind of social conscience one would have to make that offer. I know that the hon. Member for Leeds, Central, who was intelligent and rational in his argument, would want to make that contrast, because he would not want to isolate a particular group for relief.

Ignoring the inequity of not offering similar relief to those not fortunate enough to have a creche at their place of employment and the socially divisive nature of the proposal, proponents of the new clause argue that it is the tax charge that is inhibiting the development of employer-subsidised nurseries. But the key problem must still be the cost to the employer. We have heard that the cost may reach more than £4,000 per nursery place. Even at an average cost of £2,500 per place, it is not surprising that employers, however well-intentioned, find it a daunting prospect.

We are discussing not workplace nurseries and their role in our working environment, but the new assumption by the Opposition that we must use the tax system to encourage private provision for certain social needs. I find it fascinating that they should have turned their backs on their previous belief in the need for the state to provide. But more important, I wonder whether they have thought through the dilemma that they would open up if they went down that route, of which my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham started to remind us. Once they break fundamentally with the concept of the 1948 legislation, what other social provisions can be legitimately pressed via tax reliefs through the private sector? I know that many of my hon. Friends would be pressing quickly and legitimately for private medical insurance, private education and many other similar services.

Here we have a classic lesson for the Opposition. For what I know are the best of motives, they have a legitimate desire to support employers who provide nursery facilities, but they slipped into a position that can only be described as elitist. Having failed to think through the implications of their position on the issue, the Opposition, in their new clause, would, first, deny their past principled position on the issues surrounding perks and pay; secondly, they would argue for tax relief for the private provision of a benefit; and, thirdly, they would pursue the advantage of a tiny minority while ignoring the interests of the vast majority. The purpose of the clause is clear—to place the few in a position of further advantage through our taxation system at the cost, no matter how small, of the majority. I urge the House to reject that inegalitarian proposal.

[Mr. Moore]

Mr. Terry Davis: As the Financial Secretary said, we have had a most interesting debate, in which we have ranged from the practical aspects of the proposal to the more philosophical aspects of fiscal policy.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) delivered his usual pinprick when he complained that the Opposition had not chosen unemployment for a debate in prime time. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that we tabled a new clause that referred specifically to unemployment, and would have been a peg for a debate on that issue. However, it was not selected because it was not in order on the Finance Bill. A debate on workplace nurseries is in order. I must tell the hon. Gentleman that it is also a debate on unemployment.

As my hon. Friends and I have constantly reminded the House, we are discussing whether people, mainly women and particularly single parents, are encouraged to work or discouraged from working so that they go back to social security benefits. The hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) echoed the views of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield. I found their attitude distasteful. They displayed a contempt for women and ignorance of the difficulties experienced by working women, and that was a revelation to Opposition Members. That attitude is totally different from that of the Financial Secretary. At least he made it clear that he thought that workplace nurseries should be encouraged. He was at pains to distance himself from the views of his Back Benchers.

My hon. Friends the Members for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) put their fingers right on the point when they said that the debate has shown to a marked degree the difference in attitude between the Labour party and the Conservative party towards women and their role in society. But, to be fair, some Conservative Back Benchers expressed views similar to Opposition Members' views. The hon. Members for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) and for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) made it clear that they opposed the tax as much as did Labour Members.

The hon. Member for Nuneaton put it well when he said that workplace nurseries give women a choice of whether to work or not. Although I prefer the Labour party approach of exempting workplace nurseries from tax, we would have supported his new clause on the basis that a half loaf is better than nothing at all. I hope that he will support us in the Lobby, as his new clause was out of order. Conservatives who agree about the inequity of taxing workplace nurseries must choose between the Government's attitude and the Opposition's views.

The Financial Secretary wants to distinguish between encouraging a socially desirable provision and taxing the benefit. I make it absolutely clear that the Labour party would much prefer nurseries to be provided by local authorities. That is our ultimate aim. In the meantime we shall deal with the world as it is. We are not afraid to abolish the tax that has been introduced as a recent change in practice, in an attempt to encourage employers and to support women and parents who, in order to be able to work, need workplace nurseries for their children. The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg)——

Mr. Eggar: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Shersby: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

7.45 pm

Mr. Davis: Neither hon. Member has sat through the debate as I have done, so I shall not give way.

The hon. Member for Grantham said that it was not consistent with present tax law to exempt workplace nurseries, because the provision of those nurseries is not necessary to enable people to work. That was a fair point. However, it is a specific exemption in tax law to exempt workplace canteens, and they are not necessary to enable people to work. Many employers do not provide office or factory canteens, but those benefits are specifically exempt. We are seeking to add another exemption.

The Financial Secretary referred to the Truck Acts, saying that cash is a better form of remuneration than benefits or payment in kind. I agree with him on that principle. However, workplace nurseries are not a form of remuneration. They facilitate people obtaining remuneration because they enable many people to work who otherwise could not do so. They are also a cheaper way of providing that facility than paying everyone a larger sum to enable those who have children to pay child minders.

The Financial Secretary expressed the distaste of us all for the Truck Acts and such payments. His historical researches have extended back to 1948. I do not dissent from his quotation from the late Sir Stafford Cripps, nor do I dissent from the quotation from my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), but the hon. Gentleman might have had the courage to tell the House that, when my right hon. Friend expressed those views, the Conservative party voted against them. We know that it voted against them in 1976 because Conservative Members were arguing for tax-free perks for the well off. Workplace nurseries are not perks. They are not a fringe benefit any more than any other provision by an employer to enable an employee to work. We see a workplace nursery as being on all fours with a workplace canteen. We see it as an office facility in the way that it was defined by the Financial Secretary.

We believe that workplace nurseries are important for children, as my hon. Friends the Members for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) and for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) told the House. They are as important for children as for mothers. When Conservative Members accuse us of setting one mother against another, they are really short of arguments. When they talk about employees who do not have access to workplace nurseries and similar facilities, and argue that there would need to be relief for child minding fees, let me remind them and the Financial Secretary that people who take their children to workplace nurseries are, as a general rule, and in every case that I have examined, paying for those facilities. It is not a free provision by the employer; people make a contribution to the costs of a workplace nursery. Out of their income, after tax, they are paying as much as others are paying for child minders.

The point is that a workplace nursery is a better provision than a child minder. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) said that there had been no change in practice, and referred to a speech by the Financial Secretary a year ago. He was less than specific about which passage in the Financial Secretary's speech dealt with that point. I must tell the hon. Gentleman that an assertion is not an argument. His argument was weakened by his statement that that tax has not been collected because it has not been drawn to the attention of the Inland Revenue. I remind him that the Inland Revenue is giving the advice that the provision of workplace nurseries is not a taxable benefit. The Financial Secretary said that there was confusion. It was the advice of the Inland Revenue that caused that confusion. As my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, the Government admitted that, by agreeing to cancel demands for back tax.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) said that it has been the policy of successive Governments to tax any perk. He was as wrong about that as about the details that he gave on the taxation of company cars.

It is not, and never has been, a policy of the Labour party to tax canteens. It will not be a policy of the Labour party to tax workplace nurseries. When the hon. Members for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) and for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) press the Financial Secretary to raise the threshold from £8,500, they are on a loser. The Financial Secretary made it clear tonight that the Government's policy is to abolish the threshold, not to raise it. That will mean that even more people on even lower wages will be taxed. Some Conservative Members say that the provision benefits a privileged elite who enjoy £4,000 a year benefit. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) gave an example of sloppy accounting, because he had not listened to the fact that people who send their children to workplace nurseries make a contribution. The benefit is not £4,000, because their contribution must be deducted.

Mr. Tim Smith: Would the Labour party wish the £8,500 limit to increase or to wither on the vine?

Mr. Davis: We shall certainly examine that matter, but in the meantime we would leave it where it is. The limit was introduced by a Labour Government and we would certainly not raise the threshold. I cannot tell the House whether we would go as far as the Financial Secretary and abolish it, but it is a fair point and one which we shall discuss in next year's Finance Bill. However, I shall not be diverted from the point.

The Financial Secretary admits, unlike some of his hon. Friends, that the result of the Government's attitude is that parents with children at workplace nurseries are required to pay, on average, £750 a year to the Inland Revenue. They are asked to pay £15 a week out of their income after tax. Conservative Members call them an elite minority, but they are cleaners, domestic workers, secretaries, carpenters and labourers, as well as nurses and health visitors. Yet the Conservative party calls them an elite minority and the privileged few.

The introduction of the tax will mean that workplace nurseries will become a benefit enjoyed only by the elite because they will be the only people who could afford to pay the tax and keep their children at workplace nurseries.

Under pressure, the Financial Secretary told us that the new clause would cost only £1 million. He fairly described that as relatively minor. In Standing Committee, we were told that the Government had given away £5 million as a result of the abolition of stamp duty on gifts between living people. They described that as a low yield. When they introduced a clause which gave away £2 million to oil companies, they described that as a slight amount. When they increased the limit on business entertaining expenses, which would cost less than £1 million, they called it a modest step and a negligible amount.

The Labour party is asking tonight for a modest step and a negligible amount that will benefit 2,000 people. How many people will benefit from the abolition of development land tax, costing £50 million? I should be surprised if that benefited 2,000 people. Thanks to the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), we have a list of 209 extra concessions costing between £60 million and £100 million, which will benefit only a few people.

The Financial Secretary took some time to explain the philosophical reasoning behind his opposition to the new clause. The difference between us is that he is bound hand and foot by fiscal doctrine. Indeed, he elevates doctrine to the level of dogma. The Labour party is prepared to distinguish between the perks of the wealthy and benefits to those who have the greatest difficulty in making ends meet. This is not, as the Financial Secretary claims, a new clause which supports employers. It supports employees. I promise the Financial Secretary that, whatever happens in the Division Lobby tonight, this campaign will continue. We will continue until either the Government see sense or we replace them with a Government who care for parents and children.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:

The House divided: Ayes 188, Noes 251.

Division No. 265] [7.54 pm

AYES

Abse, Leo	Clarke, Thomas
Alton, David	Clay, Robert
Ashdown, Paddy	Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Ashton, Joe	Cohen, Harry
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)	Coleman, Donald
Bagier, Gordon A. T.	Concannon, Rt Hon J. D.
Baldry, Tony	Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Barnett, Guy	Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Barron, Kevin	Corbett, Robin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret	Corbyn, Jeremy
Beith, A. J.	Cowans, Harry
Bell, Stuart	Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Benn, Tony	Craigen, J. M.
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)	Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Bermingham, Gerald	Deakins, Eric
Bidwell, Sydney	Dewar, Donald
Blair, Anthony	Dixon, Donald
Boothroyd, Miss Betty	Dobson, Frank
Boyes, Roland	Dormand, Jack
Bray, Dr Jeremy	Dubs, Alfred
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)	Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)	Eadie, Alex
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)	Eastham, Ken
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)	Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Brown, Ron (E'burgh, Leith)	Ellis, Raymond
Bruce, Malcolm	Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Buchan, Norman	Ewing, Harry
Caborn, Richard	Fatchett, Derek
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)	Faulds, Andrew
Campbell-Savours, Dale	Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Carlile, Alexander (Montg'y)	Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Carter-Jones, Lewis	Fisher, Mark
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)	Flannery, Martin

Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Gourlay, Harry
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hamilton, W. W. (Central Fife)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Haynes, Frank
Healey, Rt Hon Denis
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Janner, Hon Greville
John, Brynmor
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Livsey, Richard
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McKelvey, William
MacKenzie, Rt Hon Gregor
Maclennan, Robert
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Martin, Michael
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Owen, Rt Hon Dr David
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Penhaligon, David
Pike, Peter
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Powell, Raymond (Ogmo[illegible])
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Ross, Wm. (Londonderry)
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Short, Mrs R.(W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C.(Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Smyth, Rev W. M. (Belfast S)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Stewart, Rt Hon D. (W Isles)
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wainwright, R.
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
White, James
Wilson, Gordon
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Wrigglesworth, Ian
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe and
Mr. Sean Hughes.

NOES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Amery, Rt Hon Julian
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Boyson, Dr Rhodes
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Dykes, Hugh
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Gilmour, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Gorst, John
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Grist, Ian
Gummer, John Selwyn
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hill, James
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Howard, Michael
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lord, Michael
Luce, Richard
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McNair-Wilson, P. (New F'st)
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Mariand, Paul
Marlow, Antony
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Mates, Michael
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Miscampbell, Norman
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Patten, Christopher (Bath)
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Prentice, Rt Hon Reg
Price, Sir David
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rathbone, Tim
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm

Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Speed, Keith
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trotter, Neville
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Waller, Gary
Walters, Dennis
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)
Younger, Rt Hon George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones and
Mr. Archie Hamilton.

Question accordingly negatived.

New Clause 2

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES

'(1) In so far as the profits of a registered friendly society or separately registered branch society from life or endowment business relate to contracts made after the date of coming into force of this Act, the reference in subsection (2) of section 332 of the Taxes Act (business exempt from income tax and corporation tax) shall have effect as if the words "for societies or branches with aggregate annual premium income of £120,000 or more, and £2,400 and £500 respectively for societies or branches with aggregate annual premium income below £120,000" were inserted after "£156", and as if in subsection (3) of the said section 332 the words "£2,400 and £500" were inserted after "£156".

(2) In section 64 of the Friendly Societies Act 1974 (as amended by section 39 above) in paragraph (a) for "£750" there shall be substituted "£2,400" and in paragraph (b) for "£156" there shall be substituted "£500".'.—[Dr. McDonald.]

Brought up and read the First time.

Dr. McDonald: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause seeks to increase the limits for tax-exempt business for small friendly societies from £750 to £2,400 for the sum assured and from £156 per annum to £500 per annum for annuities. This applies only to the small friendly societies — the pre-1966 societies. We understand why the Government want to deal in a different way with the post-1966 societies. It was necessary to change the limit in that case to prevent abuse.

The Government's treatment of the small friendly societies needs explanation. The Economic Secretary has spoken about this matter in Committee and in correspondence with the liaison committee of the friendly societies. It is clear that he still has not grasped the nature of these friendly societies. They are essentially local social organisations transacting insurance on an amateur do-it-yourself basis. Even the existence of such an amateur approach to insurance obviously frightens the Economic Secretary, judging by what he said in Committee. In spite of the fact that these friendly societies operate on a voluntary basis, they have been doing so to the satisfaction of their members for a long time. They do not operate on a commercial scale and have no marketing organisation competing for business. They do not advertise — their names do not appear on television or in magazines and newspapers.

The friendly societies developed to provide working class people, especially in the pre-welfare state days, with a means of providing themselves with sickness, unemployment, death or widows' benefits and of paying for funerals and preventing people from having to face a pauper's grave. Yet their existence, even in the welfare state, is still necessary. Perhaps they have become more necessary during the past few years as the welfare state has been nibbled away by the Government. Their books are kept by a part-time secretary who is not an insurance expert and there are no funds to buy commmercial expertise. The additional book-keeping necessary if such societies were to enter the taxable sector and the complexities of tax computations for mutual assurance funds would be way beyond the knowledge and competence of most secretaries of the societies.

The Economic Secretary has admitted that the direct cost to the Revenue of tax exemption for existing small societies is probably not large. He might like to put a figure on that, but it is probably only a few thousand pounds in a financial year. Now that my hon. Friends and I are coming to the end of yet another Finance Bill, we are only too well aware of the way in which the odd £1 million or £5 million is given away in tax concessions and tax relief to those who do not need it. We are asking for a small concession to friendly societies, composed as they largely are of working-class people, on a self-help basis.

On the scale on which the societies operate, it is not possible to be economic in any commercial sense, because members are performing services for the societies voluntarily. If further evidence were needed that it is not practical for small societies to enter the taxable sector, between 1966 and 1975, and since 1984, that option has been open to them and the tax-exempt limits have become increasingly onerous in real terms, but no branch society and hardly any small centralised society has felt able to enter that area.

The Economic Secretary says constantly that if the friendly societies are to survive they should do that, but they are not in a position to do so. Their membership does not want them to do so. They prefer to operate in their own way and it is such a small sector that I think that the Economic Secretary should reconsider the views that he has expressed in the past and allow them to continue in existence. It is true that they may gradually fade away but there is no need for the Economic Secretary to hasten their demise.

The Opposition have selected a limit of £2,400. This, as the Economic Secretary knows, is the present limit for trade unions. The limit was the same for both societies and the unions until 1982. In real terms, the post-war limit of £500 would now be some £5,000, which makes the proposal that we have tabled a very modest one. Of course, we have in mind the limit of £2,000 which applied to those societies until Budget day in 1984. That limit was introduced by the Government in 1980 when they doubled the limit from £1,000 to £2,000. Apart from anything else, I think that the friendly societies are confused about the treatment that they have received from the Government over the whole period of their office. At one stage the limit was raised and now it has been drastically reduced. It has been reduced to such an extent that it makes it virtually impossible for the societies to continue in the way in which they have for so many years.

[Dr. McDonald]

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Might it be that some of the large insurance companies which contribute substantially to Conservative party funds have been putting pressure on the Government?

Dr. McDonald: I certainly think that that is a possibility. We should bear in mind the Government's behaviour towards insurance societies. To take another example of that, the proposed abolition of SERPS will put enormous amounts of business in the way of the life assurance companies. If they are putting pressure on the Government to eliminate the friendly societies, that is greedy. Some estimates put future business by 1990 arising from the phasing out of SERPS at £3 billion. If, with that bonanza to come — should the Government stay in office after the next general election — the insurance companies are still worried about the friendly societies, their greed is obviously beyond all bounds.

8.15 pm

We propose a limit of £120,000 per annum for the total contribution income for societies that are allowed to operate higher limits. That is 50 times the sum assured limit. Societies with that level of total contribution income should have a full-time employed secretary who is familiar with taxation and properly trained. The friendly societies are asking that they should no longer have to depend on entirely voluntary assistance. They would like to be able to employ at least one full-time secretary as that would enable them to provide a better service for their members.

The new clause follows the approach of the EEC's life assurance directive, which will presumably become applicable in all member states at some time in future. The EEC like the Government and the rest of us, wants to ensure that commercial insurers, including friendly societies of any size, have adequate solvency margins. However, the EEC was more sensitive and sensible than the Government in introducing a directive. It did not want to put small friendly societies out of existence by requiring impossible margins. It has laid down a margin of £300,000. It would be a good thing if the Government were to consider such friendly societies in the same way as the EEC. As the Economic Secretary and other hon. Members know, it is not often that I have a good word to say for the EEC. On this occasion it seems to be justified to speak favourably of it.

It is odd that it should be the EEC that is more considerate than the Government when friendly societies have for more than 100 years been part of our working-class tradition. The Government are trampling over all of that.

I wish to emphasise the Government's failure to understand what friendly societies are like by referring to one or two extracts from a letter from the Independent Order of Oddfellows Manchester Unity Friendly Society. The letter was sent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in February. I think that it sets out the ethos of the societies. Part of the letter reads:

> "Successive governments have realised that well organised branches of Order Friendly Societies operate for the good of the community as a whole, combining a variety of provident operations with a sense of social duty which is unique. It adds to the country's social security structure a background of caring organisations, for the sick and dying, the widow the orphan and the distressed, which the social security constitution by its very nature finds it difficult to emulate".

The letter continues:

> "thrift is a virtue to be encouraged among what used to be called the artisan and working class in particular, and appreciating our apolitical work have understood that caring activities and encouragement of thrift in extremely difficult circumstances need practical financial encouragement which developed with certain tax privileges."

Another paragraph reads:

> "We find it difficult to understand why this government with its commitment to thrift and appeals to the nation to become a caring society should deal such a harsh blow to those who work voluntarily for the good of their fellow men in this field."

Some of the words that I have quoted from this letter might well fall from the lips of the Prime Minister as she encourages thrift and voluntary self-help in our society. In particular, she would like those virtues to be encouraged among the artisan and working classes. Although the Prime Minister would like such virtues to be encouraged, she makes sure that in every possible way her Government do nothing to encourage those who attempt to practise them in the way that they have always been practised in the organisations and societies to which they and their predecessors have belonged for such a long period.

I compare this with the reply of the Economic Secretary to the secretary of the friendly societies liaison committee in a letter dated 29 May 1985. Given the way in which the Manchester Unity Friendly Society describes itself and given all that I have already said, although the Economic Secretary says that he understands the point of view of friendly societies, he simply has not got a clue. First, he kowtows in their direction and then he refers to the need to preserve tax neutrality. Tax neutrality and fiscal neutrality in investment matters are something of a joke. In his 1985 Budget the Chancellor of the Exchequer ran scared from taxing pensions and from taxing contributions paid by both the employer and the employee. He wanted to do that because he believes in fiscal neutrality, but he did not have the courage to do so. Therefore it is nonsense to defend the treatment of friendly societies in this way.

The Economic Secretary also said in his letter that the proposal would create a dividing line between societies. Yes, it would. The Opposition appreciate that point. We are anxious to ensure that a dividing line of that kind would not be open to abuse, but when the European Community's life directive eventually applies, the Government will have to do this. Therefore they ought to accept that implication now and allow the friendly societies to flourish.

Finally, the Economic Secretary says that, if the tax regime we are asking for came into existence, these small organisations would have > "an investment product to market to the general public which was unique in its tax advantages."

There is no way in which friendly societies could market such a product. They are not in that kind of business. They are more or less democratically organised societies which act in a way that mutually benefits their members and provides them with insurance and various other benefits that are not covered by this measure. The societies are small and limited in their scope. They do not provide the high salesmanship that is required to market the kind of attractive investment product which the Economic Secretary thinks exists; nor are they in a position to compete with the large and well-financed companies that already operate in this market.

Despite his sympathetic noises, the Economic Secretary shows time and again that he does not understand the nature of friendly societies. We are asking for no more than a small concession that would allow them to continue to look after their working-class membership in the way that they have looked after them for many years.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) has most exhaustively presented the case for this new clause, and I rise briefly to support it. The hon. Lady has marshalled a powerful argument both for the organisations and for the proposals contained in it. They are excellent social and financial organisations that for decades have provided a tremendous service to communities in many parts of the country—certainly in the northern region which I know best. My parents were members of friendly societies, as, indeed, were all the members of our family. It would have been inconceivable for us not to have participated in the local friendly society, as many others still do.

The hon. Member for Thurrock said that she could foresee the day when friendly societies might die out. Because of the services provided by the welfare state, the demand for some of their services may no longer be so relevant, but many friendly societies still thrive and provide services for their members in a wholly correct and laudable way. Therefore, they deserve the support of the House. They are mutual organisations that provide just the kind of services that this House should be seen to support. Their social and financial motives are of the best possible kind. They supplement the work of the welfare state. Therefore, they deserve encouragement. They ought not to be treated like a City organisation, interested only in profit and looking after the interests of its shareholders. Those mutual organisations seek to serve a local community's ordinary individuals who are not well off. They deserve the support of the House, and I hope that they will receive it when the House divides.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: While keeping in order, during the course of the Committee proceedings on the question whether schedule 8 should stand part of the Bill, I raised the matter of friendly societies. I shall quote what the Economic Secretary said during the proceedings, because what he said has made it necessary to raise this matter tonight:

"the Government have no intention of applying a fiscal system to friendly societies which would force them out of business. That was not our intention last year, and it is not our intention now. It is early to judge the specific impact, but none of the evidence available to me suggests that the changes have had the impact that the hon. Member for Hodge Hill feared." — [Official Report, Standing Committee B, 4 June 1985; c. 316.]

I have just spoken to Mr. Madders, who is the chairman of the friendly societies liaison committee. Half an hour ago he told me that friendly societies will die if the current tax regime persists. I appeal to the Economic Secretary to see sense. If a man who represents all these organisations tells us that the future of the friendly societies he represents is endangered by a measure that was introduced last year, the Economic Secretary has a public duty to respond and reconsider the position.

When I pressed him later in Committee about the damage that might be inflicted upon small friendly societies, the Economic Secretary said that the matter was hypothetical. It is not hypothetical. We are told that damage is being done and the Economic Secretary therefore has a duty to respond.

I am also informed that if our amendment, which proposes a higher limit and raises the total premium income ceiling to £120,000 for the exempt category, were to be carried, about 97·5 per cent. of friendly societies would be relieved. Most of the 4,000 friendly societies would then be designated as falling within the tax-exempt category. If that is the case, I should have thought that, administratively, it would be wiser for the Government to proceed on that basis. I hope that, when the Minister replies, we shall be told that he has carefully costed the new clause, because the House is entitled to know how little its implementation would cost the Exchequer.

8.30 pm

The Government may raise a number of objections to what is proposed. They may say, for example, that they would oppose the new clause on the basis that it would create two categories of friendly societies. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) pointed out, the EEC life directive—which is to be implemented by regulations under the European Communities Act 1973 in the near future—already does that, recognising that small societies cannot meet the requirements of commercial insurers, and not wanting to force them out of existence. If it is good enough for our European partners, in the form of an EEC directive, to have a two-tier system, it should be good enough for our domestic Parliament to introduce a similar two-tier system by another means.

The Government may say that distinctions between two categories would be difficult for the Revenue and the registry to supervise. The registry has a long experience, for example, of insisting on the genuine independence of societies, even against the wishes of the management committees of the societies concerned. If a society were using the higher limit, that would be a reason to insist on genuine independence.

The Government may say that branch societies are not entirely independent of their order. To be registered as a branch society, the branch must have a separate fund under its own control, as well as contribute to a fund under the control of the central body. In practice, the order operates as a policyholder's protection arrangement for the members of its branch societies, arranging for their business to be looked after if the branch gets into difficulty. As with any registered society, if a branch society is not genuinely functioning independently, its separate existence can be terminated. Surely, within that arrangement, the position is fully safeguarded.

The Government may say that the proposal would not arrest the decline of small societies. Both the numbers of registered societies and the average membership of traditional societies were declining before their limit was reduced from £2,000 to £750 last year, and that will probably continue if the proposal is accepted. However, the objection is that, without the proposal, all small societies must in time be forced out of existence. They cannot cope with the complexities of taxable business, nor is there any other type of business operation open to them.

The Government may say that the proposal would act as a deterrent to mergers. Active small societies have no wish to merge. Societies interested in accepting transfers of engagements — and offering some advantage in transferring—will be operating on a commercial scale and be transacting taxable business.

[Mr. Campbell-Savours]

The Government may say that a lack of experience on the part of secretaries of small societies, in that they cannot handle sums assured as large as £2,400, should be taken into account. Until last year, they were handling the £2,000 limit without difficulty. That is half the figure in real terms that they were allowed to handle in the past. Indeed, the greater financial danger comes from operating within the £750 ceiling and taking on long-term contracts unlikely to have sufficient margin to meet administrative expenses. The Minister has brought that about by changing the limits, in that he has made it almost administratively impossible for them to manage their funds effectively. In doing that, he is driving them out of business.

The Government may suggest that they cannot give advice to the public up to the standard required for investor protection. But they are not competing commercially with alternative forms of investment. The investor protection proposals have not resulted from the activities of the small traditional friendly societies. If it is not intended to close them down, the proposals must be shaped in an appropriate way to allow their survival. The same consideration applies to tax legislation and the application of doctrines such as fiscal neutrality.

The Government may say that the proposal would give small societies a tax advantage. But insurance funds are taxed on investment income less management expenses. Societies operating independently on the small scale allowed by the proposal could have management expenses less than investment income only if administrative and other services were performed free of charge by members. There is no commercial tax advantage in the proposal.

The Government may say that raising the aggregate personal limit to £2,400 would allow larger societies operating at the £750 tax exempt level to hunt in packs for business. That did not happen when the limits were £2,000 and £500 respectively. It could be overcome by restricting membership for tax-exempt business to one society only.

In every respect, the Government do not have a case on this issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock put a complex case that requires a simple solution, and that is for the Minister to agree to reconsider the position. He may not be able to accept the new clause. Nevertheless, he could—as it were, in a throwaway reply, using a phrase that he might deliberately let slip—indicate that, in the coming 12 months, the Government, recognising that there is concern in this sector, will receive further representations and, at the time of the Budget debate next year, ensure that a statement is made reflecting the position that pertains among friendly societies. In the event that it can be proven that their position has deteriorated, the Minister should introduce an amendment to restore the original position and ensure the survival of this important group of organisations.

Mr. Randall: As I listened to the remarks of my hon. Friends the Members for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), I had the feeling that we were presiding over the death of the small friendly societies. Let us remember that we are referring to societies that have existed in Britain for over a century. They have had a special role to play in the nation, particularly in rural areas and especially for the less well-off members of society.

By the new clause, we are endeavouring to persuade the Government to give the small friendly societies the tax relief that is necessary to enable them to continue. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington referred to Mr. Madders, the spokesman for the friendly societies, saying that, if the existing tax regime continued, the societies could wither away. That would be sad.

The small friendly societies are remarkable organisations in that they operate on a sort of amateur basis. The local postman in the village might do the book-keeping. Deposits are collected and saved and the expenses incurred are trivial. Their income is far greater than their expenses. They do not have large administrative costs, not even full-time secretaries. In other words, we are not referring to the type of organisation that is looking for tax loopholes, the sort of body that was established after the situation in 1966. These organisations will be getting into a business liable for tax. In order to deal with matters that inevitably arise when one is in the taxable sector, they would need to establish appropriate skills and manpower. Looking at the tradition of the organisations, the competence, knowledge and skills do not exist because that is not in the nature of the friendly societies we have known for so many years. Establishing administrative systems and procedures and bringing in computers would all be part and parcel of the complexity of business that would ensue if the friendly societies were to enter the taxable sector. It is all very worrying. The signs are that if friendly societies move into the taxable field it will eventually lead to their death.

The new clause proposes to lift the limit on the tax-exempt business to £2,400 and to raise annuities from £156 to £500 per annum, which would be a small cost to the Treasury. Perhaps the Economic Secretary would tell us what that amounts to. I am not sure, but I understand that the amount is very small. Undoubtedly the margins of the business are such that the move into the taxable field is just not possible. Resources, assets and manpower do not exist to enable such a change to take place. The Government will destroy what are essentially very small businesses. I always thought that the Government were the party of the small business. Clearly they are not. They have been destroying small businesses through their economic policy and they can be thought of as a Government who advocate the centralisation of dereliction, the big battalion, the big heel stamping the little man and his little business. Those are not just vague and empty words. They can be substantiated.

People in the rural communities are being confronted, much against their will, with the city slickers. They are being pushed together with these organisations, the post-1966 societies, in an unacceptable way. I am sure that hon. Members do not wish to see any abuse, which we are all against. We understand that any anti-avoidance measures, which often have to be taken from time to time, must be supported because it is in everyone's interest to have regimes which prevent that kind of abuse. Nevertheless, small centralised companies with tight margins cannot afford to move into taxable businesses. Small friendly societies are going to find it almost impossible to continue.

The hon. Member for Workington made the very valid point that even the EEC directive on life assurance recognises that small friendly societies cannot compete with commercial institutions. From reports which I have read, I note that Brussels recognised that the solvency margins would be too tight for small friendly societies. If we do not win the vote tonight I hope the Economic Secretary will give this matter careful consideration, because if we continue with existing tax arrangements on these institutions we can expect to see them wither away. That would be bad for Britain. It would be bad for the people of the rural areas. It would be a tradition of our country that was lost once and for all. The Opposition do not contemplate this lightly.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Some weeks ago the New Statesman carried a photograph of the Financial Secretary, underneath which was the caption "The Minister for the Rich", or it might have been "The Minister for the Idle Rich"—I forget which. It remains to be seen whether the Economic Secretary will appear in a future edition of the New Statesman with the caption, "The Minister against the Working Person who Wishes to be Thrifty." This is the crux of the issue. Because this issue does not concern the idle rich and millions of pounds—as share options do—the Government are not interested.

8.45 pm

This is also an issue of mutuality. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) asked whether there is a place for a mutual society in today's life. I believe there is. It is a concept that ought to be cherished and developed. It rises above mere capitalism and profit-making. The Government may not put it at the top of their list, but I hope that they would at least say it is a worthy concept, although one which might not make this country into a first-class industrial nation. If people wish to be guided by that concept, it is noble and should be encouraged. Unfortunately, that is not so.

Trustee savings banks are to be completely altered. Although something needed to be done, trustee savings banks are now to have shareholders and to operate in the same way as any other bank. Money is going to be siphoned away from the system. They used to be similar to credit unions, but no longer. People who invest in trustee savings banks will demand a return on their money.

The Government have decided to change the building societies and to encourage them possibly not to be mutual societies. The Economic Secretary shakes his head. I am pleased that he does. At the back of my mind there is a nagging feeling that one of the building societies is going to be encouraged to act like a bank. It might take the plunge, and have the freedom to have shareholders and perhaps to raise capital. If that happens, the concept of mutuality will go out of the window, and that will be a great pity.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Government will not be here long enough for that.

Dr. Marek: That may be.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) put the case very succinctly, as did others of my hon. Friends. These societies will fade away unless something is done. It will not be a great affair of state if a small concession is given by the Government and the Bill is changed, but it will make a significant difference to quite an important section within society. It is not a financially important section, but it is important in other ways for our society.

I have not received any briefs or letters this year, although I received a number during the passage of last year's Finance Act through the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) may be right in saying that the Minister will have some technical drafting reason why he cannot accept the new clause. In that case, I echo what my hon. Friend said, and hope that the Minister will examine the position carefully. I am sure that the friendly societies will open their books to him. If I am wrong, I apologise for wasting the time of the House. I shall not speak again next year during the passage of the Finance Bill. If I am right, the friendly societies will be prepared to open their books to the Minister and show him the difficulties that they face. There is no secret about those difficulties.

I hope that the Minister will say that he will take this matter seriously. There is genuine concern about the continuation of the friendly societies. I hope that the Minister will be prepared to redress the balance in next year's Finance Bill. That would be an eminently reasonable and sensible commitment to make. I shall not prolong the debate, as I should like to hear what the Minister has to say.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Although this has been a relatively short debate, it has been interesting. A number of hon. Members have discussed the position and recalled the debates that we had last year. Before I deal with the general points that have been made by Labour Members, I shall deal with one or two specific points. I was asked what the cost of the exemption for friendly societies would be. This is very difficult to quantify, but it may be up to £5 million—that is a highly provisional figure. I was then asked about the implications of this new clause. For reasons that I shall explain when I deal with the new clause, that is unquantifiable, but it could be a high figure.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) referred to the EC life directive. It proposes to exempt mutual associations with a contribution of income of 500,000 ecu, or about £280,000, from its provisions. However, it is not related to tax exemptions. This is a purely administrative matter. The administrative provisions are separated from the tax and we should consider tax matters on their own merits.

The hon. Member for Thurrock also talked about the proposed abolition of SERPS and said that that would put business in the hands of life offices. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) made the rather offensive suggestion that the Government's decisions on friendly societies were taken as a result of pressure from the insurance companies. I repudiate that suggestion absolutely. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, in making his proposals for the widening of the range of pension providers, specifically mentioned the possibility of including friendly societies.

I agree largely with the comments made by Labour Members about the value of the contribution made by friendly societies to the community. They perform a useful social purpose and I appreciate, as the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) said, that bodies of this kind have a mutual constitution that is not only feasible but suitable and which has undoubted advantages.

I have been accused by Labour Members of simply not understanding the nature of friendly societies. I could counter that by saying that the Opposition have simply not bothered to understand the tax implications of last year's measures or of what they are now suggesting. As we should look at the question in a rather dispassionate fashion, I shall desist from that line.

[Mr. Ian Stewart]

The Government have done a number of things in the past 12 months that are helpful to friendly societies—for example, certain provisions of the Friendly Societies Act 1984. Clause 40 of the Finance Bill also envisages a number of other helpful provisions such as the backdating of policies to three months, which will now be allowed to friendly societies. This puts them on a par with the rest of the insurance industry. The Government are undoubtedly, and can perhaps be seen to be, favourable to the friendly societies, but the societies have been in decline. The figures are quite alarming. In 1950 there were about 55 orders with over 13,000 branches. Today, there are fewer than half that number of orders and about a quarter the number of branches. Over about the same period, the number of individual friendly societies has declined to 400 or below from about four times as many.

That decline has nothing to do with the tax treatment of the friendly societies' life business. It has, unfortunately, been the fact that they have been facing more competition, not just commercial competition from the industrial life offices and other competing institutions in life assurance, but competition from the development of the state retirement pensions scheme and welfare provision generally.

Many of the members of friendly societies are now getting older and towards retirement, if they have not already reached it. The problem of numbers has arisen because of the high wastage through death and retirement of the active members of the friendly societies, which has been at a greater rate than the recruitment of new members. It is difficult to say with limited statistics for a short period, but such information as I have is that over the past year or so there have been some slightly more encouraging signs about the level of recruitment. It has not reached a level that would replace the wastage, which would have to involve a considerable increase in recruitment, but the figures are not entirely without encouraging signs.

Friendly societies have recognised that there are major problems in their present role. The national conference of friendly societies wisely established a committee to consider their future and reappraise their role. The important thing to consider when dealing with their actual business is its nature. To judge from what Labour Members have said both on this occasion and during the passage of last year's Finance Act through the House, one would have thought that the business was heavily concentrated in life assurance of a kind that would be caught by the change in the tax-exempt limits that we introduced last year. That is not the case. Smaller societies are diverse, but generally speaking their business is not mainly of that kind.

The amendment could, in theory, benefit about 360 out of 400 of the centralised societies, and they have contribution incomes ranging up to £120,000, which is the figure in the amendment. Many of these societies are very little affected, if at all, by the 1984 Budget measures and therefore would not gain very much, if anything at all, from the proposed amendments. It is estimated that about half the benefits paid out by such societies are for sickness payments, benevolent grants and so on, the funds for which are in any event tax exempt. Much of their life or endowment business is well below even the new limits which have been introduced. Much of it is for funeral provision. The figures are well below the £750 limit in last year's Budget.

9 pm

Most societies do not seem to have been engaged in selling policies of the size which would have been affected by the change in the limit. For example, the 250 smallest societies have assets of about £80,000 in all. In a random sample of 25 of those societies—that is, 10 per cent.—which the registry carried out for me, not one of them had rules providing for death benefits of more than £500. Therefore, they are within the figure we set last year. On that basis, I find it very difficult to accept the points put forward by hon. Members this year and last year.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) said that, if the amendment was not passed, it would be impossible for small friendly societies to continue. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said that, if this amendment was not taken, all small societies might be forced out of business.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is not so much what we are saying: it is what we are told by the organisations themselves. They have written to us, they have sent representatives to speak to us, and we are referring what they say to the Minister. Surely they know their business. Is the Minister suggesting they are misleading us in saying that current legislation is likely to wipe them out? If he is not saying that, what is he saying? They are saying their future is in peril. If they believe that, the Minister must address himself to what they believe. It is their business, and they know it better than the Minister.

Mr. Stewart: With respect, if that is exactly what they have been saying to the hon. Gentleman, they are being misleading, because that is not the information available to the registry; it is not what they have put to me. I am in touch with representatives of the friendly societies liaison committee and the friendly society movement. The figures we introduced last year were not plucked out of thin air.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Whom have you met?

Mr. Stewart: I have met Mr. Madders; and, if Mr. Madders can demonstrate that the limits which were introduced in the Budget last year will have an effect other than that which we believe they will have, it is open to him to produce some indication of how that will be, but he has not done so. He has made assertions of the kind which the hon. Gentleman has made.

Dr. McDonald: In view of the remarks the Minister has made, will he undertake to meet Mr. Madders with me so that we can discuss these matters with Mr. Madders?

Mr. Stewart: I am quite willing to meet Mr. Madders and quite willing to talk to the hon. Lady independently. I am always ready to meet members of representative bodies.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister is frightened.

Mr. Stewart: I am not frightened of anybody. In discussions between representative bodies and Ministers, it is better if they are allowed to meet and discuss these things between themselves. If the Opposition——

Dr. McDonald rose——

Mr. Stewart: I will not give way until I finish what I am about to say. If the hon. Lady and the Opposition have any material information to put forward, I hope they will do so, but they have had an opportunity in this debate and have totally failed. If they are meant to be representing the interests of the friendly societies, they ought to have done their homework. They ought to have found out about these societies, they ought to know the sort of information which I have been giving to the House, and they ought to be able to explain how the societies would be suffering. Now I will give way to the hon. Lady.

Dr. McDonald: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he will not receive a deputation consisting of myself, Mr. Madders and others who are interested and involved in the friendly societies? That is extraordinary.

Mr. Stewart: It is not at all extraordinary. Mr. Madders is perfectly able to have access to me and to the registry, and I am perfectly ready to discuss these matters with him. The point I made seems to have offended the hon. Lady. Although she asked so charmingly for me to give way, I wish she would apply herself to the actual question which I put, which is that the application——

Dr. McDonald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: No, not for the moment. If the hon. Lady is not prepared to let me answer the debate, it seems to suggest that she has no arguments to put forward.

Taxable limits do not have the dramatic effect that Labour Members claim. If they did, no doubt Labour Members and Mr. Madders would be explaining to me and to the Chief Registrar that that was the consequence of the changes. However, that has not been the case.

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Gentleman has been making extraordinary assertions about the sort of deputations that he will or will not receive. Is he really telling us that he will not receive an official Opposition spokesman plus whom ever that spokesman wishes to bring along? If so, that is extraordinary.

Mr. Stewart: I am perfectly ready to see Mr. Madders and other representatives of the friendly societies liaison committee, as I am ready to see representatives of the building societies or other bodies for which I have ministerial responsibility. I am also perfectly ready to see the hon. Member for Thurrock if she and her colleagues want to come and see me. However, I am not obliged to see representatives of the bodies for which I am responsible and Opposition spokesmen at the same time. If the hon. Lady wants to come and see me, I shall be happy to see her.

Unlike the hon. Member for Thurrock, I have an objective interest in the friendly societies. I want to see them prosper and flourish. I hope that they will be able to determine the reasons for the considerable decline and I am always interested to consider the financial, technical and tax aspects of their business because they are valuable bodies in our society.

The new clause would not be appropriate. If the benefit of tax exemption were passed on to policyholders, by giving more favourable terms, that would be contrary to reasonable and fair competition with the industrial life offices and others in the market place. If the benefit were not passed on, it would be used to subsidise either higher management costs or the societies' other business. Neither seems to be a proper use for tax exemption on life assurance.

A more practical and, although technical, important reason why the new clause is not appropriate is that it would be wide open to abuse and exploitation. When a friendly society reached the limit of £120,000, it would only have to establish a new society alongside it—with the same management and the same officers — and double the amount of business could be done. When the new limit was reached, the process could be multiplied.

As the new clause would apply to all friendly societies, the scope for exploitation would be considerable. I do not expect that many of the traditional friendly societies would exploit the provision, but that is not the point. Because the more recently founded commercial societies are more adept at exploiting commercial opportunities, they would be able to do so and it would not be necessary to find pre-1966 or traditional societies for that purpose. However, those societies could also exploit the provision. On grounds of principle and practical implications, I suggest that the House should reject the new clause.

The friendly societies have set up a committee to consider their future and we ought to continue to keep their affairs under general review. A period of stability after the many recent changes would probably be in the interests of the friendly societies.

The new clause would be open to widespread exploitation and it would not have a dramatic effect on the smaller societies about which Opposition Members have expressed so much concern.

Dr. McDonald: We have heard extraordinary statements from the Economic Secretary about the future of friendly societies and the Government's treatment of them. He declared that friendly societies were declining for all sorts of reasons, some of which I am prepared to accept and that the change that the Government instituted in the tax regime had had no effect on them, and had done nothing to hasten their decline, and he suggested that Mr. Madders was giving misleading information to me and my right hon. and hon. Friends.

The letter from the Independent Order of Odd Fellows Manchester Unity Friendly Society, to which I have already referred, does not coincide with the Minister's view. It states:

"We find it difficult to understand why this government with its commitments to thrift and appeals to the nation to become a caring society should deal such a harsh blow to those who work voluntarily for the good of their fellow men in this field . . . We can only view the suggestion emanating from the Treasury that Branches and small Societies . . . should switch to taxable business as an admission that the new limit is unreasonable and unworkable in the necessity for Branches and small Societies to remain solvent."

That is the view of a major order, not merely Mr. Madders. It sent the letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and was, presumably, willing to defend its remarks.

When the Economic Secretary replied to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) in Committee, he said:

"It is not our job to put friendly societies out of business . . . I was about to say that the Government have no intention of applying a fiscal system to friendly societies which would force them out of business. That was not our intention last year, and it is not our intention now." — [Official Report, Standing Committee B, 4 June 1985; c. 316.]

To justify the Government's position, the Economic Secretary must say that the societies are declining and, therefore, no longer matter, and that the previous tax changes are not in any way a cause of that decline. That simply does not stand up. It is astonishing that he cannot bring himself to discuss his reply with Mr. Madders, representatives of the friendly societies, some of my colleagues and me.

[Dr. McDonald]

The Economic Secretary suggests that if the new clause is accepted the change in the tax regime would give friendly societies an unfair advantage in competition with life assurance companies, but it will not. He continues to fail to understand the nature of the organisations. They are small, democratic and run by their membership, and the possible abuse that he suggested will not occur in traditional friendly societies. If he believes that abuse will occur, why did the Government change the limit in 1980 and then put the regime in reverse in 1984?

The Government cannot support all their actions towards friendly societies. Either they were happy to double the limit to £2,000, as in 1980, or the Minister believes what he says, in which case it flies in the face of the way in which the friendly societies have operated for a long time. Friendly societies are more or less under the control of their members, and they would not set up a parallel organisation as he suggested.

The Economic Secretary said how sorry he was that distasteful remarks had been made about insurance companies. The tenor of his reply suggests—well, let us face it, insurance companies give money to the Conservative party. We are not sure how many or how much. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to intervene and tell us. His imposition of harsh limits on friendly societies has hastened their decline.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend asked about contributions. She will remember that the Labour party research department did some work on this for 1983. I had a list yesterday which showed that at least seven major assurance companies had given money to the Tory party —we are talking in terms of hundreds of thousands of pounds. Vast amounts of money are involved and they must have some bearing on how the Government think on these matters.

9.15 pm

Dr. McDonald: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that useful and relevant information. It makes us think that insurance companies will get their reward when the state earnings-related pension scheme is abolished.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury rightly said that friendly societies undertake business other than insurance and that many do not engage in that type of business at all. The number of societies that want to engage in such business and the number of people who want to take out policies through friendly societies are such a tiny part of the insurance market that I do not understand the Government's attitude. By accepting new clause 2, the Government would allow that section of the market to continue. They would also allow people to continue to exercise their freedom of choice and to insure themselves through friendly societies, as did their forebears.

The Economic Secretary knows that friendly societies are beginning to decline, and he is hastening their demise, but he has not produced one sensible justification for that. He has merely shown that he does not understand these mutual self-help organisations and the part that they have played in working-class life. They will not engage in commercial business or the abuses that he outlined. They simply do not operate like that. The post-1966 societies found a loophole, but they did not share anything of the ethos and customs of the traditional societies. The Economic Secretary should have grasped that by now. His failure to do so and his insistence that this little part of the market should be squeezed out of existence more rapidly will strengthen my right hon. and hon. Friends' resolve to vote for the new clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 167, Noes 238.

Division No. 266] [9.17 pm

AYES

Abse, Leo
Alton, David
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Benn, Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carlile, Alexander (Montg'y)
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Concannon, Rt Hon J. D.
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Ellis, Raymond
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gourlay, Harry
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
John, Brynmor
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Livsey, Richard
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKelvey, William
MacKenzie, Rt Hon Gregor
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Martin, Michael
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce

Miller, Dr M. S. (E Kilbride)
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Penhaligon, David
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Rowlands, Ted
Ryman, John
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Short, Mrs R. (W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Snape, Peter
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wainwright, R.
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
White, James
Wilson, Gordon
Winnick, David
Wrigglesworth, Ian
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Frank Haynes and
Mr. Allan McKay.

NOES

Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Rt Hon Sir Frederic
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Boyson, Dr Rhodes
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Cormack, Patrick
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Farr, Sir John
Favell, Anthony
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Gale, Roger
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Gilmour, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Goodhart, Sir Philip
Gorst, John
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Gummer, John Selwyn
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hill, James
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Howard, Michael
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lang, Ian
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lord, Michael
Luce, Richard
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
McNair-Wilson, P. (New F'st)
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marlow, Antony
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Miscampbell, Norman
Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Patten, Christopher (Bath)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Pollock, Alexander
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Prentice, Rt Hon Reg
Price, Sir David
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rost, Peter
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Speed, Keith
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stevens, Martin (Fulham)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trotter, Neville
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Tony Durant and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

New clause 5

PAYMENT OF EXCISE DUTY ON SPIRITS AND WINES

'The Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979 shall be amended by inserting after section 74 the following section—

"74A.—(1) Any duty chargeable on spirits or wines pursuant to section 5, or section 54 above shall be paid, in any year commencing with the year which begins 1st April 1985, fifty-six days after the commencement of the relevant period.

(2) In subsection (1) above 'relevant period' means the period beginning with the date on which the spirits or wines in question are imported into the United Kingdom or removed from an excise warehouse (as the case may be) and ending on the date on which those spirits or wines are sold to a person otherwise than in the course of an excise licence trade carried on by him.

(3) The powers of the Commissioners to make regulations under this Act or under any other enactment shall be read and construed subject to, and in accordance with, this section.".'.—[Mr. Hirst.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.30 pm

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The present 28-day period of duty deferment was introduced in April 1983 to give the wines and spirits trade a period of grace before excise duty had to be paid on goods brought out of bond or imported. That relief was given not least to help the hard-pressed Scotch whisky industry and to protect jobs in an industry which generates huge exports for the United Kingdom.

Since that deferment of duty was introduced, a number of measures have adversely affected the cash flow and profits of the wines and spirits trade, especially the Scotch whisky industry on which many jobs in my constituency depend. Two years ago, the concessions on tolerance losses on the bottling of spirits were withdrawn and as part of the revision of the corporate sector's fiscal regime in last year's Finance Act, stock relief was also withdrawn. I do not object to the fact that there was no exemption for the Scotch whisky industry when stock relief was withdrawn, as I realise that that would have been invidious. Nevertheless, no other industry depended so much on stock relief as the Scotch whisky industry which has a unique stock-sales ratio because whisky has to mature for a long period. The Finance Act 1984 also eliminated the postponed accounting system for VAT, to the detriment of the cash flow and profits of wine importers, many of whom also own Scotch whisky or other spirit distilling concerns.

Duty deferment was introduced as an acknowledgement of the adverse impact on cash flow of financing excise duty when the average period between import or clearance from bond and the receipt of the proceeds of sale from the ultimate customer was approximately 12 weeks. In answer to a parliamentary question from my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner) on 30 April 1985, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State said that the period of duty deferment in the United Kingdom was very modest compared with that in other EEC countries, where it could range up to six months.

My right hon. Friend will also be aware of the recommendations in the report of the Food and Drink Manufacturing Economic Development Committee on Scotch whisky in the 1980s. The new clause seeks to extend the duty deferment period from four weeks, or 28 days, to eight weeks, or 56 days, which is still considerably short of the 12-week average financing period between withdrawal from bond and the receipt of sales proceeds. It is a long way short of comparable duty deferment periods in EEC member countries.

I accept that the proposal that I have brought before the House in the new clause was costed in the answer that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate on 30 April. I accept that £185 million is a far from insignificant sum.

I could not end my speech without referring to the fact that the Scotch whisky industry is appreciative, as I am, of the lenient treatment that it received in the Budget on excise duty valorisation. The new clause should not be misinterpreted as representing a failure to acknowledge that. It is, rather, an effort to draw continued attention to the plight of the Scotch whisky industry, which can be represented by the number of distilleries that are not currently working, which have been shut down on a care and maintenance basis, or which are working at capacity of about 30 per cent. There is a real problem in the Scotch whisky industry, and that is what I am seeking to ventilate by moving the new clause.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I declare an interest as an adviser to the Scotch Whisky Association. If hon. Members will excuse the pun, I support the spirit of new clause 5.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) said, there is often a period of 12 weeks between whisky being drawn out of bond and being sold. In the wholesale trade, it is usual to have a month or two's account to allow for such expense. The agreement reached a year or two ago was that there should be an average four-week deferment period so that there was some assistance to the industry in paying the duty to which my hon. Friend refers. The new clause suggests that the period should be extended to eight weeks. I shall not quibble about precisely what would be a reasonable period of deferment. Something between nothing at all and the 12-week average period is six weeks, and that is the period that the SWA would like. An average of six weeks means that there would be a minimum of four weeks and a maximum of eight weeks. That would assist the industry very much in cash flow, which, as my hon. Friend said, is a real problem, and has been exacerbated by several measures in the past few years, particularly the abolition of stock relief.

The House will recall that that relief was a corporation tax concession to alleviate the stock value problems caused by high inflation. It was withdrawn precipitately in March 1984. It was not a gradual withdrawal — it was withdrawn at one fell swoop. It had a particularly serious effect on the Scotch whisky industry because its stocks have to be kept for so many years. It is curious that it is a capital-intensive industry, but the capital is tied up not in plant and machinery but in its stocks.

I shall not repeat all the arguments about stock relief. My hon. Friend will be familiar with them. In any event, I am conscious that they are not the subject of the new clause and I would not wish to incur your displeasure, Mr. Speaker. I say only that the abolition of stock relief has caused a real cash flow problem to the Scotch whisky industry, which estimates that its additional tax liability for the most recent financial year, simply through the withdrawal of stock relief, is some £30 million.

The extension of the period of deferment would, to some extent, alleviate the problem and would, as my hon. Friend said, bring United Kingdom practice into line with practice elsewhere. It would not be an unduly expensive measure, because it is a one-off step. There would be a cost to the Treasury this year, but it would not recur. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider the new clause sympathetically.

Dr. Marek: The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) said that some distilleries have been shut or closed temporarily on a care and maintenance basis. If that is the case, the House should be worried, because the whisky industry is a successful one that contributes to our balance of payments and has a good record of exports. It would be a great pity if the industry went into decline. I blame the Government across the board for decimating manufacturing industry and exports during the past five or six years, and it would be sad if yet another industry were to bite the dust simply because it did not receive the right help at the right time. The Government could provide such help, although it may be only temporary.

I may have got it wrong, and the industry may be healthy. Perhaps it wants this tax concession simply to make more profits. I do not know. It could be one or the other, or it may be a mixture of both. I hope that when the Minister replies he will use some of the time—I suspect that he will resist the new clause—to reassure me and the House that the whisky industry is in a good state, that it will continue to make exports for the benefit of Britain, and that we shall continue to have the present large range of malt whiskies.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I firmly support the plea of my hon. Friends the Members for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) and for Chiselhurst (Mr. Sims) for the Government to accept the new clause. Sadly, unlike most Scottish Members, I have no constituency interest. Therefore, I speak only on behalf of a great Scottish industry that deserves as much support as it can get at a time of high unemployment, distilleries closing or going on short time, and boxing and blending plants being in a similar plight. Those of us who live in Scotland realise that that is a fact, and that we cannot turn a blind eye to one of Britain's great industries, which has provided much valuable export revenue for many years, but which is running into difficulties for reasons that are well known to Ministers. We should now think seriously about providing additional assistance.

My right hon. Friend the Minister will know that, this year, many distilleries will have to pay substantially increased rates on their plants, which are not covered by commercial or domestic relief. That has created substantial worries about their cash flows later in the year.

At the beginning of this year, my right hon. Friend the Minister was kind enough to meet a deputation of Scottish Conservative Members, who put to him the serious plight of the whisky industry. I appreciated his sympathetic hearing of our case. We welcome the favourable treatment in the Budget in relation to excise duty on whisky as compared with other spirits, and there is no question but that the whisky industry appreciated that concession. We must go further if we are to promote the industry to the top of the tree in terms of home and export production.

9.45 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden has explained the technical aspects of the new clause relative to stock relief, which seem to the industry to be the most effective way to obtain assistance in the immediate future. The concession on stock relief which might put the Scottish industry in a similar position to that of some of our competitors in Europe would be an enormous help. In the past, Ministers have listened sympathetically to representations on the industry's plight. I know that, if they had the time to go to the whisky-producing areas in Scotland, they would see that what we have said is the truth—many distilleries have closed and many operate on short time. There is great concern in the Highlands about the future of the most important industry in the area.

I hope that Ministers have listened sympathetically to what hon. Members have said and that they will accept the new clause as a measure that will assist an industry that could do so much for our economy.

Mr. Terry Davis: I have listened with interest to what Conservative Members have said in advocating the new clause and have carefully read the papers that were kindly sent to me by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst). I recognise that there is a problem. Nevertheless, I take a relaxed view of this issue because I confidently predict that the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden will not press his new clause to a Division, whatever the Government say.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): This short debate has concentrated on the whisky industry, although the purpose of the new clause goes rather wider than that important industry, which I think draws support from both sides of the House. We all recognise the special place of that industry in exports and its substantial contribution to trade over the years.

I am advised that the drafting of the new clause is not entirely clear. From what my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) said, it is clear that he wishes to extend the deferment from four weeks to eight weeks and thereby improve the cash position of the Scotch whisky industry on which he concentrated. The measure would also affect other industries and other parts of the spirits and wine interests at home and abroad.

My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden explained that the wine and spirits trade has been pressing for an extension of duty deferment to help its financial position and to offset the effects of various measures which have eroded the benefit of duty deferment since it was introduced in February 1983. My hon. Friend referred to the withdrawal of postponed accounting for VAT in the last Budget, the withdrawal of stock relief, the changes relating to the duty on strengths and quantities declared on bottle labels, tolerances and matters of that kind. I assure my hon. Friend that representations made direct to Treasury Ministers by the Scotch Whisky Association and others were taken into account by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the context of his Budget judgment and decisions this year. He decided to deal favourably with the Scotch whisky industry, and I am glad that hon. Members have referred to that decision. It is of significant value to the industry.

If one were minded to accept the spirit of the new clause and to allow increased duty deferment for wines and spirits, there would quickly be strong pressure from the beer industry and cider makers saying that they, too, should be treated similarly. The cost of the extension of deferment proposed in the clause would be a once-and-for-all loss in the financial year of about £185 million. If the cider and beer interests got in on the act—the pressures would be great — the costs would nearly double and there would be a once-and-for-all cost of £350 million. These sums show how impossible it would be in the context of the Budget to make the concession for which my hon. Friends ask.

[Mr. Barney Hayhoe]

The Government have shown sympathetic concern for the Scotch whisky industry on a number of occasions during their lifetime. Favourable treatment has been meted out to it and I can assure my hon. Friends that sympathetic consideration will be given to their representations in future. I hasten to add that I am making no commitment to further favourable treatment. However, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give sympathetic consideration to the industry. I understand that all his predecessors have done so and I am sure that all his successors will. It is an industry that attracts a great deal of support on both sides of the House.

I am sorry that I am unable to accede to the requests of my hon. Friend the Member for Strethkelvin and Bearsden in his moderate, balanced and reasonable speech. I hope that the forecast of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) will prove correct and that my hon. Friend will seek leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Hirst: I welcome the support that has been forthcoming from my right hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), who speaks authoritatively on behalf of the Scotch Whisky Association. It is true that I am seeking an extension of the deferment that will involve a once-and-for-all cost. I shall take the opportunity of taking to task the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), who is prepared always to attribute the woes of any industry to Government action. However, it is a fact that drinking habits have changed and that the Scotch whisky industry faces a threat from the increased popularity of white spirits. The industry is facing marketing difficulties.

It is always helpful and enormously consoling to have the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). My hon. Friend has no whisky interests and we must admire his modesty in declining to articulate his interest as a consumer of the product.

Mr. Maxton: Will the hon. Gentleman ask the leave of the House to withdraw the motion?

Mr. Hirst: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait to learn my intentions. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) might have done better to listen to my opening remarks. I made it clear that the purpose of the clause was to draw attention to the importance of the whisky industry, to the difficulties that it has faced in recent years and to my desire that the sympathetic consideration that my right hon. Friend has expressed this evening will find its way into legislative effect next year. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 10

POSTMEN'S CHRISTMAS GRATUITIES

'The provisions of section 183 (1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 shall have effect except in regard to personal Christmas gifts and presents given to individual postmen in appreciation of the recipient's personal qualities, such as faithfulness, consistency, and a readiness to oblige.'.—[Mr. Campbell-Savours.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This issue first came to the attention of British postmen and postwomen about a year ago when members in branches of the Union of Communication Workers in the area covered by the Guildford Inland Revenue office received a shock assessment of their income. The inspector of taxes had deemed that all postmen and postwomen received £150 in tips whether or not they receive them, and that they were to be taxed on those tips. The notices that included the assessment had wrongly been issued to members of the UCW who never delivered mail, including a number of individual postmen who had no direct contact with the public that they served. Cases then surfaced in Blackburn, Chorley, Preston, Burnley and Southport. Many more are no doubt in the pipeline.

After some exchanges between the professional advisers of the UCW and the Inland Revenue, the notices to non-delivery members were withdrawn and a long argument about the nature of Christmas boxes began. The union's case was, and still is, that any tip received at Christmas—whether a bar of chocolate, a calendar, a bottle or cash—is a gift and not a reward for work, in the sense that it becomes a part of earnings. The union's accountants and solicitors have pressed the case most firmly throughout the year with the Inland Revenue authorities. Just before Christmas a meeting was held with the district inspector in London Provincial 20. Following the meeting it was confirmed after discussions with the Inland Revenue's policy division, that its view was that, on the basis of present information, there were no grounds either in equity or in law for the issue of any extra-statutory concessions in respect of submissions that Christmas tips were a gift from customers and as such should not be taxable.

It was suggested in some quarters, particularly in the press, that the employers had the power to vary the decision of the Inland Revenue. This suggestion has proved to be completely unfounded, but it arose from the confusion caused by the original decision. In the discussions with the inspector, the Inland Revenue representatives made the point that comparatively few postmen who had received the notice had appealed to their local tax authority. The union pointed out that this was still the position and that it was advising that course of action. As the union wanted a decision in Parliament, there were dangers in risking appeal decisions that might be unfavourable to the union membership.

The amendment is important in so far as the wording is drawn from two sources. First, it is drawn from a letter from the Guildford office of the Inland Revenue which identifies section 183(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 as the section which has led to this penal tax assessment having been made. Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, it is drawn from a judgment in the case of Seymour v. Reed in which it was held that

"gifts or presents made to a person on personal grounds and not by way of a payment for his services are not included as 'salaries, fees, perquisites, profits, etc.' The fact that a payment is made by someone other than the employer suggests that the payment is made by way of gift. A voluntary payment may be made in circumstances which show that it is given by way of a present on grounds personal to the recipient. In such a case the proper conclusion is likely to be that the voluntary payment is not a profit accruing to the recipient by virtue of his employment but a gift to him as an individual, paid and received by reason of his personal qualities or attainments."

Mr. Moore indicated assent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I see that the Financial Secretary is nodding his head. I hope that he will also nod his head when it comes to winding up the debate and that he will say that he agrees with the new clause.

Sir William Clark: Who wrote it?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) asks who wrote it. The judge did. This was his judgment:

"It was also pointed out by Mr. Justice Atkinson in the case of Seymour v. Reed that a sum given as a present in appreciation of the recipient's personal qualities, such as faithfulness and consistency"—

we know that the hon. Member for Croydon, South subscribes to such principles—

"and readiness to oblige, would not be taxable."

The judgment concluded:

"We are of the opinion that these tips are not, therefore, taxable."

The Union of Communication Workers cannot accept that a one-off gift to a postman at Christmas time must be treated on the same basis as regularly given tips and gratuities to taxi drivers, waiters and hairdressers. Their measure and magnitude make them totally different.

It would be wrong for the Minister, when replying, to address himself to what he may consider to be a similarity. I think I see him shaking his head in dissent. I hope that that means that he will not deploy an argument on the basis of similarity. Taxi drivers and waiters have been known to solicit tips. Britain's postmen are precluded, by the rules of the Post Office, from soliciting tips.

10 pm

I wish to draw attention to an interesting article which appeared in the Sun, a publication from which I do not normally quote, and which is hardly known for its reliability. It carried a story on Wednesday 13 February 1985 under the headline:

"The meanest mail. Lawson rapped by postie Celia. Exclusive."

Mr. Denis Budge, the journalist, wrote:

"Postie Celia Mills delivered a rollicking yesterday to Chancellor Nigel Lawson—one of her customers—over his planned tax on postmen's tips. Celia, 52, stormed, 'I have never had a penny from him in the ten years I've been delivering letters to his country home.' The Inland Revenue will assume for tax purposes that posties pick up £150 a year in tips. But Celia said, 'In the past year I have had a total of £8'— not £150—

"'a box of biscuits and a pair of tights.' Mother-of-two Celia, who works as a £52-a-week part-timer in Stoney Stanton, Leicestershire, where the Lawsons own the old rectory, now plans to send a protest letter to the Chancellor. She said, 'I'm mad enough to bite his dog. I've always been civil to him but I'll just have to clench my teeth next time.' and Celia's husband Roy said 'His tax on phantom tips is diabolical'."

Why should the Treasury assume that everyone tips their postman at Christmas, when it seems that the Chancellor has not tipped his postman for 10 years?

Celia and her husband were not the only people to object. Along with the Union of Communication Workers, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) also objected and he received a reply from the Treasury. The Financial Secretary, in an appendix to a letter dated 15 March 1985, conceded that the assessment of £150 was merely an estimate based on assumptions that subsequent returns from postmen showed in many cases to have been excessive. Equally, he accepted that in assuming that all postmen in an area received Christmas gratuities, the tax offices concerned had not followed departmental instructions. I would have thought that was a fairly grave admission to make. Will the Minister address himself to that statement in winding up the debate? What is he going to do about it? Does he intend to issue instructions to all his tax offices that they should not deem in this way? Postmen and postwomen throughout the country want him to take this decision. He has the opportunity to do so when he winds up the debate.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I am glad that this matter is on the Order Paper, because it exposes a piece of extraordinary behaviour by the Inland Revenue which caused great and justified offence to postmen and postwomen throughout the country. It demands some explanation from the Financial Secretary, who wrote to many of us on the subject. We all have copies of the letter which has been quoted. It came to the notice of postmen in the area I represent when a notice was circulated to all postmen and postwomen from the head postmaster reproducing the letter which he received from the Revenue. The letter said:

"POSTMEN/WOMEN—TIPS ETC

I understand that some, or all of your postmen/women may be in receipt of tips, (e.g. Christmas 'boxes')—whether in cash, or in 'kind'.

Such income is taxable under the provisions of the Taxes Acts.

Starting in April 1985 i.e. the tax year 1985/86, I propose to tax an estimated amount (150 per annum), by means of a deduction from the individuals' PAYE coding allowances . . .

Any individual who disagrees with his/her coding should contact Morpeth Tax Office".

This notice was circulated to postmen, who immediately wrote to Members of this House to protest. Many of them specified what they had received. Some of them pointed out that they worked in sorting offices and did not meet the public. Others pointed out the precise amount they received. One postman stated that he received £22, which was the highest figure quoted. I received a petition from 12 postmen who stated that not one of them had received more than £5 in tips in any recent Christmas.

If anything, the practice of giving postmen substantial tips at Christmas has declined along with the economic fortunes of the country and the financial security of many of the people to whom they deliver. This is not the mark of any lack of respect for the postman, who is one of the most popular figures in most of the communities in my constituency and the constituencies of many other hon. Members and whose personal service and attention is appreciated. In rural areas postmen frequently carry other messages and provide information and guidance, especially to the elderly. The postman is often the only caller of the day for many old people. He is the only person to whom they speak. He not only brings them their Giro cheques and news from their families but also gives them all kinds of advice and help.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Is it not the case that many of our postmen and postwomen deliver mail in communities within which the people themselves are not in a position to give them gifts at Christmas or any other time of the year?

Mr. Beith: That is absolutely so. They may also be the most generous communities. A postman is often given a hot drink on a cold wet winter's morning in a house which can least afford to be generous with food or other facilities. People who cannot afford to be generous and hand out tips and extra benefits are none the less generous and appreciative of the postman's services. The amount of money assumed by the Revenue to be a reasonable estimate is many times higher than the top figure which any postman ever receives.

I took this up with the Chancellor and I was slightly taken aback to find that the first reaction was a letter from his private office saying that a report on the tax affairs of my constituent had been called for. My constituent was the secretary of the Union of Communication Workers, who sent a petition to me and had an investigation into his tax affairs for his pains. This merely revealed the truth of the case that we were advancing. I wrote back to the Chancellor and tried to remind him that this was not one individual problem but a general problem created by tax inspectors and a series of tax offices making completely unwarranted assumptions.

The upshot of all this was that, following correspondence between many hon. Members and the Financial Secretary, the Revenue revised its estimate and suggested that £30 was a reasonable figure. It is still wrong. There may be parts of the south-east where postmen pick up that sort of money regularly, but it is simply not so in many other parts of the country. That kind of money is not pressed into postmen's hands at Christmas time because it is not available or spare.

The Revenue has made completely unwarranted assumptions at every stage. I do not see why it felt compelled to handle the matter in this way. It would not have been difficult for it to have accumulated enough information, through discussions with the unions and inquiries at individual tax offices, to come up with a more reasonable suggested figure of, say, £10. That figure would still be challenged by many postmen, who do not get any tips if they are not in direct contact with the public, or who get hardly anything.

The new clause argues that the Christmas boxes and gratuities are, as has been argued by a judge in a court case, different from the regular tips that form part of the understood income of some people. That is so. We are not talking about the way that some people's incomes are made up by regular tips. I wish that that were not so.

It remains a degrading feature of our society that some categories of people still depend on tips for their basic income. We should try to cure that in our society. Everybody should be able to rely on his pay packet to give him a decent living wage. Whether somebody is a waiter, a buffet car attendant on a train or a hairdresser, to have to rely on tips and then get into a haggle with the Revenue about what he is actually receiving is not a fair way for somebody to be remunerated for a fair day's work.

That is a different issue from Christmas gratuities, which are much more limited than they may have been at one time in some parts of the country, and are confined to a limited number of people. Such gratuities are not confined to postmen, and the new clause opens up other questions. The other category of regular house callers that comes to mind is dustmen. They serve us the year round doing an extremely unpleasant job and many people try to give them some recognition of that at Christmas.

If we pass the new clause, such other categories may be involved. I hope that the Minister will, as the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) suggested, address his mind not to those whose income is substantially made up from tips but to those who often get only a tiny extra gratuity at Christmas from grateful customers, and on a scale about which we need hardly need be talking.

In my constituency, such tips are so small that they cannot be compared with the tax-free benefits that many other people enjoy, such as company cars, allowances available to Members of Parliament, or all sorts of things on which tax provisions are relatively generous. If a postman gets under £15 at Christmas by way of gratuities, the Revenue should not be involved. I hope that the Minister will be able to say that that will be so.

I hope, too, that the Minister will be able to bring some apology to postmen for the way in which the Revenue initially handled this matter. There should be some recognition that for most of the postmen, as for dustmen and others who occasionally get a Christmas tip, this is but a small bit of extra generosity from a limited number of people with which the Revenue should not be bothered.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I hope that the Minister's officials do not listen to me tonight, because I have a confession to make. Every Christmas, I go around my constituency and see constituents whom I have helped in the previous year. I have an estimate here which shows that last year I received 45 mince pies, 12 pieces of Christmas cake, four jellies, two trifles and three glasses of ginger wine. I have not declared them in my income tax return.

My case is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not declared his Christmas boxes either. My guess is that he received his Japanese calendar, his Marconi calendar and his Boots desk diary, and if one looks at his tax return nowhere will one find those items recorded. He will say that these were Christmas boxes. He will say, "They were given to me because of my personal qualities." He deludes himself on that as he deludes the country on everything else. He will say, "I received those because of my personal qualities such as faithfulness, consistency and a readiness to oblige." There is no end to his ability to deceive himself and others. They are not taxable.

If I am wrong, may the Financial Secretary rise and say, "I have seen the Chancellor's tax returns and I know that every Christmas box he received has been duly entered and tax has been paid on it." But we know that is nonsense. We know that those in industry, those in high positions, do not record their Christmas boxes. They do not call them tips. When the Chancellor receives tips from different companies through the Members' post, he does not regard them as tips.

10.15 pm

Mr. Sedgemore: Backhanders.

Mr. Golding: The right hon. Gentleman does not regard them as backhanders. He regards each gift as a friendly gesture, a Christmas box, not to be put down and itemised in a column of figures to return to the Inland Revenue. He would regard himself as a Scrooge if he did that. He looks upon it as a friendly gesture and that is what the Christmas box for the postman is about. The postman is in a different category from the dustman. There are people who give the dustman a Christmas box because they think that more of their rubbish will be taken away. There are those who tip waiters. I can tell the House of my experience as a waiter, how I extorted tips from customers. People sometimes give tips to waiters because they are afraid of them, because they are embarrassed when they are with lady friends and do not want to be shown up by the waiter.

With the postman it is entirely different. There is no fear of not receiving service from the postman. You cannot buy additional service in this way, because the law says very specifically that your mail must be delivered. No discretion is given to the postman as to whether he delivers your letters. Does the Chancellor even think of giving the postman a tip? Mail is still delivered, free Christmas gifts and all, because the law says to the postman that he must deliver your mail. Therefore, there is no question of fear.

People give Christmas boxes to the postman because of the feeling of good will of the season. A payment for service is irrelevant. Those who argue that perhaps the assessment should be £10 are making an error. There should be no assessment at all. People give a Christmas box to the postman because it is part of our pattern of life. Gratuities are given to certain people at Christmas and they are given to the postman because he is "the friendly postman." People give them to a friendly familiar face; it has nothing to do with service.

The Government should accept the new clause and admit that it is niggardly, miserable and Scrooge-like to continue to tax Christmas boxes.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I declare an interest as a sponsored Member by the Union of Communication Workers and as a former postman.

Mr. Golding: A friendly face.

Mr. Ewing: As my hon. Friend says, a friendly face. I shall bring all my years of experience to the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) got it right with his mixture of seriousness and farce. The hilarity that has entered the debate is appropriate, because the Government's proposal is a farce. For the Inland Revenue to suggest that postmen get anything like £150 at Christmas is one of the greatest farces I have ever heard of.

It may not be known to hon. Members that officers working in the post office in our Central Lobby were assessed as receiving £150 in tips. I see the Financial Secretary smiling; he obviously knows what happened. It was outrageous.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) took up a point made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). It is obvious that the prospect of power is beginning to affect alliance Members — not that that prospect will ever materialise. I note that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed moved away from his previous position of objecting to taxing the tips of postmen and postwomen and said that an assessment of £10 or £15 would be acceptable. The hon. Gentleman is obviously looking——

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman misquotes me.

Mr. Ewing: The hon. Member said it. If he wishes to correct the record and to rescue himself, I will give way to him.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman misquotes me. I said that reasonable behaviour by the Inland Revenue in the first place might have been to offer an estimate of £10 or £15 and not £150. My argument was that £10 or £15 for the Revenue is not worth bothering about.

Mr. Ewing: The hon. Gentleman has confirmed the point that I was making, which was that £10 or £15 would be acceptable to him.

Mr. Beith: No.

Mr. Ewing: The hon. Gentleman suggests that that would have been reasonable behaviour. That suggests to me that the hon. Gentleman, who is not an unreasonable man, would not oppose what he regards as reasonable behaviour. The Liberal party has shifted its position.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Workington pointed out, Celia Mills has never had a tip from the Chancellor who is imposing this policy on postmen and postwomen throughout the country. I have experiences of Christmas tips and Christmas boxes. My tips did not amount to £150 in all the years that I worked for the Post Office — let alone total that amount in one year. I vividly remember one Christmas when I was on a rural delivery. My Christmas gifts amounted to one chicken which had been accidentally run over, 14 turnips, the promise of a load of manure for my garden — a promise which was never delivered. My other gifts included three pairs of socks and five dozen eggs. That was all after a year of running the farmer's children to the road end so that they could catch the school bus. Yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggests that postmen receive £150 each year in tips. The proposal is outrageous.

If the Financial Secretary has any common sense, he will throw away his silly briefing, which will undoubtedly be couched in highly technical language. It will no doubt argue that these are not tips or gifts and that the House should oppose the new clause. He should tell his civil servants to go and have an early night, and the Inland Revenue to concentrate more on the Lord Vesteys of this world. It is no wonder that the Chief Secretary is not replying to the debate. He congratulated Lord Vestey on defrauding the Inland Revenue of millions of pounds, yet he tells postmen that they must pay tax on tips of £150 a year.

Although we have treated the subject lightheartedly, postmen and women do not. Hundreds of them have had their weekly earnings reduced by £1 or £2 a week because of the Government's policy. It is nonsense to suggest that post office staff get tips all year round, because they do not. At Christmas and New Year they receive gifts, and the Inland Revenue has no right to tax them. I urge the Minister to exercise common sense, to speak for only a minute, and to accept the new clause.

Mr. Randall: My speech will be brief. The Inland Revenue has made a great big blunder on the issue of tips for postmen, and the way in which it deals with their tax assessments.

The role of the Union of Communication Workers in protecting its members is to be commended. It has done an extremely good job in bringing the matter to everybody's notice. I am impressed by the way in which it has pressed the case and made the appropriate representations. We are concerned with a group of people on low incomes, who deliver mail in all weathers, often through snow and ice, and who often work through the night. They provide a good service and are admired by the British people. Yet the Government wish to tax a once-a-year gift which is given voluntarily in recognition of their wonderful service.

[Mr. Randall]

How did the Minister arrive at £150? I am sure that any assessment of tips would reveal an enormous discrepancy between those received in Guildford, which is in the affluent south-east, and those received in my constituency. How many postmen's rounds were considered? How many interviews with householders were conducted? The £150 is so arbitrary that I cannot see how the Minister justifies it.

10.30 pm

Is geography to be taken into account in tax assessments? The Government have muddled postmen with workers such as taxi drivers, hair dressers and people who work in restaurants, who regard tips as part of their regular income. It is inequitable of the Inland Revenue to include the once-a-year gift in the same category. Where will it end? If the Government go ahead with this outrageous step, what will happen to milkmen, and dustmen? I hope that the Minister will seriously reconsider the matter. People will regard these proposals as extremely unfair. The sum makes no difference to the Revenue, and no point of principle in financial terms is involved. I hope that the Minister will accept new clause 10.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The main surprise of the debate is that the Financial Secretary has not already said that he will withdraw this provision so that we can avoid the necessity of voting against it and bringing down the Government and so that we can go home by 11 pm, content that we have saved the country.

The other big surprise is that, in the serric ranks of aspiring Parliamentary Private Secretaries, none has come out and defended what is being done. That is amazing for a party that will defend any iniquity and any folly. Treasury briefs have gone unread. What is being done here is an example of the Government's desperate trawl for money, which starts at the top with the flogging off of national assets and finishes at the bottom with the taxing of workplace nurseries and imaginary postmen's tips.

This is the thin end of the wedge. Where will it stop —dustbinmen's tips, milkmen's tips, the Parliamentary Private Secretary's tip from a grateful Minister at Christmas? Will it stop with presents for secretaries from Members of Parliament? The £150 has been plucked out of the air. I hope that the Financial Secretary will tell us what it is based on. Were postmen followed round by Inland Revenue officials counting every burp and estimating every mince pie and its value, counting every hiccough and estimating how many drams of whisky went into producing it and counting the amount of money that postmen are seen putting in their pockets as they come out of houses? How was this done? There is no evidence that £150 is anything like the figure that postmen receive. Were Treasury Ministers asked whether they gave enough to balance the Chancellor's meanness? If the Chancellor gives any tip at all, it is simply despair. That is the appropriate tip to give when one considers his economic policy.

Mr. Sedgemore: It is done by MORI polls.

Mr. Mitchell: I shall not comment on MORI polls. It is ludicrous to set this figure because not all postmen receive Christmas boxes of any kind. The size of the Christmas box depends on the area that the postman serves. My experience as a postman is that the better Christmas boxes came from the humble working-class areas. In the middle class areas one would get a glint from steel-rimmed glasses and a mincepie handed over with forceps from some distance. The estimate must be calculated by area.

I believe that the tips should not be taxed. New clause 10 is worded to reflect the legal judgement in the case of Seymour v Reid in 1927 in the Appeal Court. A professional cricketer in the service of Kent county cricket club was threatened with taxation, but the judgment held that a sum given as a present in appreciation of the recipient's personal qualities, such as faithfulness, consistency and a readiness to oblige—the type of PPS qualities that the Government esteem—would not be taxable. Since the new clause has been cleverly worded by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) to reflect all those characteristics and that judgment, postmen's tips are better not taxed. I hope that the Financial Secretary will say that he will withdraw the proposal. It is petty and wrongly based, wrongly researched and bears no relation to the nature of the job. Has the great experiment of Conservative tax reform under the Chancellor come to these petty methods?

Dr. McDonald: My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) described the realities of a postman's life at Christmas. That contrasts sharply with the letter from the inspector of taxes in Guildford saying:

"The estimate of £150 for tips in the codings was calculated as 30p per house on a round of 500 homes over a 15 day period."

That assumption is absurd when postmen are given gifts in kind, promises of gifts which do not materialise and perhaps the odd pound. It does fit the sums, and the Chancellor did not chip in with his 30p contribution, but I shall not embarrass the Financial Secretary by asking him to comment on that story.

The Government's proposal also conflicts with the provisions in clause 42 which raise the limit for business gifts from £2 to £10. More exemption is allowed for a business than for postmen receiving a gift in recognition of the service that they have rendered and the qualities that they have shown throughout the year. That is utterly mean. It involves almost £1 per week in tax for postmen who have not thought to challenge the £150 assessment or whose appeals against it have failed.

The Financial Secretary knows that there is plenty of case law clarifying the amounts of money which count as gifts and are not subject to tax because they are given to help someone out or in recognition of personal qualities and distinguishing between cases of that kind and tips. All that the Financial Secretary has to do today is to say that he will end the nonsense of assuming that postmen receive 30p per house on a round of 500 homes over a 15-day period and insist that any benefits received by postmen —bearing in mind that they are not allowed to solicit gifts or to receive gifts at any time other than Christmas —are regarded as gifts in recognition of the postman's personal qualities and friendly face and that they are not tips.

If the Financial Secretary will give us that undertaking we shall not need to divide the House and the matter will have been settled very quickly.

Mr. Moore: The charm of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), combined with the endearing comments of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) and others are an enormous temptation but Treasury reality holds me back. If hon. Members who are desirous of voting on this will listen to my explanation they may question whether they really want to vote for the new clause.

The new clause seeks to establish exceptional tax treatment for tips received by postmen at Christmas. I will deal with the technical defects of the amendment separately so as to help the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) in any attempt that he may wish to make to return to the subject on a future occasion. First, however, I shall deal briefly with the arguments of principle.

It is difficult to see why postmen should be singled out for special tax treatment and not be taxed on their tips when other employees who receive tips at Christmas continue to be taxed on them. I shall come on to the assumptions in a minute, but in general tips are a form of income and as such it seems right that they should be taxed in the same way as the rest of the employee's income.

We would be unwise not to say so even if we did not believe it, and I certainly do believe it, but we all value the efforts of our postmen to get the post through in difficult conditions, especially at Christmas. The recollections of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East will live long in my memory. Nevertheless, it would not be right not to tax one form of income received by one group of people while others have to pay tax on all their income.

The amounts can be substantial. Some postmen clearly receive very modest amounts—I shall not go into details on an individual basis — but others have declared amounts of more than £250. [Interruption.] I am simply putting the facts on record as I am sure that the hon. Member for Workington would wish. Exempting that kind of income from tax would put postmen at an advantage compared with other employees.

As the hon. Member for Workington has said, the new clause arises as a result of the action taken by certain tax offices earlier this year to include an estimate of tips in some postmen's coding notices for 1985-86. I had hoped that the House would recall my reply on 1 April to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant). I reported that in February some 15 of the 100 or so tax offices dealing with postmen had included an estimate of £150 for tips in 1985-86 coding notices. I am sorry to say that that was done without first checking with the postmen concerned whether tips were received and, if so, what amount. I very much regret the inconvenience and worry that that action caused the people concerned and I apologise once again on behalf of the Inland Revenue and myself. It was particularly unfortunate as long-standing guidelines make it clear that adjustments to coding notices in respect of tips should not be made until every possible attempt has been made to find out the facts. The Inland Revenue is sorry that the offices concerned acted contrary to those instructions and has apologised. It has also taken steps to rectify the position by approaching the postmen concerned or their representatives to establish the facts and, where appropriate, to issue revised coding notices. Tax offices have been reminded of the instructions on taxing tips.

Mr. Fisher: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moore: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not give way as I have been asked to be as brief as possible.

I shall not go into the relative position of other roundsmen such as milkmen, dustmen, and so on, but will deal with the essential point that the hon. Member for Workington raised so clearly and specifically at the beginning of the debate. Apart from the principles involved, the clause is defective and redundant. It seeks to exempt postmen's tips from tax but it is technically defective in the way in which it defines the tips that it seeks to exempt. The hon. Gentleman referred to one court case, but there are many others. The courts have already noted in cases dating back to the 19th century — [Interruption.] I am trying to put the facts on record in a matter which affects many men and women in this country.

10.45 pm

The courts have already noted in cases dating back to the 19th century that gifts and presents, as the hon. Member for Workington rightly said, given because of the personal qualities of an individual as an individual, are not taxable. They do not arise out of the employment, but because of the personal qualities of the person himself. But tips are usually given to postmen or other employees in return for being postmen. They are an extra reward for delivering the post, in a pleasant and helpful manner. I understand that the clause as worded probably would not exempt those tips. It would simply give statutory backing to the exemption under the ordinary rules of schedule E. As the hon. Member for Workington rightly said, the taxpayer has the commissioners and the courts to test that. That is what the courts of our land are for. The exemption is already enshrined in case law, for the non-taxability of the very few tips given because of a person's personal qualities.

Therefore, in essence, the new clause seeks to exempt what is almost certainly already exempt, while leaving —this is the critical point—taxed what I assume it seeks to relieve. I trust that the House will, while recognising the apology that I gave and the relevant facts in the past, not push the new clause to a Division.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I do not wish to detain the House, but I have to say to my hon. Friends that the Minister's reply was spiced with the subjunctive mood of doubt. All the time he said, "might", "perhaps", or "could". That is not good enough. I call upon my hon. Friends to support my new clause in the Lobby.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 172, Noes 244.

Division No. 267] [10.46 pm

AYES

Alton, David	Barnett, Guy
Ashdown, Paddy	Barron, Kevin
Ashton, Joe	Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)	Beith, A. J.
Bagier, Gordon A. T.	Bell, Stuart
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)	Benn, Tony

Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Brown, Ron (E'burgh, Leith)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carlile, Alexander (Montg'y)
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Concannon, Rt Hon J. D.
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (L'lli)
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Douglas, Dick
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Ellis, Raymond
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Gourlay, Harry
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hart, Rt Hon Dame Judith
Haynes, Frank
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport East)
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
John, Brynmor
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McKelvey, William
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Martin, Michael
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Miller, Dr M. S. (E Kilbride)
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Penhaligon, David
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Robinson, G. (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Rowlands, Ted
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Short, Mrs R. (W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, C. (Isl'ton S & F'bury)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wainwright, R.
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
White, James
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Wilson, Gordon
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Wrigglesworth, Ian
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Don Dixon and
Mr. John Maxton.

NOES

Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Amery, Rt Hon Julian
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Rt Hon Sir Frederic
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Biggs-Davison, Sir John
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Boyson, Dr Rhodes
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Hon A. (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Dunn, Robert
Durant, Tony
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Favell, Anthony
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fletcher, Alexander
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Gale, Roger
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Gilmour, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Goodhart, Sir Philip
Gorst, John
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Grist, Ian
Grylls, Michael
Gummer, John Selwyn
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hargreaves, Kenneth
Harris, David
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Howard, Michael
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knowles, Michael
Lang, Ian
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luce, Richard
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Macfarlane, Neil
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
McNair-Wilson, P. (New F'st)
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Maples, John
Marland, Paul
Marlow, Antony
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Mates, Michael
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mills, Sir Peter (West Devon)
Miscampbell, Norman

Mitchell, David (NW Hants)
Moate, Roger
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, John
Morris, M. (N'hampton, S)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Mudd, David
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Needham, Richard
Nelson, Anthony
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Osborn, Sir John
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Patten, Christopher (Bath)
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pawsey, James
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Prentice, Rt Hon Reg
Price, Sir David
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Malcolm
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Speed, Keith
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stevens, Martin (Fulham)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Tracey, Richard
Trotter, Neville
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Walker, Rt Hon P. (W'cester)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Tim Sainsbury and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

Finance Bill

New Clause 11

SUPPLIES OF SERVICES AND TRANSACTIONS BY TRADERS

Services supplied or transactions carried out by a trader shall be treated as taking place at whichever is the earliest of the following times:

(a) when the payment in respect of those services or transactions is received in the trader,

(b) when the trader issues a tax invoice in respect of them, or

(c) the day when the trader ceases to trade.'.—[Mr. Campbell-Savours.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I propose this measure on behalf of hundreds of thousands of business men who, if they knew what I am about to reveal, would be most concerned about the legislation penalising their position.

I must express my indebtedness to my hon. Friend the Member of Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) whose revelations during the Committee debate in the Finance Bill interested my colleagues to such an extent that we were able to identify a special tax concession which has been provided to barristers and which was passed in 1981 without parliamentary debate. None of us knew anything about the concession until my hon. Friend brought it to our attention. His sense of objectivity outweighed his commitment to the Bar, and that must be the mark of a truly great parliamentarian.

11 pm

I must tell the House that the new clause is defective. It follows exactly the wording of the concession that was given to barristers under the VAT (General Regulations) 1980, of which section 20 states:

"Services supplied by a barrister, or, in Scotland, by an advocate, acting in that capacity, shall be treated as taking place at whichever is the earliest of the following times:—

(a) when the fee in respect of those services is received by the barrister or advocate;

(b) when the barrister or advocate issues a tax invoice in respect of them; or

(c) the day when the barrister or advocate ceases to practise as such."

That provision enables barristers to enjoy the concession.

We are examining a privilege. We have privileges in education, housing and employment and here we have a privilege in taxation. That privilege provides that a barrister does not have to pay VAT to Customs and Excise until he has claimed in turn from his own client. That is a special concession. All other traders are required to pay VAT to Customs and Excise within a maximum of three months after they invoice their clients. Barristers are in a special position. In justifying the concession, Customs and Excise states:

"Unlike other 'tradesmen', barristers do not have the option of taking clients to court in order to recover unpaid fees. Although it might be said that the practical disadvantage of not being allowed to sue compared with the privilege of being allowed to sue someone who has not paid a debt—presumably because there is no money with which the debt can be paid—my be slight".

That is how Customs and Excise justifies the concession.

The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) was far more interesting in his intervention in the debate that took place in Committee on this issue. He gave us the real reason. He did so when it was necessary for someone to come to the aid of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to explain to the Committee what the concession was all about. The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not know the reason at that moment for its introduction. The hon. Gentleman said:

"The special concession negotiated by the Bar when VAT was introduced in 1972 or 1973 arose because a portion—about 40 per cent.—of practising barristers relied almost entirely on legal aid fees for their income. Unlike other fees which other members of the Bar may receive, legal aid fees are not negotiated in advance. They are all determined by taxing officers of the courts in arrears. Therefore, when the work is done, the fee is unknown and may be unknown for a long time.

However, a difficulty arose in that in order to secure taxation of a legal aid fee, barristers' clerks had to submit an invoice to taxing officers of the courts which would essentially be a negotiating ploy. In my experience, not once has a fee which my clerk has asked for been accepted by the taxing officers of the courts . . .

That means the invoices did not necessarily relate to the fee that was subsequently paid. Of course, if the invoice issued became the basis for VAT, it would be paid not on the basis of the fee subsequently taxed and paid, but on the fee on the invoice that was essentially a negotiating point. I believe that it was to get round this difficulty that the commissioners of Customs and Excise made a special concession to the Bar."

"I think"

he said — this will interest the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), who takes a great interest in these matters—

"that this is a unique concession." [Official Report, Standing Committee B; 23 May 1985, c. 238.]

The hon. Member for Corby said that to send the invoice is a negotiating ploy. He then implied that there is no connection between the submitted invoice and the settlement. If so, let the order be modified to provide for an adjustment, thereby securing early payment in line with the practice for other traders. The Minister, whose letter on that very point I received this morning, said:

"It would in theory be possible for a barrister to account for tax on a provisional estimated basis and make any adjustment in subsequent tax periods but this would be an undesirable adminstrative complication both for him and Customs and Excise."

How convenient an answer that is.

This is a very Socialist new clause. It extends this privilege to everybody.

In another new clause which unfortunately was not selected, although I can refer to its contents because it relates directly to the new clause that was selected, I identified over 100 groups of people who would benefit if this new clause were to be accepted. They are glassblowers, travel agents, accountants, jugglers, musicians, conjurers, impresarios, income tax advisers, composers, knife and scissor sharpeners, thatchers, tea blenders, peat cutters, bagpipe makers, turf cutters, holiday flatlet operators, hoteliers, estate agents, architects, sculptors, experimenters on embryos, paper-makers, marble converters, printers, metal bashers, wood carvers, goldsmiths, silversmiths, potters, masseurs, stonemasons, painters and decorators, enamellers, dressmakers, clothes designers, lithograph artists, fly tiers, acrobats, illustrators, farmers, smelters, picture restorers, fencers, metal polishers, soldiers, buskers, cobblers, remunerated after dinner speakers, shepherds and goatherds, odd-job men, weavers, spinners, steel stock holders, hand glove makers, shirt makers, carders and cads, clockmakers, value added tax advisers, marine pilots, plumbers, electricians, undertakers, furniture restorers, joiners, bricklayers, plasterers, butchers, bakers, candlestick makers, professional mechanics, welders, wheelwrights, scrap metal merchants, ships' chandlers, turners, millers, glaziers, hauliers, gardeners, agriculturalists, tattooists, refuse disposal traders, deep sea fishermen—that will appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) — inshore fishermen, French polishers, upholsterers, totters, freelance journalists, scaffolders, boat builders, professional athletes, carpet layers, roofers, tailors, sausage makers, strippers, horse traders, horse trainers, surveyors, quantity surveyors, photographers, bailiffs, fish smokers, cheesemakers and organ grinders. All of these groups would benefit, as would many other groups. This is a very charitable and Socialist new clause because it extends a substantial privilege enjoyed by barristers to many groups of people, many of whom live in my constituency.

Other organisations have an interest in this new clause. They do not accept that it would meet their objectives, but they recognise that although it is defective the Minister of State, Treasury could table his own substitute new clause tomorrow morning, as the Finance Bill is to be debated again later that day.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants is concerned about the cash flow problems of small businesses, which must pay VAT to the authorities prior to its collection. That body said in a submission to Lord Young in response to a Government document entitled, "Burdens on Business":

"VAT is a major cash flow item in small business. The current system of VAT outputs, being based on the date of supply, can adversely affect a business which gives credit. In certain cases, the supply of a service or goods will have taken place, but no money received, before the VAT on that service must be forwarded to Customs and Excise. Such payments are often funded by a bank overdraft at considerable cost to the business. We would urge that consideration be given to a method where small businesses might elect to put VAT on a cash received/cash paid basis. Small businesses could account on a cash book system and would thus be saved the burden of keeping additional records for VAT purposes. We acknowledge that this may be one area where to realise the benefits, an element of positive discrimination towards the small business would be involved."

That, I am told, is what Government policy is all about. In a debate a week or so ago the Government talked about the need to discriminate positively in favour of small business wherever possible. This is their opportunity to do that. The institute added:

"A monthly payment plan for VAT would need to avoid the additional complexity of monthly returns and would be unattractive if it had an adverse effect on cash flow. While there may be ways of deferring payment, we see some difficulty in including the suggestion as part of a package designed to improve the lot of small businesses."

Again, the institute expressed reservations about the way in which VAT operates under present arrangements.

I accept that my new clause has a defect. That is because it has been transposed from the original 1980 regulations. That has been done to show the many small business organisations that one group of people have a concession. I do not object to that, because I regard it as a reasonable concession for them to have. Indeed, on a free vote, many hon. Members would probably vote for that concession to be extended in the way I have suggested. I do not know how much that would cost. But if the Government reject the new clause on the basis of cost, they must consider the effect that implementing it would have on the cash flow of many small businesses. They, too, need the money.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) described the origin of the new clause. It arose in Committee upstairs, where it emerged that barristers were not subject to the same requirement as small business in the case of bad debts. Where a business man is not paid, he must still pay the VAT on what he would have been paid. That does not apply to barristers.

Understandably, that caused a certain embarrassment in Committee because, after all, we have in office a Government of barristers, for barristers, by barristers. I am not sure how many barristers there are in the Cabinet turning their knowledge of the law to applied economics, but some embarrassment was caused for the Government because it is clearly wrong to have one law for barristers and one for small business men, the latter having the much more stringent requirement to pay VAT on other people's bad debts. If it is good for small businessmen to pay it, barristers should pay it too. They should be subject to exactly the same requirements, rules and regulations.

There should not be what amounts to a secret distinction. I hope that the Minister, in winding up this dynamic and hard-fought debate, will tell us about the origins of this concession and what happened before the 1980 regulations. Is it a long-standing concession to barristers? Our impression is that it is of much longer standing than the 1980 regulations. Can the Minister say why it was brought in? It emerged entirely by accident. It has not been publicised. It looks like a secret concession which has been kept from small businessmen who have been complaining for years about the iniquity of having to pay VAT on bad debts. The argument is that this concession should either be abolished or extended to everybody. There cannot be a fairer principle than that. There is no reason why one section of society should be singled out in this fashion.

The concession in the 1980 regulations applies only to barristers. Our amendment seeks to apply it to everyone. That is the simplest and most straightforward principle. We asked in Committee for an explanation of what was being done, why it was being done, who it extended to and what was the basis of it. We quickly received an explanation from the House of Commons Library which provided the basis of our amendment. It is fair to say that the explanation promised from Treasury was very slow to reach us. It is dated 9 July 1985 and it reached my hon. Friend only today. It is obviously a last-minute attempt to catch up, which puts Opposition Members at a certain disadvantage in dealing with it. Being extremely well organised, with an enormous research staff, I have not yet received the letter. Doubtless they are falling over each other to bring it to me or clambering outside the Chamber with it. It is not right that we should receive it immediately before the debate when we have to put down amendments in advance. Had it not been for the diligent efforts of the House of Commons Library we would not have been able to do so. It is curious that the explanation should be so late, because it comes from the Chief Secretary who, as a barrister, one understands, is returning to practise that profession in the forthcoming reshuffle, must have a peculiar interest in these matters. It is a concession from which he might well benefit in his occupation to which, one discovers from reading the papers, he is about to return.

[Mr. Austin Mitchell]

The explanation in the letter is simple. It states:

"The law covering the matter is Regulation 20 of the Value Added Tax (General) Regulations 1980 . . . In practice this allows barristers (and advocates in Scotland) to account for tax on their services when they receive payment of their fees since their is no requirement on them to render VAT invoices within a specified period of the completion of their services."

This is a requirement that affects most other traders and which means that they do not get paid. Having put in the invoice they still have to pay VAT within the requisite period. The letter continues:

"This special VAT regime for barristers was justified on two main grounds. First, in a substantial proportion of their work, fees are not fixed in advance of or at completion of the service."

It is an extraordinary situation. It is common to some other occupations like oriental bazaar keepers. As the letter states:

" . . . fees are not fixed in advance of or at completion of the service but are open to negotiation after the event."

I imagine that is not correct, but this is the assertion. The letter continues:

"In particular in legal aid cases barristers' fees are neither determined nor paid before the matter has been considered by the Legal Aid Committee and a precise figure has been certified."

The question arises, what proportion of barristers' fees are legal aid cases? The overall figure may be 40 per cent. but that can vary widely among barristers, particularly as they work in different fields. In some sectors—company law, for instance—it is almost certainly a minute proportion of the income of barristers. On the basis of a justification based on the income of a minority of barristers, the concession has been extended to all barristers, against the general run of the law for small business men.

The letter continues:

"Secondly, unlike the generality of other unregistered persons, barristers are not permitted to sue their clients for non-payment of fees."

That is a decision made by the barristers themselves. They can change that easily by a simple decision of the Bar Council, and could start suing those who do not pay their fees. It is ludicrous to make a voluntary castration and then complain. The decision is in the hands of the barristers. It is therefore wrong to make it the basis for a concession such as this.

The letter goes on:

"I think that on reflection you will agree that these two factors taken together"—— they are different excuses for the same thing. They are not cumulative reasons but separate and distinct reasons—

"do put barristers in a special position. For them it is not so much insufficiency of funds being a reasonable excuse for inability to pay the tax when due—which was the matter under debate in Clause 32"——

That is a side issue. We are talking about the iniquity of the requirement that VAT shall be paid on debts—

"but an inability to know precisely how much VAT is due because of the uncertainty about the actual level of the fee. It would in theory be possible for a barrister to account for tax on a provisions estimated basis and make any adjustment in subsequent tax periods".

That is what we would like to see happen. However, the letter says:

"this would be an undesirable administrative complication both for him and Customs and Excise.

In any event the receipt of payment tax point is not unique to barristers."

We were told that this was unique to barristers but it now emerges that retailers effectively enjoy this privilege.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The communication does not quite say that. It does not say that they enjoy the same facility under the same concession. It is that the effect may be the same, for other reasons.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree, but the letter says that retailers effectively enjoy the facility because they are paid cash on the point of purchase

"as do people supplying continuous services or services where stage payments are the norm . . . Some people also have the facility to account for tax on a cash received basis with no compulsion to issue a VAT invoice in advance of payment."

That dodges the issue, which is the distinction between barristers and other small business men, who have to pay tax on debts that they will not be repaid. Even though the money has not been paid to them, and the companies to which they have supplied the goods have gone bust, and they cannot be paid, they have to pay the VAT on the money that they are not getting. It is an unfair system, and if there is any justification for it, it should be universal. There is no justification for excusing barristers.

Therefore, we need information from the Minister. If the inability of barristers to sue for debts is to be used as justification for this concession, can we know what in what proportion of cases barristers do not get paid for their services? What is the proportion of debts owing to barristers? What does their inability to sue for debts mean as a justification for this concession?

We need to know why the concession has been extended to barristers, and not to the other small business men. We are talking, in the case of barristers, about a sizeable business. The estimates of barristers' incomes vary widely—anything between £100,000 and £250,000 a year. I discount the claims of incomes of £1 million a year. A quarter of a million pounds a year is not uncommon. This puts them in a fairly sizeable lead in the business table. We are talking about much smaller businesses with much smaller income which are having to cripple themselves to pay VAT on debts they are not receiving. The real criterion should be, as we were debating in the Committee, inability to pay. A businessman should not have to pay VAT on a bill which is not paid.

Why should there be this distinction between barristers and others? Why not accept the principle of our amendment, which is simply to extend this concession to a unique and very privileged section of society to the whole of small business?

Mr. William Powell (Corby): Unlike the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) I shall be brief. Little did I expect to hear the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), who so admirably opened the debate, advocate an extension of VAT to, of all people, experimenters on embryos. Conservative Members had come to look upon the hon. Gentleman as a robust supporter of the right to life, and now to find him advocating this extension comes as a considerable shock to us.

The hon. Member was generous enough to read out the point of order which I made during our discussion in Committee and I was amazed by how lucid it sounds or how lucid he made it sound. There are few changes I want to make, except that, having said there was "no relationship" between the invoice and the negotiating ploy made by barristers' clerks to the taxing authorities, I wish to amend that to "little relationship."

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby has few admirers in the professions and the House knows that I and a number of other hon. Members are members of the Bar. However, one of his current campaigns has drawn a favourable response in the Temple. That is the idea that barristers should be able to sue for their fees. I hope in due course, if he is able to put his case with a great deal more charm than he has managed so far, he will be able to secure that valuable change in the law. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby was wrong in law in at least one of his contentions. It is not possible for the Bar Council simply by fiat or motion to change the common law of this country. It is the common law of this country that prevents barristers from suing for their fees. It would therefore not be possible for the Bar to change the rule on its own, and because of the venerability of this part of the common law, it would be necessary for Parliament by legislation to change it.

I quite understand the argument of the hon. Member for Workington. It has a certain logic within it, but there is perhaps a better way of dealing with this. I would urge my right hon. Friend the Minister of State to consider pursuing the matter with our noble Friend the Lord Chancellor. This is a unique concession to barristers. I say to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby and the hon. Member for Workington that, though it may have been incorporated in statute in 1980, it goes back to the introduction of VAT in 1972, and this practice has always applied to barristers' fees. There was nothing innovatory about what happened in 1980: that merely continued existing practice.

I am certain that barristers who receive legal aid fees, as a substantial number of the members of the Bar do, would welcome it if the legal aid taxing authorities provided that the fees should be fixed in advance, rather than negotiated in arrears, as happens currently. The concession would not then be necessary.

I note that the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is on the Opposition Front Bench. He shares these problems with me, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) and one or two other hon. Members. Those hon. Members know that the change that I have suggested would receive a loud and warm welcome in the Temple. I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister of State to take it up with the Lord Chancellor.

11.30 pm

Mr. Blair: My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) was kind enough to say when moving the new clause, which was obviously drafted by a supporter at the Bar, that I was the origin of the proposal.

I should say to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who criticised barristers, that I made an open avowal of the privilege without its being sought. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington said that that showed an admirable commitment to objectivity. That is probably excellent for one's reputation as a parliamentarian but fatal to one's prospects in a political career.

There are two problems. The first is whether there should be discrimination in dealings between some traders —the Bar is one such trade — and others. The less discrimination there is the better. It should be pointed out that, because people make purchases from retailers and pay at the time, the retailer's liability to pay VAT arises when the payment is made. The privilege exists for a variety of transactions, but that arises of necessity and because of the type of business involved.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The privilege is pleaded on the basis of two justifications that apply only to the law. The situation may be the same for retailers, but that is only because they exchange cash at the point of sale and there is no procedure for invoicing.

Mr. Blair: That is exactly what I said. There are circumstances other than those applying to the Bar where VAT liability arises at the same time as payment is made to a trader.

The more important problem, which is particularly acute for small traders, is that businesses are liable for VAT when they have issued an invoice, even though they have not received payment from the customer. The small builders' federation has pointed out that solvency problems can arise for small companies that have to meet VAT liabilities when they have not received payment from customers. That is the most important issue in the debate. If the Pavlovian reaction to barristers has sparked off the debate, it has been worth while.

The Government should look carefully at the difficulties facing small traders who run into difficulty over VAT payments. A small builder may do work costing £15,000 or £20,000 and the VAT liability could be quite large. Cash flow problems are fairly common when traders are involved in such transactions.

Perhaps a better solution would be to give more discretion to the commissioners to allow an easing of the burden of VAT payments when difficulties arise from a default by a customer. Subject to the amendment being selected, we shall debate the bad debt provisions, which will allow an insufficiency of funds arising directly from default by a customer to be considered when the penalty is being decided.

The Government should study the matter. Many traders find it hard to see why they should have to pay money, which they are supposed to pass on from their customers, when they have not received that money. The Government would do small businesses a service and justice, if they found better ways of ensuring that both the tax was properly collected and the interests of small businesses were protected.

Mr. Hayhoe: I should begin by declaring a non-interest in that I am not a lawyer, but an engineer. My speech may well be better for that.

The new clause would allow all traders to account for VAT on a cash-received basis so that everyone would receive the treatment that barristers already enjoy under regulation 20 of the Value Added Tax (General) Regulations 1980, which is statutory instrument 1536/80. Although barristers are enjoying VAT under that statutory provision, I confirm that they have always enjoyed those arrangements under earlier statutory instruments, as my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) pointed out. We should also note that during the Labour Government the same writ ran.

The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) also seeks to eliminate any injustice for traders in having to account for tax which they have not received and may never receive from their customers, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) pointed out. At least some amelioration is contained in clause 32, where important changes have been made regarding bad debts and where links are made with insolvency legislation. Moreover, if amendment No. 175 is selected, it will allow a more precise debate on that aspect.

[Mr. Hayhoe]

As the hon. Member for Workington acknowledged, his new clause is technically deficient. It would, radically alter the present arrangements, in which the tax invoice is the essential standard under which VAT is charged and accounted for. However, the tax invoice is also important for the registered customer because until he holds the supplier's tax invoice, he cannot deduct or reclaim the tax that he is being charged. The House should note that our debate has been about paying the tax, while no consideration has been given to the important matter of reclaiming or setting against the tax to be paid, the input tax that has already been paid by the individual concerned.

The scheme proposed in the clause would devalue the tax invoice because businesses would want to defer their liability to account for output tax, until they collected the tax from their customers. Therefore, they would not issue tax invoices until they received payment. There would be a corresponding disadvantage for the customer, especially one receiving regular repayments of tax in monthly tax periods, because at present he can deduct or reclaim VAT charged as input tax before he has paid for the supply, provided he holds a valid tax invoice. Under the new clause the customer would not be likely to receive his tax invoice until after he had paid his supplier. There is an up side and a down side, as so often applies to changes in tax regimes.

The suggested scheme would have a profound effect upon the cash flow of most businesses. There would be some gainers and some losers. Retailers and repayment traders — that is, exporters or businessmen such as farmers trading mainly in zero-rated goods—would be substantial losers. Retailers would lose because their input tax deduction would be deferred until after they had paid their suppliers, but they would gain nothing on their output tax because they already account for tax on the basis of daily cash receipts. Repayment traders would similarly lose on the input tax deferment, but have no corresponding output tax deferment because no tax is chargeable on most of their sales.

I hope that I have said enough to explain that considerable complexities are involved in making changes along the lines suggested. This is not the time for me to try to deal with matters other than those before us. We have to consider many new clauses. It is fascinating to listen to the contributions to the debate, but it has gone wide of the subject.

Dr. Marek: Can the Minister say anything about the merits of at least bringing in line the special concessions to barristers? What can be said about equality of treatment in terms of fiscal neutrality?

Mr. Hayhoe: I have tried to explain the difficulties for the trading community if we adopted the sentiments behind the new clause. I have not argued the case on the basis of the defective technicalities.

The question of barristers is an aside in relation to the new clause. I have only added to the observations made by the Chief Secretary in the letter to which reference has been made. If necessary I shall arrange for a copy of that letter to be put in the Library.

I hope that the hon. Member for Workington will not press his new clause to a Division. He has ventilated the subject and my hon. Friend the Member for Corby has been given the opportunity to make an important suggestion to the Lord Chancellor which I shall pass on.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister's answer was complex and I confess that after about five minutes I could not grasp what he was saying and lost the thrust of his argument. I am sure that other hon. Members feel the same.

The Minister might well have made an important statement. I should like to consider it tomorrow and perhaps raise the matter later after taking advice. We have raised an important issue. Many people are interested in the concession which barristers enjoy. We should like it to be extended to others. Our new clause is defective and so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 25

RELIEF FOR TECHNICAL EDUCATION AND DEVELOPMENT

'Insert a new section in the Taxes Act 1970, No. 192 (A):

"(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, payments made in any year of assessment by an individual out of the emoluments of an office or employment may be deducted in assessing those emoluments for that year if made for the purposes of subsection (2) below.

The payments must be made in exchange for technical education which is related to any services offered by members of any body of persons approved for the purposes of section 192.

(3) The technical education is related to the employer's trade, profession or vocation if it is either

(i) in the case of a student, of a type whose content will enable the student to take examinations leading to technical qualifications, or

(ii) in the case of a member, or a type qualifying towards the annual continuing professional development requirement of the body concerned.

(4) The technical education must:

(i) be of assistance in performing the duties of all employment with that trade, profession or vocation, and

(ii) if it had been incurred by the employer, have been allowable in computing the profits of his trade, profession or vocation under section 133 of the Taxes Act 1970".'.—[Sir W. Clark.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir William Clark: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 25 concerns technical education. There is great emphasis on training these days and many people take correspondence courses. It is essential, if at a polytechnic or university, to attend classes, but it is not always possible to attend classes when working. The flexibility afforded by being able to study at home is therefore a great thing.

11.45 pm

My suggestion is that if a person pays tuition fees for a course related to his trade or industry, such expenditure should be allowed for tax purposes, just as it would be if it were paid by the employer. The employee would pay 70 per cent. of the fees and the Exchequer would pay 30 per cent. I estimate that the total cost of fees would be £2 million. Not everyone would claim relief as many people who attend such courses are not in work and would therefore not be covered. I therefore suggest that the scheme would cost no more than £600,000.

It is essential that there be as much training and retraining as possible. The Government ought to do everything to assist, and my proposed concession would be cheaper than setting up colleges or a state scheme which means that the taxpayer has to foot 100 per cent. of the bill. It is essential to expand technical education and I trust that my right hon. Friend will consider the new clause sympathetically.

Dr. Marek: I favour the aims of new clause 25, but I am a little worried, as some courses or conferences are not all that they seem to be. Exorbitant fees are charged and yet the conferences do not really benefit those who attend them, at least not in terms of education.

I hope that the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) can assure me that such courses will be excluded. If they are, and the new clause concerns courses that people work hard on, I welcome it. There might be difficulty with the Treasury finding the money to give relief, and pressure for relief in other areas. I hope that there will not be a loophole.

Sir William Clark: The course must comply with section 192 of the Taxes Act 1970. The expenditure must be of a type which, if incurred by the employer, would be allowed for tax purposes. The hon. Gentleman's reservation is misplaced. We do not want any loopholes. It must be genuine technical education. It is not beyond the wit of the Treasury to rephrase the new clause if it is defective.

Dr. Marek: That was not a reservation on my part. I was simply asking a question because I did not know the answer. I accept the assurances from the hon. Member for Croydon, South and I await the Minister's comments.

Mr. Maxton: I had some sympathy with the new clause when I first looked at it, but I quickly lost that feeling of sympathy when the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) said that the proposals would be a cheaper way to provide further qualifications than state-funded courses.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that those who were better off and who could afford to pay fees of £600 would be able to do these courses and gain tax relief on the expenditure. Many other people would like to improve their qualifications, their lifestyles and their skills, but they do not have adequate income to allow them to pay those fees. The state ought to provide free courses for those people.

Open university courses are divided between those deemed to be technical and those which are not. Some courses are funded by employers, but these are not always the technical courses. What is the tax position of the non-technical courses?

Teachers take part in such non-technical courses and represent a large group within the Open university. Many teachers with diploma qualifications to teach in primary or secondary schools in England or Wales — primary schools only in Scotland—wish to obtain a degree from the Open university. Their local authorities agree that it would be right, good and proper that they should be graduate teachers rather than diploma teachers and are prepared to pay their fees to allow them to obtain that qualification. They even pay for the teachers to go on the summer courses and provide a daily allowance.

Can the employer claim assistance against tax if the employer is a local authority? If the local authority will not pay the fees, will a teacher who tries to upgrade his qualifications from his own resources be able to reclaim tax on the fees? Does the new clause cover that? As the Minister is not responding, I presume that he does not know the answers to my questions.

My main objection to the new clause is that technical training and people's ability to change their skills should not have to be paid for by the individual. In a society that is changing as dramatically as ours, we need people to change and to acquire new skills.

Dr. Marek: I agree entirely that the state should provide an education covering all aspects of life in the community, but there are certain types of specialist education from which employers would like their employees to benefit. Would there not be some advantage in encouraging employers to allow their employees to acquire that specialist education? I can imagine circumstances in which that might be useful, but I have not studied the new clause in depth and am certainly open to persuasion by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Maxton: The answer is simple. The new clause does not cover that point because, as the hon. Member for Croydon, South has said, it is already covered in law. If an employer pays the fees for an employee's training, that expenditure can already be set against tax. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) is quite right. If an employer wishes to have an employee trained in a specific skill which will benefit the employer that training should probably be paid for by the employer, but if people wish to improve their own skills and if society in general rather than an individual employer requires people to change their skills possibly two or three times in a lifetime, society and the state should provide that opportunity and the individual should not be forced to find the fees out of his own pocket. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will not accept the new clause.

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) will acknowledge that this is really a re-run of a debate which took place on the 1982 Finance Bill. My right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for Transport responded to that debate and it would not be useful for me to take up the time of the House in repeating the arguments.

The purpose of the new clause is to give tax relief to employees who incur expenses in obtaining technical qualifications to further their careers. The whole House recognises the importance of technical education. The question is whether the proposed tax relief is the best way to encourage it. In the Government's judgment, directing resources towards improving and extending the youth training scheme, supporting the Open tech in a variety of other ways is a better targeting of resources towards the improvement of technical education.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South acknowledged both in moving the new clause and in responding to an intervention, the new clause is technically defective. Having participated in Finance Bill debates for some time from different parts of the House, I have noticed that the person responding from the Dispatch Box nearly always says that he has been advised that the proposal is technically defective, especially when it is a complicated new clause.

[Mr. Hayhoe]

There is a great deal of sympathy with my hon. Friend's intention of seeking to achieve more technical education. As he will know from previous debates and from his correspondence with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, such dissent as there may be relates to the technique whereby that aim can best be achieved. I certainly undertake to give careful consideration to the points that my hon. Friend has raised and I hope that he will not press the new clause at this stage.

Dr. McDonald: The Opposition sympathise with the aims expressed by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). The new clause relates to a narrow range of people who are in work and wish to bring their technical skills up to date or to acquire new technical skills and we sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's view that every effort should be made to ensure that that happens.

The Minister replied that in the Government's view tax relief was not the right way to achieve that aim but that the Government wished to make more opportunities available for such education. I shall not transgress into a debate on the education system as that would take us too far from the new clause, but the Government need to do a great deal more to make technical education available. Unfortunately — I think that this is what the hon. Member for Croydon, South has in mind — the Government have made it much more expensive for an employee to improve his or her skills or to acquire new skills in this area. Open University fees have risen sharply since 1979, as have fees for all kinds of courses, including adult education courses at local polytechnics and colleges of further education. In all those areas the cost has risen substantially. The individual might be seeking such education while remaining in work.

That is why we understand some of the reasons why the hon. Member for Croydon, South brought forward the new clause. We sympathise with his aims. The proper method should be to widen the availability of technical education at all stages of life and make it much more cheaply available, so that individuals who are, for example, seeking such training through the Open University, do not find the costs the crippling burden that they now find them.

12 midnight

Sir William Clark: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for what he said. In view of the fact that he said that he would give the matter sympathetic consideration in future, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 27

WITHDRAWAL OF RIGHT OF CERTAIN NON-RESIDENT COMPANIES TO PAYMENT OF TAX-CREDITS

'(1) This section applies to a company which has, or is an associated company of a company which has, a qualifying presence in a unitary state and, at any time when it or its associated company has such a qualifying presence, is entitled by virtue of arrangements having effect under section 497(1) of the Taxes Act (relief by agreement with other countries) to a tax credit under section 86 of the Finance Act 1972 (tax credit for certain recipients of qualifying distributions) in respect of qualifying distributions made to it by companies which are resident in the United Kingdom which is equal to one half of the tax credit to which an individual resident in the United Kingdom would be entitled in respect of such distributions.

(2) Schedule [Supplementary provisions as to withdrawal of tax credits] to this Act has effect to supplement the provisions of this section.

(3) Notwithstanding anything to the countrary in the arrangements referred to above and subject to paragraph 2 of the said Schedule, a company to which this section applies shall not be entitled to claim under subsection (4) of the said section 86 to have the tax credit referred to in subsection (1) above set against the income tax chargeable on its income for the year of assessment in which the distribution is made or, where the credit exceeds that income tax, to have the excess paid to it.

(4) A company shall be treated as having a qualifying presence in a unitary state if it is a member of a group and, in any period for which members of the group make up their accounts ending after the relevant date, 7½ per cent. or more in value of the property, payroll or sales of such members situated in, attributable to or derived from the territory outside the United Kingdom, of which that state is a province, state or other part, are situated in, attributable to or derived from that state.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4) above—

(a) 7½ per cent. or more in value of such property, payroll or sales as are referred to in that subsection shall be treated as being situated in, attributable to or derived from the state there referred to, unless, on making any claim under sub-section (4) of the said section 86, the claimant proves otherwise to the satisfaction of the Board, and

(b) the value of the property, payroll or sales of a company shall be taken to be the value as shown in its accounts for the period in question and for this purpose the value of any property consisting of an interest in another member of the group or of any sales made to another such member shall be disregarded.

(6) In this section "the relevant date" means the date on which this section comes into force or, if earlier, the earliest date on which a distribution could have been made in relation to which the provisions of this section are applied by an order made under this section.

(7) This section shall come into force on such date as the Treasury may by order made by statutory instrument appoint and the Treasury may in addition by order made by statutory instrument—

(a) prescribe that the provisions of this section shall apply in relation to distributions made on or after a date before that on which the order bringing them into force is made, being a date not earlier than 1st April 1985,

(b) prescribe those provinces, states or other parts of a territory outside the United Kingdom which are to be treated as unitary states for the purposes of this section, and

(c) prescribe that for subsections (4) and (5) of this section (or for those sub-sections as they have effect at any time) there shall be substituted either the following provisions—

"(4) A company shall be treated as having a qualifying presence in a unitary state if it is subject to tax in such a state for any period ending after the relevant date for which that state charges tax.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4) above a company shall be regarded as subject to tax in a unitary state if it is liable there to a tax charged on its income or profits by whatever name called and shall be treated as so charged unless it proves otherwise to the satisfaction of the Board.", or the following provisions—

"(4) A company shall be treated as having a qualifying presence in a unitary state if it has its principal place of business in such a state at any time after the relevant date.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4) above

(a) a company shall be treated as having its principal place of business in a unitary state unless it proves otherwise to the satisfaction of the Board, and

(b) the principal place of business of a company shall include both the place where the central management and control of the company is exercised and the place where the immediate day-to-day management of the company as a whole is exercised."

(8) No order shall be made under this section unless a draft if it has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Commons House of Parliament.".—[Mr. Grylls.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 57—new schedule——

'Supplementary Provisions as to Withdrawal of Tax Credits

'Recovery of tax credits incorrectly paid

1.—(1) Where the provision of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] of this Act apply so as to withdraw the entitlement of a company to claim to have a tax credit in respect of a qualifying distribution set against the income tax chargeable on its income and to have the excess of the credit over that income tax paid to it and the company (in this paragraph referred to as "the recipient company") has either had that excess paid to it, or has received an additional amount in accordance with arrangements made under Regulation 2(1) of the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (General) (Dividend) Regulations 1973, it shall be liable to a fine for the violation of the provisions of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] of this Act equal to twice the amount of the excess or additional amount as the case may be and such fine (in this section referred to as "the recoverable amount") shall be payable to the Board and treated as having become payable at the date when the excess or additional amount was paid to the recipient company and may be recovered in accordance with sub-paragraphs (2) to (5) below.

(2) The recoverable amount may be assessed and recovered as if it were unpaid tax and section 30 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 (recovery of overpayment of tax, etc) shall apply accordingly.

(3) Any amount which may be assessed and recovered as if it were unpaid tax by virtue of this paragraph shall carry interest at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum from the date when it was payable in accordance with this paragraph until the date it is paid and it is hereby declared that this paragraph applies to a recoverable amount which is paid without the making of an assessment (but is paid after it is due) and that where the recoverable amount is charged by any assessment (whether or not any part of it has been paid when the assessment is made), this paragraph applies in relation to interest running before, as well as after, the making of the assessment.

(4) Where the recoverable amount is not paid by the recipient company within six months from the date on which it became payable—

(a) the recoverable amount may at any time within six years from the date on which it became payable be assessed and recovered as if it were unpaid tax due from any person who is or was at any time prior to the expiration of the said six year period connected with the recipient company, or would have been connected on the assumption that all the facts and circumstances relating to the recipient company at the time the excess or additional amount as the case may be was paid continued to apply for six years thereafter, and section 30 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 shall apply accordingly, and

(b) as respects its accounting periods beginning with that in which the excess or additional amount referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above was paid and ending with that following that in which the recoverable amount is paid in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph, the company which made the qualifying distribution in respect of which the recipient company received the excess or additional amount shall not be entitled to set any advance corportion tax paid by it against its liability to corporation tax for such periods in accordance with section 85 of the Finance Act 1972 (payments of advance corporation tax to be set against company's liability to corporation tax on its income) nor to surrender the benefit of the whole or any part of any amount of advance corporation tax to a subsidiary in accordance with section 92 of that Act (setting of company's surplus advance corporation tax against subsidiary's liability) in such periods.

(5) Where a recoverable amount is assessed and recovered from a person connected with the recipient company in accordance with sub-paragraph (4)(a) above, that person shall be liable for the interest payable in accordance with sub-paragraph (3) above and, until the interest is so paid, sub-paragraph (4)(b) above shall apply as if the words "the interest due in accordance with sub-paragraph (3) above is paid" were substituted for the words "the recoverable amount is paid in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph".

(6) Interest payable under this paragraph shall be paid without any deduction of income tax and shall not be allowed as a deduction in computing any income, profits or losses for any tax purposes.

(7) Where under the law in force in a territory outside the United Kingdom interest is payable subject to a deduction in respect of taxation and such deduction applies to an amount of interest paid in accordance with sub-paragraph (3) above, the reference to the rate of 9 per cent. per annum in that sub-paragraph shall be deemed to be a reference to such rate of interest as after such deduction shall be equal to the rate of 9 per cent. per annum.

Claims to payment of tax credits following remedial legislation in unitary states

2.—(1) This paragraph has effect where a company to which section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] applies has a qualifying presence in a province, state or other part of a territory outside the United Kingdom which has been prescribed as a unitary state for the purposes of that section and, at the time when a qualifying distribution is made to that company by a company which is resident in the United Kingdom, that state has enacted legislation the effect of which is that, as from a future date which shall not be later than 31st December 1986, it will cease to be a unitary state within the meaning of the definition in paragraph 5(1) below, notwithstanding that it remains prescribed as such for the purposes of that section.

(2) In the circumstances described in sub-paragraph (1) above the company in receipt of the qualifying distribution shall be entitled on or after the effective date to claim to have the tax credit to which it is entitled in respect of the distribution set against its liability to income tax and to have the excess (if any) of the credit over that liability paid to it; but, if payment of the excess or of the additional amount referred to in Regulation 2(1) of the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (General) (Dividend) Regulations 1973 is made before the effective date, the provisions of paragraph 1 above shall apply in relation to that payment regardless of the enactment of the legislation referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above.

(3) For the purposes of this paragraph the effective date shall be deemed to be the date (not to be later than 31st December 1986) on which the legislation referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above actually becomes effective in the province, state or other part of the territory outside the United Kingdom which has been prescribed as a unitary state for the purposes of section

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

[Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits], irrespective of the date, if any, specified in that legislation.

Avoidance of provision withdrawing tax credits

3.—(1) In any case where arrangements are made, whether before or after section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] comes into force, as a result of which interest is paid or a discount is allowed by or through a person who is resident in the United Kingdom, or carries on business in the United Kingdom through a branch or agency, and it is reasonable to suppose that, if such payment or allowance had not been made, a qualifying distribution would have been made by the person by or through whom the payment or allowance is made, or by another company resident in the United Kingdom, to a company which has, or is an associated company of a company which has, a qualifying presence in a unitary state at the time when the payment or allowance is made, then—

(a) no person who receives that payment or allowance shall be entitled to relief from income tax or corporation tax thereon by virtue or arrangements having effect under section 497(1) of the Taxes Act, and

(b) the payment or allowance shall not be allowed as a deduction in computing any income, profits or losses for any tax purposes.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of sub-paragraph (1) above, where a payment or allowance is not of itself a payment or allowance to which sub-paragraph (1) above applies, but is made in conjunction with other payments of whatever nature and taken together with those payments has substantially similar effect to a distribution, then, for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1) above, it shall be treated as a payment of allowance within that sub-paragraph.

(3) Any company which has received such a payment of interest as is referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above, from which income tax has not been deducted by the person making the payment, and has a qualifying presence in a unitary state at the time of the payment, shall be treated for the purposes of paragraph 1 above as a company from which the entitlement to claim payment of the excess of a tax credit over the income tax chargeable on its income has been withdrawn by section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] (1) and which has had paid to to it such an excess in an amount equal to the income tax which should have been deducted from the payment of interest.

Power to inspect documents of non-resident companies

4.—(1) Where it appears to the Board that the provisions of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] and this Schedule may apply to a company resident outside the United Kingdom (in this paragraph referred to as a "foreign parent"), the Board may, by notice in writing given to the foreign parent or any associated company of that foreign parent require that company within such time (not being less than thirty days) as may be specified in the notice to make available for inspection any books, accounts, or other documents or records whatsoever of that company where in the opinion of the Board it is proper that they should inspect such documents for the purposes of ascertaining whether the said provisions apply to the foreign parent or such associated company notwithstanding that in the opinion of the person to whom the notice is given those provisions do not apply to that company or any associated company of that company.

(2) In the Table to section 98 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 (penalties) at the end of the first column there shall be added —

"Paragraph 4 of Schedule [Supplementary provisions as to withdrawal of tax credits] to the Finance Act 1985".

Meaning of "unitary state", etc.

5.—(1) In this Schedule and section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] of this Act—

"group" and "member of a group" shall be construed in accordance with section 272(1) of the Taxes Act (definition of groups of companies) with the omission of the restriction in paragraph (a) of that subsection and the substitution of the words "51 per cent." for the words "75 per cent." wherever they occur,

"qualifying distribution" has the same meaning as in Part V of the Finance Act 1972 (taxation of companies and company distributions),

"unitary state" means a province, state or other part of a territory outside the United Kingdom with the government of which the arrangements referred to in subsection (1) of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] have been made which, in taxing the income or profits of companies from sources within that province, state or other part, takes into account, or is entitled to take into account, income, receipts, deductions, outgoings or assets of such companies, or of associated companies of such companies, arising, expended or situated as the case may be outside that territory and which has been prescribed under subsection (7) of that section as a unitary state for the purposes of that section; but no such province, state or other part shall be so prescribed which only takes into account such income, receipts, deductions, outgoings or assets—

(a) if the associated company was incorporated under the law of the territory, or

(b) for the purpose of granting relief in taxing dividends received by companies.

(2) For the purposes of this Schedule and section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] of this Act—

(a) section 533 of the Taxes Act (connected persons) applies; and

(b) section 302 of the Taxes Act (meaning of "associated company" and "control") applies with the substitution of the words "six years" for "one year" in subsection (1) of that section.'.

Mr. Grylls: The clause stands in my name and those of 100 hon. Members in all parts of the House.

No doubt to some observers it will appear ironic that an early-day motion calling for action to change the corporate tax system in California, Alaska, Idaho, Montana, New Hampshire and north Dakota has attracted the support of 250 hon. Members on both sides of the House over the past few months. Such is not normally the stuff of politics here in Westminster. Although it may appear ironic, the reality is—I think that the House will agree with this — that the universally deplored, worldwide reporting system applied in those states to foreign multinationals is a potential time bomb ticking away under international trade and investment.

I hope that the new clause, which I commend to the House, will succeed in persuading United States companies to press and lobby hard their state governments and federal Government to remove that time bomb once and for all and clear up the issue of unitary tax. It has been a tremendous encouragement to me, in the preparation that I and many others have done for the new clause, to have the support of all parties in the matter, particularly because it affects trade and investment. With the high unemployment throughout the world it is a crazy time to have taxation that threatens jobs and investment.

It is important for the House to realise that worldwide the United Kingdom is second only to the United States in the amount of its overseas investments. Within the United States, British companies invest more than any other foreign multinational. Therefore, many British companies with the United States operations are at risk from the state corporate tax system. This is the important point that the House will want to grasp. The system reaches out beyond the shores of the United States to include the worldwide financial operations of a United Kingdom multinational group, although that has no conceivable relevance to the group's activities in the United States, and in that state in the United States.

That reporting system makes a nightmare of business planning and investment by multinationals, by creating uncertainty as to the tax due in a state such as California. I ask the House to consider the situation in a London headquarters company with a subsidiary in California, which is therefore subject to Californian unitary tax. That subsidiary in California cannot kno its tax liability without supplying the state authorities with such details as payroll, property and equipment in every other country throughout the world in which that British multinational operates.

The House may be interested to have an example, which brings the matter home. It is the case, which has been well written up, of the subsidiary of the EMI group, Capitol Records. It is in California, and now part of the Thorn EMI group. The Capitol Records subsidiary was asked to provide information on a worldwide reporting basis. It sent that request from the Californian state authorities to its headquarters in London, which wrote to the Californian state authorities saying, "We would love to give you this information, and would normally be happy to do so, but we happen to be a defence contractor for Her Majesty's Government, and we have signed the Official Secrets Act. If we give you this information, we shall be put in prison, so we shall not do it, even for the Californian tax authorities." The company then suffered a 25 per cent. penalty clause for non-disclosure of information from London and other parts of the world. That illustrates the unpredictability and irrationality of such taxation.

The sheer unpredictability and illogicality of such a method of tax assessment threatens investment and trade. Above all, it strikes a blow at the internationally accepted principles of taxation by creating tax liabilities in a state which bear no direct relation to profits earned in that state. For the purposes of state taxation, the method can turn a company's loss in a state into a profit by bringing in the worldwide figures. Perhaps more seriously, it burdens companies with the unproductive work of creating and producing information and translating it into dollars from the foreign currencies in which those subsidiary companies operate. That is not sensible. An example of this is that the worldwide accounts of companies must be recomputed in dollar terms and must conform to American accounting standards. That is especially offensive when a state—a political subdivision of a nation—attempts to carry out what is, in effect, foreign policy. I am sure that those who created the constitution of the United States did not intend that the individual states should carry out foreign policy by asking for information in that way.

To draw an analogy closer to home, it is as though Lambeth borough council asked for worldwide information from an American company whose United Kingdom subsidiary was based in Lambeth. That would be an impertinence and an abuse of the powers of Lambeth borough council. I am sure that it would do no such thing. That is comparable with what is happening in some American states. It runs counter to all the work that has been done. Through double taxation treaties, the United States and Britain have worked for many years to eliminate barriers to trade and investment, which were created, understandably, by the variety of tax systems in the world. The arms-length system of taxation embodied in our treaty network and that of the United States is the international standard and the custom of nations. It is recognised by the OECD and by the United Nations. The use of the worldwide reporting system violates that standard.

I should run through what has happened since the United Kingdom-United States treaty was being negotiated in 1975, because the history of what happened is the basis of new clause 27. When the current treaty was being negotiated in 1975, it contained a clause—clause 9(4)—which would effectively have barred unitary tax. That would have been fine. Unfortunately, although clause 9(4) was passed by a majority in the Senate, it was not passed by the necessary two thirds majority, and it failed. By this American action, Britain was placed in the position of either rejecting the entire treaty — some would describe that as throwing out the baby with the bathwater —or of accepting it without clause 9(4). The House, rightly, accepted the treaty, subject to assurances from Ministers that they would press for an early resolution of the issue, backed by assurances from the United States that it would use its best endeavours to secure an early solution.

On 18 February 1980, the then Minister of State—my right hon. and learned Friend the present Chief Secretary—said:

"To those who remain concerned about the unitary question, I say that there is no disposition on the part of the Government to let the issue die. If the House approves the convention and if it is ratified thereafter, we shall be prepared to place on record, for all to see, our reservations on the unitary system. The Administration of the United States were left in no doubt by what I told them . . . We do not propose to bury the issue if the House gives its approval to the convention and the three protocols." —[Official Report, 18 February 1980; Vol. 979, c. 179-99.]

When ratification took place on 25 March 1980 — entering into force on 25 April 1980 — the British Government expressed to the United States Administration strong disapproval of the worldwide combined reporting system. In a note to the United States Administration, the Government said:

"It must be emphasised however that the acceptance of the Senate reservation"— taking out clause 9(4)—

"in no way implies approval of the unitary basis and that it is the urgent request of Her Majesty's Government for the reasons given above that the Government of the United States should use its best endeavours to eliminate the international application of the unitary basis of taxation".

United States' companies received substantial tax concessions as a result of the treaty in return for the inclusion of clause 9(4) prohibiting the use of unitary tax. Clause 9(4) was to be, in the words of the then Senator Morgan, who participated in that debate in the Senate, "a concession for a concession".

I believe that in 1980 the House would not have ratified the treaty without United States' assurances that the unitary tax problem would be solved.

Since 1980 there have been various attempts in the United States Congress, as my colleagues who visit the United States regularly will know, to put through a Bill outlawing unitary tax. It is odd that, despite general antipathy in Washington towards this unfair system, so far none of these Bills has succeeded in being passed. It seems that, whenever a Bill has approached the winning post, another general election has been called, and the whole process has had to start again. I suppose that we have the same problem here. During this period the United Kingdom Government and many other Governments have pressed vigorously for an end to this perverse system.

I should like to pay a warm tribute to the staff of the British embassy in Washington who, over these five or seven years, have worked hard to resolve this issue. I pay particular tribute to the Economic Secretary in the embassy, Mr. Harry Walsh, who has just returned to London. He had become one of the great experts there. He slaved away on this issue and worked tirelessly to produce a solution. I should like to thank the British consulates at the state level which have negotiated and done what they can. I pay tribute also to Treasury Ministers and their officials in the United Kingdom, in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and especially in the Inland Revenue, who have borne the burden of this continuing problem.

[Mr. Grylls]

Two years ago, on 12 July 1983, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in a letter to the then Treasury Secretary, Donald Regan, said that he was "keen for the matter to be resolved . . . before harm is done between our two countries."

I emphasise that quotation, because hon. Members and all the British people do not want in any way to damage our relations with our strongest and, perhaps, favourite ally. I think that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had that point very much in mind. However, the problem has not been resolved.

In September 1983 President Reagan set up a working group to look into the problem. The Prime Minister, who was visiting Washington at that time, chivvied the President to resolve the issue and, with commendable farsightedness, warned the Administration:

"We might be under very severe pressure to take retaliatory action."

Two years later we find ourselves having to do just that.

12.15 am

I pay tribute also to the efforts of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. He lobbied for industry during his recent visit to California and I know that that was helpful.

By the autumn of 1983, despite all the efforts that had been made, three years had passed and the promises of 1980, which I have quoted, to resolve the issue had not been met. Frustration and impatience were being expressed in Westminster and British firms were becoming increasingly caught up in a tax nightmare. I hope that the House will feel strongly that it is our duty and that of the Government to protect the interests of individuals travelling abroad and those of companies that operate abroad.

In April 1984, seven months later, there were no signs of progress from the United States working group. I went to Washington to announce details of a retaliatory clause that we had tabled last year. The clause had the support of many of my hon. Friends. Unfortunately, and I believe mistakenly, the Government refused to back the clause and to have a debate last summer, almost precisely at this time of year. They claimed that it was premature to retaliate.

There is no doubt that the tabling of the clause in 1984 alerted United States opinion to the real possibility of legislation being enacted in Westminster to retaliate against them. As a result of publishing the clause last year, there was evidence of fresh activity in the United States against the continuation of unitary tax. There were clear signs of United States companies working hard to get rid of it.

When the clause was not inserted in the Finance Bill 1984, it seemed that United States corporations saw that the threat of retaliatory action had receded. Later in 1984, the working group reported. It recommended what it described as a "water's edge" solution. At that time the United States Treasury Secretary wrote to the President as follows:

"If there are not sufficient signs of appreciable progress by the States in this area by 31st July next year whether by legislation of administrative action, I will recommend to you that the Administration propose federal legislation that would give effect to a water's edge limitation patterned after that in the Chairman's Report."

That was the result of the working group's activity.

I pay tribute to the states that have repealed their unitary tax provisions since then — including Oregon, Florida and Colorado—but it is important that during the debate the United States Administration is left in no doubt that the House does not regard the action by those states as being enough to constitute "appreciable progress" in removing unitary tax and that it does not constitute a real solution to the problem. It is not our job to pick off states one by one.

The problem will not be met until California and the other five unitary states have passed satisfactory legislation, or until the federal Administration has produced a solution that will stand for the whole United States. In many ways a federal solution would be the best one.

Over the past year, attempts — unfortunately all in vain so far—have been made in Sacramento, the state capital of California—to progress legislation on unitary tax. I am grateful to the governor of California for the personal efforts that he has made to seek a solution to the unitary tax problem. Only two weeks ago I went to California to see what progress was being made and, perhaps more importantly, to express the continuing anger and frustration of many in the House and in British industry that so little progress had been made.

United States business men whom I met, and Japanese business men, all told me that they wanted a solution to the problem. That view is shared by our European Community partners, especially the Netherlands, France and Germany, and by Japan, Canada and Switzerland. However, satisfactory legislation in one form or another still eludes us seven years after the treaty was signed and after assurances were given to the House of Commons. This House, which has been patient almost to a fault during that period, can no longer wring its hands and hope that something will be done. The time for action has come. We must apply leverage on the United States to secure a complete, satisfactory and final solution to this irritating problem. That is the reason for new clause 27.

Since the first retaliatory clause was tabled in 1984, extensive consultations have taken place with business and lawyers to try to provide in this new retaliatory clause a greater element of flexibility for the Government when deciding how widespread the United Kingdom countermeasures should be. When it is triggered by statutory instrument, the clause would withdraw payments of tax credits to United States companies with a substantial business presence in unitary tax states — for example, California.

There are three options. Depending upon which of the three options the Government choose, the trigger will affect United States companies in the United Kingdom which have 7·5 per cent. or more of their property, payroll or sales in a unitary tax state, or which are subject to tax on income in a unitary tax state, or which have their principal place of business in a unitary tax state. Those are the three triggers that the Government will have at their disposal if the House decides to accept the new clause. My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), who is a very experienced lawyer, has been working with me on this new clause. He will expand a little further, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the details.

The House will want to know what advice those hon. Members who have sponsored the new clause will be giving to the Government about when they should activate one of the three triggers. Such a decision will not be easy for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his colleagues in Government. I pay tribute to them for having expressed considerable sympathy for the clause and for enabling this debate to take place. Rather like marriage, retaliation against a friend and ally is not something to be entered into lightly.

We must all hope that if this new clause is passed it will succeed in inspiring action in California and the other sunitary tax states during the remaining few weeks of the 1985 legislative session. We must also hope that it will inspire action in Washington and that they will lobby the federal Government to use their influence to solve this problem. If they do not, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not flinch from pulling a trigger which will hit United States companies where it hurts: on their bottom line. That would produce a response.

If the new clause is successful in motivating the United States Administration, the states and business to secure a solution to this problem, the trigger could be released just as quickly as it had been pressed.

I pay tribute to the determination of the 50 companies which some years ago formed themselves into the unitary tax campaign which has worked very hard to solve this problem. A number of the companies benefit from the application of unitary tax. Despite that, they believe that the principle is wrong and they vigorously oppose it. I pay tribute to them for their stand. I pay tribute also to the chairman of the unitary tax campaign, Mr. Peter Welch, and to Professor Peter Whiteman, QC, a highly skilled lawyer who has helped us to draft the new clause. If the new clause is accepted, the House will owe him a great debt. The CBI, too, should be praised for its action in sending a mission earlier this year to California.

Although I have criticised the Government for resisting the pressure for retaliation in 1984, I am the first to say that the Government, including the Chancellor, the Foreign Secretary and the Financial Secretary, have shown admirable resolution and determination in pressing for a solution to the problem. I hope that the House will approve the new clause and that the Financial Secretary will agree that the time has come to put these powers on to the statute book.

Dr. Marek: I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member fo Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) and to hear the long roll call of people who have been involved in the campaign and the various actions that they had taken to arrive at the position which we are discussing tonight.

However, missing from the hon. Gentleman's comments was any justification from the point of view of, say, California as to why that state felt that it had no option other than to institute unitary taxation. The hon. Gentleman said that such taxation could, in a particular example, change a loss into a profit. That may be so from an examination of the company's books, but it may not be so from a careful examination of whether transfer pricing between different parts of the company—remembering that we are talking about multinationals—has taken place between one country and another. That is the problem facing us as we consider the new clause.

Companies do not have a code of morality and say, "We honestly believe that we made 20 per cent. of our profits as a multinational in the United Kingdom, so we will pay 20 per cent. of the tax to the UK, and the respective rates of tax in all the countries in which we operate." Multinationals will, by and large, try to minimise the tax that they pay worldwide, and rightly so. If, say, in California wage rates, land taxes or whatever are high, multinationals will minimise the tax that they pay in California and maximise the tax that they pay in, say, Taiwan and Korea. The same is true of multinationals based and registered in this country.

For a company that is based in this country and has much of its business in America, it gets caught by way of unitary taxation, and there is a real problem for such companies. There is an inherent unfairness in a system by which some states apply the normal code of taxation and others apply unitary taxation because, in effect, that creates double taxation, and that hits particularly hard those companies whcih are registered in, say, the UK but have a substantial trading interest in a country which applies unitary taxation, such as California. It is clear, therefore, that the system is not fair. For that reason I hope that the new clause will be accepted.

However, price fixing and transfer pricing by multinational companies operates not to the benefit of this country. It is not to the benefit of this country. Having said that, I do not think that affects the issue of unitary taxation. It ought to be looked at but not now.

I wish the new clause well. We cannot have two systems working side by side. We will either have to have one or the other. We do not have unitary taxation, there is no prospect of it coming, therefore it is sensible to see if we can get rid of it.

12.30 am

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I very rarely speak in finance debates. I am quite sure that the rule of the road should be brevity, but I have perhaps some small credentials to speak in this matter because I have spent virtually the whole of my political and personal life as a devotee of the United States. I went to college there. I earned my living there for some 17 years. I bought my first house there. I was married there. I have a son there who is a banker. I am a director of two American companies. I visit the United States many times each year and I have the honour of representing, indirectly no doubt, some 23,000 American airmen who have the good fortune to be stationed in my constituency. So I make no bones about it. The United States is my second home, and my dearest wish in politics is that the Anglo-American alliance shall continue to be the bulwark of freedom and prosperity in the western world.

But there is one thing that I have never been able to stand when it comes from the United States and that is the attempt occasionally to export American policies beyond the water's edge and to impose them on other people. They tried that at the federal level in respect of the Soviet population and certain states, those named by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) in particular, California, have been seeking to do so for a number of years in respect of unitary taxation. It is a subject that my hon. Friend dealt with copiously and clearly. There is not much more I need to say about it. But I have discussed this matter with American bankers, businessmen and politicians these 10 years and there is general agreement among those who care for the maximising of trade between the two sides of the Atlantic and indeed between the two sides of the Pacific that unitary tax is bad for business, bad for trade and bad for our relations and the United States ought to get rid of it.

[Sir Eldon Griffiths]

As my hon. Friend has said, over the years we have tried virtually every which way, if I can use an Americanism. We have tried the legal route and got nowhere. We have tried the congressional route and got nowhere. We have tried the lobbying route through American businesses, banks and exporters and again we have failed. Consequently we are driven, reluctantly, to the retaliatory route. I, for one, always hoped that it would not be necessary that we should ever come to a point where it would be the duty, as I see it, of Parliament to put into the hands of Government the means of retaliating against the United States in this particular area, but as a friend of America I believe we now have no choice left.

I would simply, if I may, in supporting this clause, make these few simple points. There is nothing to be said in favour of unitary tax. It flies in the face of the broad movement towards the liberalisation of world trade. It is contrary to the declared policy of successive American Administrations, Democrat as well as Republican. It is damaging to the best interests of United States business abroad and it is worth saying that the third industrial power in the world, after the United States and Japan, is not the Soviet Union. It is not the Federal Republic of Germany. It is American industry abroad and it is contrary to the best interests of that industry that this tax should continue.

I hope that the federal Government will screw up their courage and find the time and the persistence to get rid of it at the federal level. I suggest to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, whose diligence in this matter I admire, that he should not only accept this clause when the House comes to consider it but that he should go further. He must bring this point home to the United States. He can do it in four ways.

First, there are now some 5,000 American lawyers in London. They will shortly be in Westminster Hall. It is important that not one of those lawyers should leave London without knowing how the British Government feel about unitary taxation. Secondly, he should ask representatives of all substantial American multinationals headquartered in London to come to the Treasury and to hear, from Ministers if possible, but if not from senior officials, that we mean business in this matter. The more of those representatives that are told precisely what the feelings of the House are, the better it will be.

Thirdly, it is enormously important to strengthen British representation in California. I have many times said in the House that the Foreign Office's judgment of America is faulty. I have lived there long enough to know that that is so. There should be a strengthening of our representation on the west coast of America, even if it means some reduction of our representation on the east coast. The consulate in Los Angeles is inadequately staffed, and it is important to increase that staff, if only to get this point across.

Finally, I suggest to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that he seriously considers putting full page advertisements in the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Wall Street Journal Europe and, above all, the Los Angeles Times, explaining very carefully that the best allies of America and some of the closest friends of California have said in the House of Commons that we cannot tolerate any longer the discrimination that this unitary tax imposes on us, and we expect them to get rid of it. The more that that can be put in the major national newspapers—television would follow—the more that it will be brought home. The matter can be resolved if the Government will follow what the House has started tonight.

Mr. Blair: The hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) has been admirably clear and thorough in his presentation of the new clause, and I can therefore be brief.

The major employer in my constituency is Thorn EMI and, therefore, I am aware of the problems of unitary taxation. There is no doubt that it adversely affects United Kingdom companies. I agree with the general aims of the unitary tax campaign, and the Labour party will support the new clause.

However, we should appreciate the seriousness of what we are contemplating, and examine the drafting and timing of the new clause. We should also reflect on the frustration that has given rise to it, because we are taking a serious step.

It is essential to remember that the new clause is not proposing to cure unitary taxation, because we cannot do that, but is a retaliation against it. It is important that that point is made, because it emphasises that we are not taking this step lightly, but after a due consideration of the difficulties.

One can understand how unitary taxation came about. It began in California before the second world war, mainly as a result of the activities of certain movie companies sending earnings abroad. In California, the spirit behind the tax was, quite properly, to prevent creative international accounting. Unfortunately, California introduced unitary taxation, whereas most other countries attempted to have transfer pricing arrangements, as we do. They are particularly difficult. When considering these factors, one is considering activities within a particular state as well as worldwide.

California remains the main state of difficulty, and I understand from an article in the Financial Times that getting on for two-thirds of the revenue raised from unitary taxation is raised in that state. The main problem for United Kingdom companies is the enormous compliance costs involved in the unitary taxation system. These result not just in the specific problems that the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West referred to, because another difficulty is the sheer scale of the information that has to be given in order for the unitary taxation rules to be applied. He quite rightly went through the problems that have arisen since the 1975 double taxation agreement.

There are difficulties in connection with the United States Federal Government. One understands in particular the sensitivity of states over Federal Government interference in state activities and state prerogatives. The Federal Government have shown a certain sensitivity over this, or at least that has been the stated reason for slow progress, but the Federal Government must make far greater use of the opportunity they have to bring pressure to bear on the states to change.

Two events which occurred in 1983 are worth mentioning. First of all, there was the decision in the Container Corporation case, where the Supreme Court of the United States determined that unitary taxation was not outlawed by the constitution. But that was a majority decision with a strong dissent, and the United States Justice Department was not briefed to appear in that case but attempted to appear after it ended. The commission set up by Secretary Regan, which reported in July 1984, looked at the matter in a certain way. In particular, it recommended that unitary taxation should be restricted to the water's edge; in other words, confined to taxing as a unit a company's activities within the United States.

According to the Unitary Taxation Campaign, there are still nine states with unitary taxation, which means that they go across the water's edge. There seems to be some disagreement as to the precise number of states. Some Treasury Ministers put the figure at six and the Library told me it was seven. Perhaps the Financial Secretary could elucidate on that. When the Regan commission reported, it set a deadline of 31 July 1985 for the states to take action on unitary taxation. That deadline is fairly close now, and I hope that this new clause, if it is passed, will give the Government a negotiating weapon. It will be a sign of our seriousness of intent to allow the federal and state governments to recognise exactly what we are contemplating.

The new clause meets the injustice of unitary taxation with the fairly rough justice of retaliation. Were a state to be designated by an Order of the House, any company with a qualifying presence within that state would not be able to claim back the refund of ACT under the double taxation treaty. That is a fairly heavy penalty for those companies with a qualifying presence in that state to bear. One hopes that that will encourage them to put pressure on their own state Governments to change their attitude towards unitary taxation.

It is right that the House will have to approve an order before the new clause can come into operation. We are expressing the seriousness of our concern, but we are saying, "We do not want to go all the way until they have had another chance to put their house in order." The new clause will force the pace towards abolition of unitary taxation.

12.45 am

The British Insurance Association and a number of insurance companies are worried about the difficulties that could arise for them if the new clause is implemented. I should like an assurance from the Financial Secretary that their representations would be taken into account before it was decided to put an order before the House.

It is important that the new clause has all-party support and that the House is united in identifying the problem and in its desire to ensure that discrimination against British companies is prevented. If it is felt that an order should be put before us—we hope that the need for that will not arise—it would be wise for the Opposition to be kept fully informed of the state of play, so that the all-party support can be retained. It is important that we should act as one.

The issue is important to British firms. We hope that the United States Government and the state governments will note the strong feeling of both sides of the House and will act voluntarily, rather than wait for the threat of retaliation to become actuality.

Sir William Clark: I support my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls). Like him, I have been battling for years against unitary taxation.

I wholeheartedly agree with the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) that it is a great boost to our battle that the new clause has all-party support. The Financial Secretary would be wise to note the comments of the hon. Member and to stress to the United States Government that we are not making party points.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) brought in multinational companies. We do not want to complicate the issue. We are talking about unitary tax and that has nothing to do with multinational companies.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield mentioned the worries of the British Insurance Association. It fears that if we take action against the United States the fourth convention will be cancelled. I cannot envisage that happening. The fears of the BIA are unfounded.

We are talking about an iniquitous tax which is anti-investment in the United States. We have well over $30 billion of investment abroad. As my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West said in a speech which everyone has commended for its clarity and lucidity, British companies own well over 20 per cent. of all foreign investment in the United States.

When I was in Washington before the presidential election I met Mr. McClure, the chairman of the working party set up by the President, and I told him in no uncertain terms what Back Benchers on both sides of the House thought of unitary tax. I warned him—and I am glad that the Prime Minister said much the same thing to the President — that pressure from both sets of Back Benches would be such that our Government would have to give way eventually, whether on the next Budget or the one after that.

Here we are at the next Budget. The United States has not taken on board what unitary tax could lead to. There is a great deal of British and American investment in Third-world countries. If any country thinks it legitimate and good business to have unitary tax, it would be disastrous for overseas investment for both the United Kingdom and the United States. I accept that this is retaliatory action. We can control only what we control, and we control only advanced corporation tax. That means on a £100 gross dividend that instead of an American investor receiving £85, in future he will receive only £70 because he will not get the 50 per cent. reduction in ACT. That should be pressed home because the latest figures show that the ACT concession for the United States is well above £300 million. If American companies, which invest in the United Kingdom and receive British dividends, realise that their income is at risk, the Federal Government may come under more domestic pressure.

I recognise that the Federal Government have difficulties in that the states are autonomous. On the other hand, if we had inserted the clause about outlawing unitary tax in 1975, it would have been mandatory on all the states because the sovereignty of the Federal Government in Washington means that they can sign an international agreement which binds all the states.

[Sir William Clark]

We must bring pressure to bear on the Washington Government to end this iniquity. We are approaching 31 July and we cannot allow the present position to continue. I earnestly hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will accept the clause, and that he and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will trigger off the three points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West. That is the only way to bring home to the Americans that we mean business and that unitary tax must cease.

Mr. Pike: I shall speak only briefly, because the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) argued the case well, and my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) made the points that I intended to make. I support the new clause because it takes the right line. It is unfortunate that the line that the Government have pursued for many years has been unsuccessful in achieving the result for which we have wished. If the Government accept the amendment and it is carried, I hope that it will not be necessary to trigger the lines of action proposed in the clause, and that the Government will not find it necessary to return to the House for an order to take retaliatory action. I hope that California and the Federal Government realise that we mean business and that we intend to ensure free trade.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) referred to multinational companies, but the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) took his comments out of context. The new clause has all-party support, as has the early-day motion, in spite of doubts among my right hon. and hon. Friends about multinationals.

I have some doubts and fears about multinationals, but I recognise the importance of the taxation rather than the trade issue. It is significant that, despite fears and worries, Opposition Members are prepared to support the early-day motion and the new clause. I hope that the new clause is accepted and that it is not necessary to trigger the orders. I hope that the California authorities in particular will wake up and realise that we mean business. The House as a whole is saying that if they do not, we shall, unfortunately, have to retaliate. We hope that we do not have to take that action.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I have a small qualification to take part in the debate because, when the double tax treaty was about to be ratified back in 1979, I wrote a book on the topic—one of the few ways in which members of the Bar can draw their presence to the attention of solicitors. A few hundred copies of the book survive and can be obtained at discount rates. I never quite made the Jeffrey Archer class, so I never needed to take advantage of the provisions of the double tax treaty in relation to the international earnings which I received from that book.

The topic has concerned British industry for a long time, so it is important to examine the way in which the clause is drafted and to discover why particular words are used rather than the alternatives which might have been used. It is important to recognise that this is merely enabling legislation which might never be used if the appropriate remedial action is taken.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) said, the financial consequences of the new clause would be severe for many companies if we had to activate its provisions. It would deny tax credit equivalent to £15 on a £100 dividend to the parent company in the United States which would otherwise benefit from the repatriation of profits from United Kingdom subsidiaries.

The companies affected are those which have a substantial presence in the unitary tax state which operates the worldwide combined reporting system. The qualifying presence is defined as applying to a United Kingdom subsidiary which is a member of a group which has 7·5 per cent. or more of its property payroll or sales in a unitary tax state. That formula is used deliberately, because it is that which is used in the unitary tax states themselves and will therefore be familiar to companies operating there.

It is important to know that the terms property payroll or sales are disjunctive and not conjunctive and therefore that, if any one of them gives rise to the 7·5 per cent. trigger, the clause will affect all the companies which operate in that state. This is important to United States corporations because they already have to compile the information for state taxes. It is therefore available and will not involve any extra administrative costs to provide it to the Inland Revenue.

The 7·5 per cent. test could have been applied to income and we could have given ourselves extra test, but we decided to reject that because conceptual problems might otherwise have arisen — such as whether we should choose gross or net income and whether it should be income for United States tax purposes or for the tax purposes of some other jurisdiction. It seemed much simpler to restrict ourselves to the tried and tested formula of the unitary tax states.

Why have we chosen 7·5 per cent.? Many right hon. and hon. Members have said that the main problem is California. I am convinced that, if California takes the lead in getting rid of unitary tax, the other states will follow. California accounts for about 12·5 per cent. of American gross domestic product. That means that most American companies might come into the net if we have to activate new clause 27. Although, on that basis, the average company would have 12·5 per cent. of its assets in California, the figure pitched that high would have left many companies out of the net. We considered that the same was true for 10 per cent., so the next logical step seemed 7·5 per cent.

Why did we not go lower? In this respect, the other states that apply income tax come into play. The other states are small and there are few companies in the United States that would have more than 7·5 per cent. of their profit, payroll or sales in a state such as North Dakota. It seems that 7·5 per cent. is adequate to catch enough companies in California so that pressure can be put on the state legislature to remove the unitary tax provisions. If California repeals, the effect of the new clause is spent. Some states are not as legislatively busy as the rest of us. North Dakota, for example, has a lively system—its state legislature does not meet at all next year so, without a special session, it will be unable to conform to the new clause.

The onus of proof of entitlement to the tax credit for a company that would otherwise be caught by the new clause lies on the company, not the Inland Revenue. That means that the company must prove that it is not in the unitary tax net. It is not for the Revenue to dispute with the company its coming within the ambit of the clause, but for the company to prove that it can take advantage of the double tax treaty.

The Treasury should act early or, once again, people in California will assume that we are not serious and that this is just so much huffing and puffing. I do not think that the consequences that have been feared would necessarily follow from early action. Under subsection (7)(a), the orders that the Treasury would have to lay can be backdated to 1 April 1985. That blocks any avoidance possibilities by which United States corporations could attempt to avoid the clause by repatriating massive dividends now and draining their subsidiaries in Britian of funds. As that is a possibility, but as we do not want to create too much uncertainty in international trade, there should be as little retrospection as possible. We should therefore have action as quickly as possible.

There are two alternative triggers to the 7·5 per cent. test to which I have already referred. One is a wide alternative trigger and the other is a narrow one. On the basis of the wide alternative the Revenue would be able to trigger the proposals in the new clause in relation to any company which has a qualifying presence in, for example, California by virtue of having any of its income subject to state taxes. The narrower definition would mean that the principal place of business of the company should be in the unitary tax state. This gives enormous flexibility to the Revenue but also creates uncertainty. The states which operate unitary tax systems should realise that there is a wide battery of possibilities open to us and that we are determined that the new clause will be effective if it ever needs to be activated. That should encourage states to take early action to remove the cause of difficulty.

If by some mischance a company tries to evade or avoid the ambit of the new clause, a variety of penalties are provided in the new schedule. A fine could be levied equal to twice the tax credit. This type of fine is important as it entails the company not just repaying the tax credit that it has already received but suffering a fine equivalent to the tax credit plus an equivalent amount on top. That is important because, under the internal revenue code of the United States, fines are not deductible from corporate profits for tax purposes, so it would increase the cost to US corporations attempting to avoid or evade the new clause.

Interest is set at the rate of 9 per cent. under paragraph 1(3) of the new schedule, effective from the time when the tax credit is paid. The loss of the right to set-off is covered in paragraph 1(4)(b), which provides for a loss of the right to set-off advance corporation tax on the dividend which cannot then be set against mainstream corporation tax liability. The right to set-off is not only lost for the accounting period in which the tax credit is paid to the company but can be carried forward indefinitely if there is any excess or surplus available for that purpose.

Various avoidance techniques might be used to try to get around the working of the clause, but I believe that we have effectively prevented them from succeeding. For example, what would happen if the United States parent company refused to pay the fine? Paragrpah 1(4)(a) of the new schedule provides that the fine can be recovered from the United Kingdom subsidiary or from any connected company. What if the United Kingdom subsidiary pays the dividend and the parent company then liquidates the subsidiary to try to circumvent the clause? The liquidated company is deemed to exist for a further six years and if a new subsidiary is formed in its place within six years that company will be liable for the accumulated fines in relation to the original infraction. Thus, both simple liquidation and liquidation followed by reincorporation will be ineffective.

If a United Kingdom subsidiary or connected company pays the interest or the fine on behalf of the United States corporation, that will not be deductible for corporation tax purposes in this country. The purpose of that provision is to recapitulate for our own tax regime the effect of a fine not being deductible for tax purposes under the American internal revenue code.

The United States parent company subjected to fines and interest will have to pay the interest gross whereas normally the withholding of tax is deducted first and the interest is paid to the recipient net. That, too, will reduce the benefit of attempting to avoid the purposes of the clause.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and others have referred to the use of creative accounting techniques, but I believe that we have prevented the use of such techniques by paragraph 3(1) of the new schedule. For example, if a United States parent company lends a United Kingdom subsidiary, say $1 billion and then charges 10 per cent. interest on the loan as a notional transaction intended to convert what would otherwise have been paid by way of dividend to a payment by way of interest, that too will be covered because the new schedule provides that interest paid where it is reasonable to suppose that a qualifying distribution would otherwise have been made will not avoid the provisions of the new clause.

The draconian powers of inspection and requirement of information in paragraph 4 are based on the controlled foreign companies provisions rushed through the House last year without debate and with the connivance of the Opposition, so I hope that both Front Benches will approve of the insertion of those provisions.

The measure that we propose is draconian, but desperate diseases require desperate remedies and that is the situation in which we now find ourselves. I repeat, however, that the effect of the new clause can be avoided by timely action by the states concerned. If repealing legislation is passed by 31 December 1986, even if the new clause is put into effect in the meantime, the United States corporations affected will get their 15 per cent. tax credit and will be no worse off than they now are even if the repealing legislation was not in force when the distribution payment was made. I believe that that will be a great incentive to action by California and I hope that the authorities there will take the hint.

It may be argued that we are setting a precedent, but I believe that the United States has already set the precedents. For example, the United States double tax treaty with France came into being as a result of a threat of retaliatory action of the kind that we propose today. Section 891 of the American internal revenue code sets that out, so in a sense we are simply following the action of the United States and not setting a precedent of our own.

It may be argued that our proposal overrides the double tax treaty and that that itself is a precedent. If the proposals were triggered off, they would certainly override the provisions of that treaty, but there are precedents for that in the United States. For example, the Foreign Investment in Real Property Tax Act 1980, which became effective on 1 January this year, specifically overrides all the double tax treaties entered into by the United States with all countries around the world. The Americans have thus introduced domestic legislation of their own which overrides international obligations entered into freely by treaty; and that was a unilateral move on their part.

[Mr. Neil Hamilton]

In relation to our own double tax treaty, too, the United States has overridden one of the articles. There is therefore a precedent for action in that context, too, in so far as the American Internal Revenue Service has made a ruling which overrides the provisions of the treaty in relation to insurance premiums received by United Kingdom insurance companies.

I believe, therefore, that this measure is timely and necessary. I do not believe that it will lead to retaiiation by the United States. I believe that the Federal Goverment are determined to see an end to this problem in the interests of their own international trade and that the cost to United States companies of inaction by the Californian authorities will be very great indeed. If the Government support the new clause today they will do a great service not just to the cause of business in this country but to the whole international trading and business community.

I commend the new clause to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary and I hope that what he has to say today will be trumpeted across the Atlantic as a meaningful and determined attempt to declare war upon a system of taxation which is as unjust and damaging to the insterests of the United States as it is to the interests of this country and of all other countries affected by it.

1.15 am

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I support the motion, and urge others to support it. It is timely, as the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) said. Some would say that it is long overdue. When the tax treaty came before the House, we had the opportunity to exert considerable pressure on the Administration, and, through the Administration, upon the states in the United States, to rectify the situation that had arisen. Although assurances were given, action did not result to the extent that we had hoped.

I have come firmly to the conclusion that only this sort of retaliation will pay the dividends that we want. In the mid-1970s I remember discussing the matter with Governor Brown in California and trying to get him to see the sense of the argument that was being put to him. It was clear that he was not going to budge an inch, and that no other state government would, unless there was a clear reason for them to do so, in responding to their own electorate and their interests. The only way in which we can bring that about is by putting on the pressure proposed in the new clause.

Therefore, I hope that the House will give its full support to the new clause and that the Government will enthusiastically welcome it as a means to put pressure upon the Federal Government and through them on the state legislature, so that this ridiculous situation can be resolved.

Mr. Moore: I shall try to be brief, but the House will understand that it is essential that I express with great care and clarity the Government's attitude to the clause.

This has been a major debate on an issue of great importance to the United Kingdom, the United States and all our trading partners. If I may say so, the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) was fully in keeping with the importance of the issue. The House is indebted to him and his colleagues — I specifically mention my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann), who is not with us tonight but who has been long active in the campaign, and my hon. Friends the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), and for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). It is important that on the issue we have had consistent all-party support. I particularly welcomed the speech by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), representing the official Opposition, that of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), and the continued presence throughout the debate of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). It is crucial that we have a clear signal on whatever we do in the area. The consistent all-party support has been a key feature of the debates on the issue.

It is clear that my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West spoke for the whole House when he referred to the widely felt frustration that a solution to the problem has been so long delayed. It is equally clear that he spoke for the House when he said that the time had come for Parliament to take legislative action to register the United Kingdom's determination to see that a solution of the problem is achieved in the United States. That was borne out by contributions to the debate from all parts of the House. It is reinforced by the number of hon Members — again from all parts of the House — who have put their names to the new clause on the amendment paper.

I should like to make it clear that the Government strongly endorse everything that has been said in the debate about the imposition of unitary taxation on United Kingdom-controlled companies and other non-American corporations.

The basic objection to unitary tax is that it is contrary to the internationally accepted principle of allocating profits where a company or group operates internationally. That is that tax authorities charge tax on foreign-owned companies only on the profits arising in the country or state for which they are responsible. The arm's-length method is recognised by both the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and United Nations, and is enshrined in a worldwide network of bilateral double taxation treaties including the treaties to which the United States is party. It provides a coherent and consistent tax framework for international trade and investment.

As applied by states such as California, the unitary tax method applies a formula apportionment to the worldwide profits of a multinational group to establish the tax due in California. In doing so, a unitary state is reaching beyond the borders of its own jurisdiction and taxing profits earned outside it, and thus breaching the internationally accepted principles.

For individual companies, as many hon. Members have said, that means unfair tax bills and excessive compliance costs. It can also produce double taxation. Income earned by the foreign parent of a United States subsidiary is taken into account in the unitary tax bill, and taxed without any relief for overseas tax. Multinational groups can be taxed on more than 100 per cent. of their income in a particular state, and a loss can be turned into a taxable profit. Another serious objection is the excessive compliance burden imposed by worldwide unitary tax. The method inevitably involves financial information on the worldwide activities of the group, which can be extremely burdensome in practice. It is objectionable that a state tax authority should demand information about the financial records of United Kingdom companies, and their subsidiaries, which are outside the United States and unrelated to activities within the United States.

If unitary tax continues, it will distort investment decisions. The immediate effect is to damage inward investment in the states that impose it. There is increasing recognition in the United States that it is, therefore, in the economic interest of such states to remove it.

The damage goes wider than that. If unitary tax continues, it will disrupt the internationally accepted taxation framework, and have a damaging effect on the development of world trade. The importance of a solution is, therefore, self-evident.

A speedy resolution of the problem is especially important to the United Kingdom, because the cumulative total of United Kingdom investment in the United States is now more than $32 billion. This is more than any other country and represents nearly a quarter of all foreign direct investment in the United States. In 1983 alone, the United Kingdom invested more than $3·7 billion in the United States, which accounted for 32 per cent. of the total of foreign direct investment in the United States in that year.

The American Administration recognised this as long ago as 1977, when the United Kingdom and America negotiated a provision in the tax treaty to prevent individual states from applying the unitary method to United Kingdom companies. The proposed treaty was ratified by the House of Commons in 1977. However, article 9(4) was rejected by the United States Senate in 1978. The United Kingdom Government were then assured that the United States Administration would use their best endeavours to secure a solution.

Since then, there has been some progress, but not enough. There was a major setback, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said, when the United States Supreme Court ruled in the Container case that the California worldwide unitary method was not unconstitutional, at least so far as it was applied to a United States parent corporation and its foreign subsidiaries.

However, a working group was set up under the then Treasury Secretary Regan to seek to resolve the issue. The group reached a consensus on the general principle that unitary taxation should be limited to the United States water's edge. But it left important issues on the application of that general principle unresolved. In his report to the President in July 1984, Secretary Regan said that these issues should be left for resolution at state level. However, he also said that if there were not,

"sufficient signs of appreciable progress by the states,"

by 31 July 1985, he would recommend to the President that the Administration propose federal legislation to give effect to a water's edge limitation.

It is right to recognise the importance that the United States Administration attaches to securing a solution, which will — as Secretary Regan put it — enable the United States,

"to speak with one voice in dealing with its foreign trading partners", so that,

"this irritant to international commercial relations will have been eliminated".

It is clear that there is a common objective. Some progress has been made at state level since the working group reported. Six states have now repealed or modified the worldwide application of unitary tax. But in some cases, the state legislation does not provide a comprehensive limitation on the application of unitary tax to United Kingdom groups. In five states, legislative initiatives have failed to succeed. In California, the key state fo the United Kingdom, a legislative initiative last year was unsuccessful. Despite the Governor's efforts to achieve a solution and intense activity by key legislators, the chances of satisfactory legislation passing this year are in serious doubt.

It is against this disappointing background that the House must consider the legislation proposed in the clause and schedule. Before we contemplate the passage of this legislation, we should ask whether we in the United Kingdom have done enough to impress on our friends in the United States the importance we attach to the issue. I think the answer must be yes. This has been confirmed by all we have heard in the debate. The Government have lost no opportunity to urge a speedy solution on the United States Administration, and have done so at the highest levels. The Administration have been well aware of the strong parliamentary pressure for legislative action if such a solution was not forthcoming. In the past year, when the focus has been on action at states level, there has been vigorous and concerted activity by the United Kingdom Government and industry. Government and industry teams have gone to Florida, Colorado, Utah and North Dakota in the past 12 months. Since last July, United Kingdom teams have visited California on four separate occasions. These included a major delegation led by Sir Terence Beckett of the CBI in February this year. I would like to pay tribute to the energy and resource displayed by the CBI, the Unitary Taxation Campaign — especially its chairman, Peter Welch — and other representatives of British business in trying to secure a resolution of the problem. As my hon. friend said, a similar tribute should be paid to our officials in the Embassy in Washington and in the other American consulates and, if I may say so, especially to our officials in the Inland Revenue.

Despite all this activity from the Government and industry, and from other countries, a resolution of the problem still remains in doubt. The Government have therefore concluded that it is right that the enabling powers proposed in the clause should be passed into legislation, and we so recommend to the House.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield asked for two assurances. I happily give an assurance that the Government will take account of representations on behalf of the insurance industry, to which the hon. Gentleman particularly referred. Of course, that would extend to the rest of British industry. I recognise the absolute importance of obtaining all-party support. I cannot give an absolute undertaking in this matter, as clearly we cannot anticipate events and circumstances. However, I take the hon. Gentleman's comments very much into account. It is clearly far better to retain a united parliamentary front. As the hon. Gentleman said, the House will have time to reflect and vote under the affirmative order procedure.

The powers in the clause and schedule, if invoked, would deprive United States parent companies of tax credit on dividends paid by their subsidiaries in the United Kingdom. They could have a major impact on the finances of such companies. At the extreme, they could cost these companies as much as £500 million a year.

The Government will not, of course, recommend to the House that these enabling powers should be invoked without the most careful consideration and consultation with all those concerned. It is important that if it becomes necessary to invoke the reserve powers there should be a degree of flexibility in specifying the companies and states that will be affected. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West made a convincing case for this when he explained the changes that he has introduced into his clause to provide the maximum flexibility for the Government if a resolution were laid to bring the powers into effect.

[Mr. Moore]

I conclude, however, by expressing the earnest hope that it will prove unnecessary for the United Kingdom to invoke the reserve powers in the clause. I very much hope that our friends in the United States — in the Administration, the states and business—will soon be able to secure a satisfactory solution to the problem of their own volition. There is a common interest in solving the issue. The basis of that solution is common ground between the United States Administration, states and business. We trust that the United States will now be able to overcome the remaining obstacles to achieving a complete and enduring solution to this problem, by action in the states or by federal action.

In this spirit, I commend my hon. Friend's clause and schedule to the House.

Mr. Grylls: With permission, I should like to respond to the debate. I reiterate the all-party support for this measure. It is important that a signal should go to the United States that the House is determined in this matter and that the threat of retaliatory action will not go away until the problem is solved. In that spirit, I hope that the House will accept the new clause.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 29

BUSINESS EXPANSION (RELIEF FOR LOAN CAPITAL)

'Any reference to eligible shares for the purposes of Business Expansion Relief under Schedule 5 to the Finance Act 1983 shall include a reference to eligible Loan Capital which shall rank equally for income tax relief, subject to the qualifications that Business Expansion Scheme Loan Capital in a Company shall:

(a) not be repayable within five years;

(b) not carry any voting rights;

(c) not be entitled to interest in excess of base rates (as published quarterly by Her Majesty's Government);

(d) not participate in the profits other than by way of interest;

(e) not carry any preferential right of repayment in any circumstances other than in preference to equity share capital;

(f) not exceed the amount invested in Business Expansion Scheme equity shares; and

(g) specify the events that would enable the Loan Capital to be converted into equity and so carry voting rights.'. —[Mr. Richard Page.]

Brought up and read the First time.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I propose this measure with no hope or expectation that the new clause will be added to the Bill in 1985. I like to think that I can let it gently float upon the surface of the Treasury waters, so that the Treasury can consider the idea and possibly bring it forward in the Finance Bill 1986.

I am always reminded in matters such as this of one of the sayings of the late Lord Butler. When anyone saw him with a proposition, complaint or idea, he said, "How many are you?" I have been pleasantly heartened by the number of people who have expressed interest in and support for this idea.

One reason why this measure has been proposed is the relative failure of the loan guarantee scheme. I have been exceedingly disappointed at the calls placed upon the Government guarantee and at the high number of failures that have taken place.

We need to have a means of evaluating business propositions that do not require a high asset value. We should have a means of considering a business scheme and ascertaining whether it can be viable and stand on its own two feet without gearing it entirely to the assets that have been involved in the proposition. The work that has been done in the various local enterprise agencies within the Department of Trade and Industry in evaluating the business propositions put before them has shown how they can reduce new start-up failures to a rate between 1:8 and 1:12.

1.30 am

We must bear in mind the mentality of those who come forward to try to set up a business. They want to do it themselves, in effect. They want to become independent. They want to be their own boss. They turn to the business expansion scheme for start-up finance. We know that in Britain there is extreme difficulty in accumulating one's own finance. Perhaps the most finance that an individual can accumulate is through his own home, and there are some who would be reluctant to put that item or asset at risk. That is where the BES helps.

So much money is needed now to start up a business that the equity of the person who wants to do so is reduced sometimes to such an extent that he loses control and is not his own master. That means that he is back in the position from which he tried to escape. He wants to be his own master and does not want to be someone else's servant. That is why I have tabled the clause. By matching some form of loan to equity, with tax reliefs that give incentive to put money into the scheme and with the evaluation of the scheme that will take place, I hope that the clause will help many to start their own businesses.

I have introduced the clause because I have been approached by several people who have wanted to use the BES but have backed off it because they have been faced with the prospect of not having control of their company or that of not going ahead. As they want to be their own masters, they have withdrawn.

The conditions that are set out in the clause are infinitely flexible. I have set out principles but that is all. Whether any interest rates should be parallel with the base rates that are published quarterly by the Government is something that is open to debate. There are some who would say that the rate should be several points below the base rate. I have provided that the ratio of equity to loan should be 50-50 but others may consider that it should be a different proportion. I hope that my hon. Friend will give the principle due consideration over the next nine months or so before the next Finance Bill is introduced.

Dr. McDonald: I do not think that the clause would have the support of the Opposition. As Conservative

Members know, we have many doubts about the business expansion scheme and the way in which it operates without adding the proposed relief to them.

A person who subscribes for loan stock takes less of a risk than someone who subscribes for shares. If the company goes bust, for example, the loan stockholders are paid out first. It is only if there is anything left that the shareholders are paid out.

The BES started as the business start-up scheme might have had some merit when it was introduced. However, the way in which the scheme has been used has moved away from the original concept. Investors want to find an easy method of tax relief without taking any risk and that is why the Government have had to eliminate agricultural holdings, and subsequently property based investments, from the scheme. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury knows that we have doubts about some of the other companies which attract investment under the scheme. Tax relief was designed to compensate investors for taking risks in new industries that would have difficulty in attracting investment, so we cannot support this addition to the tax relief that is already available.

Mr. Graham Bright (Luton, South): I support the new clause which was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page). The business expansion scheme has been an unqualified success. In its first year it attracted about £100 million for equity in companies. It assisted about 500 companies, over half of which were very new or were just starting up in business. Their capital requirements were very modest. A third of them raised less than £50,000. The scheme meets a long standing need. As my hon. Friend said, the loan guarantee scheme, for which I campaigned, needs to be replaced by an alternative. It filled a gap, but unfortunately it was misused in many instances by the banks. Companies which did not meet their criteria were passed as a risk by the banks to the Government.

The purpose of the new clause is to extend the relief afforded to the business expansion scheme to loan capital. As both the Bolton and Wilson committees of inquiry found, many small companies are reluctant to lose control of their equity or to risk future loss of control, should they need additional capital. The loan guarantee scheme and the practices of the major banks do not necessarily meet the precise needs of these companies.

For this reason, the new clause provides that the provision of loan capital as well as equity capital should be eligible for income tax relief under the business expansion scheme. It envisages a loans commitment for a period of at least five years without any prospect of loss of control by the recipient company by the conversion of the loan capital into equity capital. Furthermore, an investor would not expect to receive extra payments of interest, as provided for in the loan guarantee scheme. In its new guise, the loan guarantee scheme is very much weaker than it was.

New clause 29 contains a scheme that is designed specifically to complement the provisions of the business expansion scheme and to extend them in a way that will be acceptable to new small companies. I recommend it to the House. There ought to be a rolling programme for small business initiatives. We need to introduce new ideas and improve what we already have. This would greatly help those small companies which hope one day to become large companies. At present, many of those who start or own companies are reluctant to the point of not taking advantage of what is available to them in the market place because of fear of losing control of the company. The new clause would present an answer which would be acceptable to them, and I hope that the Financial Secretary will give the idea due consideration, if not tonight then at some time in the future.

Mr. Moore: If anything could endear me to the new clause, it was the charming way in which my hon. Friends the Members for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) and for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) did not seem to have much anticipation of its being accepted. If anything also could commend me to support their attitude, it was the unstinting effort that they have made, along with other of my hon. Friends, in arguing for the cause of the small business and the extension of the business expansion scheme, which they see as a major help.

The business expansion scheme is designed to promote new and expanded activity in the small firms sector by mobilising a new source of equity investment in unquoted United Kingdom trading companies—equity investment by individuals who are not otherwise connected with the company. By contrast, this new clause seeks to extend the relief to investment in such companies by way of loan capital. We see real difficulties with this, given the underlying aims and objectives of the BES.

The fundamental purpose of the BES, like the start-up scheme before it, is and always has been specifically that of helping to meet a shortage of equity finance that is thought to face small companies. It always has been very difficult to pin down the precise nature and extent of any financing gap facing small companies, but for many years there has been — and I believe still is — widespread agreement that the main problem facing small start-up and newly expanding companies is one concerning equity rather than other kinds of longer-term finance.

To extend the relief to investment by way of loan capital would, therefore, defeat the fundamental purpose of the scheme. Indeed, one of the uses to which companies may put the proceeds from a BES issue is precisely that of repaying loan capital and other borrowing, other than from the BES investors themselves.

There is a second major difficulty with my hon. Friend's proposal. As I said in Committee, BES provides a uniquely generous level of relief. The object of, and justification for, this is that of providing a big enough incentive to encourage outside investors to undertake the kind of very high risk investment for which the scheme is intended—that is, a minority holding of new, full risk ordinary equity with no prior or preferential rights, with no guaranteed return, and, even assuming the business succeeds, with no certain or obvious exit route.

I appreciate that some of the qualifying conditions in my hon. Friend's proposal would be similar to those that apply at present in the case of BES equity investment. The fact remains, however, that under this proposal qualifying loan capital would not be at risk in the various senses I have described to the same extent as BES equity capital. For example, loan investors would have an immediate return by way of interest, whereas equity investors would not, and the loan investors would have priority over the equity investors as regards repayment of capital. In addition to my concern that this proposal would defeat the fundamental purpose of BES. Therefore, I do not believe we could justify what is an extremely generous relief for this kind of investment.

[Mr. Moore]

We shall be reviewing the scheme later this year, once the results of the study are available. Clearly, it is too early to say what the outcome of this review will be, but I feel bound to say that, for the reasons I have explained, I see little prospect of our concluding that the scheme should be developed on the lines proposed by my hon. Friends.

While, therefore, I hear the words that they are uttering, I do not seek to give them too much encouragement, even at this late hour, and I hope that they will agree to withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Richard Page: I thank the Financial Secretary for the gentle way in which he led me down the path of rejection. I had hoped that as he had accepted an earlier clause, he would accept this one, but obviously his generosity lasts for only a short time and then he reverts to the normal Treasury line.

The House will appreciate that because of the lateness of the hour, I did not spend long expanding the thoughts on and principles behind the new clause. For anybody wishing to start a new business, a range of financial tools should be available, and the new clause would have provided an extra implement to help companies get started. I emphasise the need to have the equity and the loan in a set ratio so that the two go together and are linked, but designed to allow somebody starting a business to retain managerial control. I am conscious of the remarks of my hon. Friend. I know that in the past ideas have been summarily rejected and later surfaced suitably garnished and embellished with more expertise in draftsmanship than I am able to bring before the House. On that hope for the future in my breast, if nowhere else, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 31

ISSUE OF VALUE ADDED LOAN STOCK

'(1) The payments of interest by a company in respect of an issue of loan stock offered in accordance with the provisions of this section and the premiums paid on the redemption of that stock shall be deemed to be charges on the company which are allowable for the calculation of the corporation tax due to be paid by the company and shall not be taken to constitute a distribution as defined by section 233 of the Taxes Act 1970.

(2) For the purpose of this section "value added loan stock" means a loan stock with a stated repayment date in respect of which the amounts of the distributions to be paid from time to time shall be fixed at the time of issue in accordance with a published formula by reference to the amount of the value added by the company in the accounting reference period in respect of which each distribution is made, and the terms of the repayment shall be fixed in accordance with a published formula by reference to the amount of the value added by the company in the last five accounting reference periods before the repayment falls due.'.—[Sir B. Rhys Williams.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.45 am

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move, That the clause be read a second time.

I have been encouraged by the welcome I have had in past years for proposals of the same kind to believe that this proposal once again is worth a few minutes of the time of the House.

I have often sought to draw the attention of the House to the paradox in the capital market that, on the one hand, we have lenders not short of funds who complain that they cannot find suitable borrowers and, on the other, a large number of corporate borrowers who cannot get offers of finance on terms which they feel able to accept. So we have an unsatisfactory situation in regard to investment in the private sector; many companies have first-class schemes which are postponed from year to year because capital market conditions do not seem to the management to be quite right—so they postpone their project from one year to the next.

The reason is not that there is something wrong with the lenders or with the borrowers but that the structure of the capital market as it now exists in London is too limited. In particular, we tend to look at projects over much too short a term. Investors and borrowers cannot see far enough into the future as perhaps they were better able to do under the gold standard; so the returns on an investment have to be very quick if it is likely to find support. Big profits are needed in the early years. After that, what happens to the investment is a matter of relative indifference to both sides. That state of affairs does not show capitalism at its most fruitful. It ought to be a matter of serious concern to the Government to lengthen the time span of discretion in corporate finance.

Investment yielding a slow start in the early years, even with lively prospects in the long run, cannot get finance on terms which are acceptable to the parties. This is something that must be remedied and I think the remedy lies in minor reforms of the tax system, at any rate to a certain extent. I know it is dangerous to generalise, but perhaps it is worth the House considering the comparison between the present difficulties of raising finance for the Channel link, which is bound to be a success in the long run, but could well be a slow starter in terms of producing returns, and the Suez Canal, where Disraeli was able, I believe, to find money on 99-year terms with no difficulty when he went out to buy the shares.

Can we do something about this state of affairs? The risk of inflation makes fixed-interest borrowing very dear for companies in real terms in the early years. Convertible debentures do not solve any of the problems, although they have a certain use, no doubt. Deep discount, which the Government believe in and have made possible, is a gamble on inflation, with a winner or a loser according to whether the terms are right or wrong for the company which raises money in this way. That is not an attractive way of raising capital for very many solid and responsible managements and deep discount is not going to catch on in a big way. Equity issues put directors at risk because their profits may be diverted away from the remuneration of the investors, which they have offered in the original prospectus, by all sorts of forces over the passage of time. Current real rates of return are not high enough in many sound businesses for them to justify an issue of new equity stock, and so we drift on from year to year. Investors tend to buy existing assets rather than participate in new ventures, and that is an unhealthy and inflationary aspect of the capital market. We see it in the price of parades of shops and other properties, such as houses in Kensington, which constantly go up in price as funds look for places to rest.

Before I came to the Chamber, I turned up a copy of The Times for 1935, because I thought that it might be instructive to look at the page showing stock exchange prices and the active dealings that took place in July of that year. I do not want to weary the House, but I can give some examples that leap to the eye. One of the sections that was quoted was the home railways section, which was divided into the ordinaries, the debentures, the guaranteed and the preference shares of the railway companies. That shows the range of opportunities available for corporate finance.

I looked up Imperial Chemical Industries, for which I had the pleasure to work for 14 years. It had ordinary shares in active issue being traded all the time, ordinary deferred issues and the 7 per cent. prefs, all of them active in the market. Harrods had an ordinary issue and 7·5 per cent. prefs. Imperial Tobacco had ordinaries, 5·5 per cent. prefs, 6 per cent. prefs and 10 per cent. prefs, no doubt issued at different times, but all of them actively traded in the market. GKN had ordinaries, 5 per cent. prefs, 5 per cent. second prefs and 4 per cent. debentures.

The structure of the stock exchange quotations for the standard, well-known British companies do not now have that range of different instruments by which the boards were able to raise finance in those days. In 1985, however, the Government do have this option, in that they can issue fixed-interest stock, which yields about 10·5 per cent., or indexed stock at 3·5 per cent.—about one third of the cost in terms of the initial real dividend for stocks of 20 years' duration. The cost over the life of the loan to the taxpayer in real terms may be the same, but the cost in the early years is much less, as only one third is going out in dividends for the same initial capital.

Private sector borrowers do not have this option. If they are going out to the market on fixed-interest terms, they have to pay something that goes beyond the fixed-interest terms offered by Government stock—that is to say, a very high real rate of interest in the early years, and then an unpredictable burden on the company as the years go by, because no one can see what inflation will do to the commitment to service a new debenture issue over a long span of time.

Private sector borrowers therefore believe that they cannot enjoy a similar option to the Government in issuing long-term indexed stocks such as would enable them to raise money at much lower cost in the early years. They may be misinformed. My hon. Friends have suggested that the changes in the tax system of companies in recent years has opened the way for such issues. People to whom I speak however, who are experts in that sector, do not believe that this is the case. If the market is unaware of the opportunities or doubts whether they exist, we are not likely to see companies making use of this facility.

If companies were able to issue indexed debentures in the same way as the Government, should they, prudently, use the RPI? I doubt whether it would be wise for companies to make the same commitment as the Government, and to bind themselves to meet changes in the RPI from year to year whatever they might be. If there are sudden changes in the RPI, there might also be sudden changes in the climate for business which would be adverse to the firm, and which would not necessarily leave it in a position to raise its dividend along with the RPI.

The RPI is something like goblin fruit: it looks very good, but in time it could poison one. It would be better for companies which want to enter the indexed market to devise a formula which would relate their dividends to the company's turnover, or to its value added, or to its annual achievement in one form or another, so that as the years went by, the commitment, which would be a prior charge, would be within the capacity of the company to meet. The commitment would be ruled by the company's own performance and the investor in this type of stock would be participating in the performance of the company. It would be different from an equity, in that it would not be a discretionary dividend: it would be a genuine prior charge. The terms of the loan would be fixed from the start, and that would be made perfectly clear in the prospectus. It would be different from a debenture in that it would protect the investor from depreciation in the currency year byb year, because the calculation of the amount to be paid would be made in the currency of the year in which the profit and loss account was decided. It would be different from bank debt, because it would contain an element of participation in the firm's performance.

If it is true that the annual charge for service of an indexed loan would rank as a prior charge for corporation tax as my hon. Friends have been trying to explain to me —or if it did not greatly matter if it did or not, because of the reductions which have been made in the taxation of companies — we would still have the problem of the treatment of the eventual capital repayment. It would be unsatisfactory for the capital not to be indexed on the same or similar terms to the dividend. Obviously, it must be indexed in a way which does not introduce an element of discretion and I have tried in the new clause to suggest a way in which the discretionary element would be minimised. No doubt there are many other ways.

If the eventual capital repayment were twice or three times the numerical amount of the original loan, how do we treat that excess for tax purposes? I suggest that, up to the amount of the increase which corresponds to the increase in the RPI, the repayment should be free of tax. In so far as it exceeds or falls short of that, it should be taken into the tax liability of the recipient as a capital gain or loss. For the company, the repayment of the loan on the terms on which it was originally issued, must surely rank as a prior charge.

I realise that there are opportunities here for tax evasion, but my right hon. and hon. Friends are equal to overcoming that problem. I hold the belief that where there is a will there is a way. At the moment, this type of loan stock is not known at all, but if the tax position were clarified, it would gradually become an important element in corporate finance. Why not give it a chance? If companies do not want to use the facility, nothing will be lost, but if it is found to be a useful instrument for expansion, it must surely be worth making the effort to make the correct and necessary adjustments in our company taxation system.

The Government need not fear a loss of revenue, because a healthy private corporate sector must be good for the overall yield of tax. The Bank of England need not fear that private borrowers would crowd out the Government in the indexed market, because the supply of this type of stock would tend to create its own demand, as the market became used to its existence.

Existing equity holders would not suffer, because if a company's investment brought a good return, it would more than service the debt and provide an additional source of finance for increasing the equity dividend as well. We should not think only of the advantage to conventional corporate borrowers, but should look slightly wider to the facilities that the London capital market ought to be offering. This type of facility would open the way to companies without equities. This is becoming an important element in the London capital market in the form of management buy-outs. It is a development which deserves the Government's fullest encouragement. Management buy-outs—or companies without equities—provide the Compromesso storico between capitalism and Marxism, where the profit belongs to the workers but there is a fair return to the investor too.

[Sir Brandon Rhys Williams]

Investment under Islamic principles is also being sought for a large volume of funds. It would be a particular advantage if there were in London a range of stocks that were eligible to attract investment from owners of funds who have reservations about interest and want the yield from their investments to be characterised as a share in the profits rather than as a usurious exaction.

2 am

I also stress the advantage of the existence of a body of stock of the type that I have in mind to private pension funds. They want long-term inflation protection, are looking for some participation and are not attracted by the ups and downs in the casino of the stock exchange which has lately suffered such unpredictable changes and is geared to short-term considerations.

I hope that the idea behind my new clause will find support in the Government and that Ministers will continue to study my suggestions. I trust that they will see the value of widening the opportunities of obtaining corporate finance in London in this way, and will make the necessary changes in the impact of taxation.

Mr. Blair: The hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has correctly identified a problem, but I am not sure that I fully support his proposed solution.

The hon. Gentleman rightly said that there is a difficulty in borrowers getting finance at acceptable rates of interest and that the structure of the capital market is too limited and funds are provided for too short a term. Indeed, those are frequent complaints of the Opposition and they prompted many of the considerations that led my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) to propose the establishment of a national investment bank.

I should like to make sure that I have understood the ingenious scheme proposed by the hon. Member for Kensington. It would allow companies to raise money by issuing loan stock, and the interest paid would not be treated as a dividend under section 233 of the 1970 Act, but would be allowable for the calculation of corporation tax and computed in accordance with a formula related to company performance.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams indicated assent.

Mr. Blair: I am pleased that I understand it. It is a peculiar type of stock, almost a hybrid. Interest payments are normlly treated as a straight deduction from profits, whereas the dividend would be subject to ACT. If a loan stock certificate for, say £1,000 were issued, interest would be payable, but it would be calculated on a basis that took into account the profits of the company within the five accounting periods laid down in the new clause.

I hope that the Economic Secretary will tell us whether that would give a favourable tax treatment for this type of share. It must surely have an impact on corporation tax revenue. The hon. Member for Kensington has done us a service in raising the issue, but there may be better ways of dealing with the problem that he has identified.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) on raising this interesting subject. He has commented on the problems of matching borrowers and lenders, and suggests in his new clause an interesting and novel concept, which may assist companies with some problems in raising the type of money which they need and which investors will be happy to provide.

The new clause aims to ensure that interest paid on this special loan stock will be given a deduction in the same way as that paid on a bank loan, rather than treated as a distribution. I say that the clause "seeks" to ensure that payments will be treated in that way because in most circumstances that is already the case. Section 60 of the Finance Act 1982 provides that where in various circumstances interest paid is related to the company's performance and does not exceed a reasonable return, it will be treated as a deduction in the ordinary way. In the circumstances to which section 60 apply, the results which my hon. Friend seeks are already achieved.

If the principal of the loan were to be indexed to the retail price index—one of my hon. Friend's ideas—there would be a capital uplift on repayment, apart from on interest, which would be a capital item for both borrower and lender. In other words, the borrowing company could not obtain a deduction for the uplift, but the lender would be effectively exempt from tax because in most cases he would be covered by the indexation provisions. If the value added were in terms of the company's performance, an uplift would probably be treated as a distribution, subject to the provisions of section 60. In those circumstances although ACT may be payable, a deduction would be available against the company's ordinary corporation tax liability.

Since the indexation of CGT for assets without a one-year waiting period was introduced, if a company could get a tax allowance on the index uplift of borrowing, but was tax free on the disposal of an asset which had risen approximately in line with the RPI on the other side of the balance sheet, it would get double tax relief on the same increase in value. Therefore, I cannot give much encouragement that the Government will make the sort of tax regime for which my hon. Friend asks for index borrowing or other forms of borrowing where there would be a capital uplift which could be offset in part against a protected gain on the asset side of the balance sheet. I need to study the question more deeply, and to write to my hon. Friend on his technical points.

Taking into account our proposals on deep discount securities, we have ensured that companies will have considerable scope to draw on various borrowing instruments, including, with the CGT changes, index linked borrowing. I shall study the points raised by my hon. Friend, and thank him for having given us an opportunity to discuss these questions. I hope that in the light of those comments he will ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for his helpful remarks. I recognise that the new clause, which is precisely the same as the one which I tabled three years ago and which also gave rise to a useful debate, is defective and is not even a precise expression of what I now see as the desirable objective. I hope that on another occasion wee shall go further into the subject. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 34

RELIEF FOR DONATIONS TO ARTISTIC CHARITIES

'Donations to bodies whose principal field of activity is in the arts and which are registered charities shall be allowable as follows:

(a donations totalling 2·5 per cent. of gross personal income shall be allowable against income tax; and

(b) donations totalling 2·5 per cent. of pre-tax profits shall be allowable against corporation tax.'.—[Mr. Alan Howarth.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I beg to move that the clause be read a Second time.

It is traditional that we debate clauses on the tax treatment of the arts at a late hour. That can, I hope, be taken as evidence of the seriousness of our concern about the subject. We are at least more fortunate than my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) who was called at 7.50 am to speak on the equivalent occasion last year.

The new clause is intended to help the Government to strengthen their policy of plural funding for the arts. There are three main sources of public funding for the arts—grants from the Office of Arts and Libraries, administered at arm's length through the Arts Council, expenditure by local authorities, and tax concessions and incentives. The three should complement each other, but the balance is not right.

Funding by the OAL has increased by 11 per cent. in real terms since 1980-81. That is to the Government's credit, as is the fact that this year's increase approximately matches inflation. However, there is no further prospect of real increases in the OAL vote. My noble Friend said that central Government funding will remain broadly level in real terms.

That new situation gives rise to difficulties. Aspirations and costs continue to rise, but funding does not. For example, the Arts Council strategy, as set out in "The Glory of the Garden", has widespread acceptance in seeking to achieve a fair balance of support for the arts in the country as a whole. That strategy is likely to be frustrated, however, because there is is not enough money to provide new funding in the regions while preserving adequate funding in the metropolis and in the areas which up until now have received Arts Council funding.

All was relative sweetness and light among the recipients of Arts Council funding over a lengthy period when funds were growing. Now that funds are not growing there is ferocious competition and lobbying. In a fine flight of denunciatory frenzy Sir Peter Hall wrote earlier this year to the Sunday Times:

"The Government is presiding over the dismantling of the British arts."

He then marshalled a chorus of 50 subsidised theatre directors and, as in the "Winters Tale",

"there was casting up of eyes, holding up of hands"

That is, perhaps, an understatement. The tighter the money becomes, the tougher and more political becomes the atmosphere.

Local authorities, the second main fount of state patronage, have their legitimate part to play, but too often their part is none too legitimate. Too many cases exist of funding masquerading as funding for the arts which goes to agitprop activities. The GLC's brinkmanship over rescuing the Cottesloe theatre is an example of the arts being abused as a political platform. Too much churning goes on in local government. Money is taken away in rates and comes back in smaller sums by way of grants.

Rightly, the Government's policy is not to relax their hard-won discipline over local government expenditure so we shall not have an increase of state support through that channel.

The only channel through which additional state support might be forthcoming is taxation policy. My new clause is a response to the Government's manifesto commitment to "examine ways of using the tax system to encourage further support for the arts and heritage."

The method of tax relief is an attractive approach in principle and has been supported by all parties, as evidenced in the Select Committee report produced in the last Parliament. To all of us in all parties who do not want the arts to be politicised, one of its great attractions is that it takes the vexed question of the totality of state support out of politics, because the amount made available to the arts in a particular year will depend upon the extent to which people avail themselves of the concessions and that cannot be known in advance. The larger the proportion of state support which is made in this way the more that will be so. I would not expect my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Treasury to be moved beyond a certain point, if at all, by this consideration, and yet the prospect of being freed from those perennial accusations of philistinism and meanness—totally without justification in their personal capacities—must hold some attraction to them.

It is unhealthy that Government subsidy provides more cash resources for the arts than private patronage. We cannot really want the arts to be a hybrid between a nationalised industry and an underfunded corner of the welfare state. The value of the existing range of fiscal concessions for the arts and heritage was estimated by The Economist last year at £15 million. The amount spent by the state is anywhere between £250 million and £500 million, depending on whether BBC expenditure is counted in. That is no sort of balance.

We must encourage private patrons. All great patronage has been private. The Tate gallery owes its existence to Sir Henry Tate, Lord Duveen and Sir Charles Clore. The National gallery was founded privately and three quarters of the pictures in it owe nothing to state patronage. It is about to enter a magnificent new phase thanks to the prodigious generosity of the Sainsbury family and Mr. J. Paul Getty junior.

2.15 am

It is profoundly encouraging that patrons are again coming forward on a significant scale. We must widen and consolidate the base of private artistic patronage. We need a better balance between public patronage, exercised by a handful of people of acknowledged judgment to whom we should be grateful, and the wishes of individual lovers of the arts. We also need a better balance between concern for the heritage, concern for the prestige items and the prestige institutions, and local manifestations of artistic life and enthusiasm which are the seedbed of new generations of art. The best way for the state to help secure local cultural vitality is to give financial encouragement to individuals and firms through the tax system.

[Mr. Alan Howarth]

During my study of this subject, I have received letters from people working in the unsubsidised theatre. They are moving and persuasive and record a passionate relationship with theatregoers as opposed to local authority arts sub-committees. We could take an important step towards helping local theatres, museums, galleries and craft centres by giving fiscal support to their friends and patrons. Tax reliefs would result in more money becoming available to the arts overall. Whereas a grant is a single payment, a tax relief materialises only as other money is given.

More money is needed for the arts. Our museums, theatres and gallieries are chronically underfunded. As the Government frankly, but with an unnecessary air of gloomy finality, admitted in the Office of Arts and Libraries' reply to the Select Committee report:

"it is unlikely that any Government will find itself able to provide the arts with the level of public funding which would enable all artists and arts organisations to fulfil all their hopes and ambitions."

Following the Priestley report and its acceptance, public support even for the Royal Opera House and the Royal Shakespeare company has begun to erode again. The cost of maintaining artistic establishments of the highest calibre by world standards, such as the Royal Opera House and the RSC, is determined in large measure by the purchasing power of the wealthiest countries. The cost to our great museums and galleries of maintaining and updating their collections can only rise as masterpieces become more scarce and as new sources of wealth enter the market.

Sponsorship has recently come to the rescue to a considerable extent encouraged with admirable vigour and enthusiasm by my noble Friend. The Government's will and capacity to stimulate sponsorship by matching grants will, however, reach its ceiling, perhaps before long, and businesses' will and capacity to sponsor will also reach saturation point. There are limits to how much can be achieved by treating the arts as an adjunct of public relations. Officials at the Inland Revenue are not alone in being sceptical about that. In the meantime, it is pleasant to think of those officials attending concerts and exhibitions to verify that business patronage is, in the formula,

"wholly and exclusively for the purpose of trade", but it is a fairly cumbrous way in which to proceed.

Other countries are increasingly allowing individuals and firms to offset some proportion of their pre-tax income against donations to the arts. In the United States the system has been established for as long as there has been income tax with the result that people and corporations give generously to the arts. It is an important and healthy fact that more than 80 per cent. of the support for the arts comes from private individuals who are encouraged to give through income tax concessions. It is well established in Germany that people can set off part of their tax liability by making donations to the arts. Similar arrangements have been established in Italy and France, and I have a leaflet from Australia which was published earlier this year, setting out with admirable clarity and succinctness the rules governing taxation incentives for the arts.

The arts in this country are admired by every other country and it is unimaginable that we should allow the arts to starve. The Government are not quite so severely economically minded in this or other areas as they make out. The Government have been praised for allocating a once-for-all sum of £3·5 million plus £4·1 million annually for the Priestley recommendations, £8 million for Calke abbey and £25 million for Kedleston hall, Weston park and Nostell priory. The Government must find the money. Sensible limits have to be set on the concessions allowed, taking account of the condition of the economy and the Exchequer, but our regular support for the arts must be improved. That improvement can only be provided on a significant scale by tax concessions. I suspect that that view is supported by the Arts Council.

In a thoughtful lecture on the political economy of the arts in March, Sir William Rees-Mogg said:

"looking to the future, I am not sure that I would not prefer cutting out taxes on the arts to raising subsidy in real terms . . . I would prefer to reduce our clients' dependence on the Arts Council by cutting taxes on arts rather than by increasing subsidy —and I welcome tax cuts for the unsubsidised arts."

In the debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex on the Finance Bill last year, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary said:

"this Administration will always be astute to see that the tax system is sensitive to the preservation of this country's remarkable cultural heritage." — [Official Report, 11 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 1261.]

That remark is justified by the Government's record. Relief from capital transfer tax has been introduced on gifts to charities and the minimum period for convenants has been reduced to four years. In this Finance Bill higher rate tax relief on covenants has been doubled and a valuable concession has been introduced for heritage land. The Government have enlarged the scope for private tax concessions on donations, but it would not be unrealistic to say that there is a palpable reluctance on the part of Treasury Ministers to embrace that policy.

In the debate last July my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary observed that the cost of the American system in tax forgone was about $9·6 billion per year. I suspect that he was making more of that than he should have done. In America, the share of total philanthropic giving attracting tax relief which goes to the arts and humanities is 6·3 per cent. according to the 1983 annual report of the American Association of Fund-Raising Counsel.

In the Office of Arts and Libraries' reply to the Select Committee the Government raised the further objection that to exempt companies and individuals from tax in respect of donations to the arts would be a concession which it would be difficult and inequitable to confine to the arts. That is not an impressive point. The arts are qualitatively distinct from other areas of our national life in which tax concessions also exist or are urged, having nothing in common with housing, pensions and so forth, and can be treated distinctly. The Government are in charge and are quite used to making administrative distinctions of that kind.

The Government need not fear some enormous, open-ended cost. The net outcome for the Exchequer would be at worst little loss and possibly even a gain. The performing arts and many other arts and heritage activities are relatively labour-intensive. The effect of the tax concessions would be to increase employment in that area so that the Government would save the cost of unemployment benefit and would instead receive income tax and national insurance contributions as well as VAT and other revenue from the resulting higher level of activity.

It is a vulgar solecism and pardonable, if at all, only in a Finance Bill debate at an obscure hour of the morning, to justify support for the arts in terms of benefits to tourism. As we are talking in a financial context, however, it is perhaps fair to observe that tourism can be expected to be a significant source of earnings for this country and therefore of tax revenue. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State values the arts for their own sake but I appeal to him in his ministerial capacity.

My right hon. Friend may also be worried in his ministerial capacity about some of the abuses of tax relief for the arts which have caused concern in the United States. He will, however, have noted that the thrust of the present United States Administration's approach is not to attack the principle of relief for the arts but to tackle the abuses. Overall, the American system has worked wonderfully well as a civilised and enriching influence for donors and the wider public alike, and it would be for us to develop a system suited to the specific circumstances of this country.

I recognise that a major departure of principle would be involved in acceding to my proposal and I do not ask my right hon. Friend to do so today. However, in a period in which the Government are giving fundamental consideration to the pattern of taxation in this country I urge them to give further constructive consideration to the question of tax relief for the arts with a view to including options for consideration in the Green Paper on personal taxation that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has promised.

Mr. Terry Davis: I agree with the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) that it is a late hour to initiate a debate on financial arrangements for the arts. I also agree with him about the importance of the arts, but I cannot agree with the thrust of his argument about what he would describe as desirable financial arrangements for artistic activity in this country.

I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman made it clear in his speech that there are already some tax subsidies for the arts in the sense that tax relief can be given on covenants in favour of charities involved in artistic activities of the kind that he described.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I said that the value of existing tax concessions was about £15 million per year. That figure certainly includes relief on covenants.

Mr. Davis: The hon. Gentleman should not be so sensitive. I did not say that he did not mention it. I said that he did not make it clear. He did not put proper emphasis on the fact that there is already subsidy from taxation in the tax relief allowed on covenants. He now proposes that there be tax relief for one-off donations to artistic charities.

In his useful analysis of existing financial arrangements for the arts, the hon. Gentleman welcomed the increase in Arts Council grants. That, at least, is progress, as I believe that I recall him criticising the financial grant to the Arts Council in a previous debate on public expenditure and even calling for a reduction in public expenditure through the Arts Council.

Mr. Howarth: It is useful to clarify what happened in that debate. The hon. Gentleman will recall that the debate was cut short by a timetable. I was developing the point that in my view there was merit in moving to a different balance between direct grant for the arts and state support for the arts by way of fiscal concessions of the kind for which I have argued today. I certainly did not suggest wholesale withdrawal of state support for the arts as the hon. Gentleman perhaps supposes.

Mr. Davis: The debate was not cut short by a timetable. I am prepared to accept that the hon. Gentleman may have felt that he was under some pressure from the Patronage Secretary and other close colleagues to cut short his remarks, but he cannot complain that he was cut short by the Opposition and there was certainly no timetable. Nevertheless, I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has had the opportunity to clarify his position, which I am sure will be of interest in his constituency of Stratford-on-Avon, which is so dependent on the Royal Shakespeare theatre as the basis for a great deal of its tourism.

The hon. Gentleman cannot deny that in a previous debate he criticised the amount of expenditure by the Arts Council, but today he has welcomed increased expenditure by the Arts Council. He may argue that on that earlier occasion he would have gone on to argue that the reduction in Arts Council expenditure that he sought should be compensated by private expenditure encouraged by tax concessions, but that does not justify his arguing on that occasion for a reduction in expenditure by the Arts Council and then welcoming an increase on this occasion. The hon. Gentleman is trying to have it both ways. He cannot have his cake and eat it as well.

2.30 am

It is also somewhat ironic that the hon. Gentleman should then touch on the second source of finance for the arts — local government. The amount of funds made available by local government for the arts is under serious threat as a result of the government's policies, which he supports. They are under threat from the abolition of the metropolitan county councils. I at least have received many representations from bodies interested in the arts in the west midlands, about their fears for the funding of arts there as a result of the abolition of the West Midlands county council. Others have received representations from other bodies that are concerned about the arts in other metropolitan counties. Rate capping and everything that goes with it is putting pressure on funding for the arts from the district councils.

The third source of funding for the arts that the hon. Gentleman mentioned is the one source that finds favour with him. He argues that state funding for the arts is a bad thing. He seems to think that private funding is a good thing because, if the funds come from private sources, the arts will not be "politicised". That is the word that he used.

Mr. Alan Howarth rose——

Mr. Davis: I am happy to give way. The hon. Gentleman should make his position clear.

Mr. Howarth: I am immensely grateful to the hon. Gentleman. My argument was that state support for the arts should come from three sources — direct grants through the Arts Council, local authority expenditure and fiscal concessions. Those are three different varieties of positive state support for the arts.

Mr. Davis: The hon. Gentleman told us that the advantage of his third source was that the arts would not be politicised, as happened with state support. Those are the words that he used, and we shall read them tomorrow in Hansard. He referred specifically to politicisation of the arts, as happens with state support. Now he is arguing that there should be three sources of state support.

[Mr. Davis]

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I am anxious not to be misrepresented. My observation was that when the state is trying to determine the total amount of money that should be available for the arts, it brings the arts into a political arena with the unfortunate consequences that I described. The attraction of having fiscal reliefs for the arts is that no one can know what the total will be, and therefore no one can complain that the Government have been too parsimonious, too mean, or have not given enough.

Mr. Davis: The hon. Gentleman can wriggle as much as he likes. He complained that state funding for the arts leads to politicisation. Via a long-drawn out route no doubt he will tell us, but that was the phrase that he used. He cannot get away from it. He had written it down carefully in the notes that he read, and we shall make sure equally carefully that it is written down in Hansard tomorrow.

As an expert opinion to support his point of view, the hon. Gentleman referred to an address given by Sir William Rees-Mogg. All parties in the Opposition do not regard Sir William Rees-Mogg as an independent political commentator on our scene. We do not take his views as in any sense independent. Certainly in the Labour party, and, I suspect in other parties in the Opposition, we would view with some apprehension the possibility of politicisation of the arts as a result of private sponsorship. I would not expect businesses in the City of London to provide funds for artistic endeavours that tended to criticise the establishment, particularly the economic system. To argue that state support leads to politicisation, but private funding encouraged by tax relief does not, is a serious mistake in a discussion of the arrangements for funding the arts.

I do not agree that all great patronage is private patronage. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that I am quoting him correctly this time, because I wrote down those words as he said them, too. He referred to developments on the continent. My impression of what happens abroad is affected by my experience in the United States of America and the continent of Europe. I have a distinct impression that in other western European countries there is a great deal more state funding of the arts than in this country. Many European theatres, opera companies, museums and art galleries, which have given me great pleasure, are funded by state funds, either local or national. I should tell the hon. Gentleman that I have great respect for the National Theatre and the Royal Shakespeare Theatre. I do not yield to him in my respect for the latter, and I speak as someone who was brought up and lived for most of his life in the west midlands. The Royal Shakespeare Theatre depends upon a subsidy from the Government, through the Arts Council, and to argue that all great patronage is private patronage is certainly nonsense in Stratford-on-Avon, where I used to live.

On occasion, I have derived great pleasure from performances by visiting artistes from the Soviet Union. I have no great admiration for the system in the USSR, but I recognise that it has achieved high levels of performance in artistic activity. One cannot argue that all great patronage is private patronage when one considers what has been achieved in the Soviet Union, much as I dislike its economic system and lack of civil liberties. I do not agree with the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's arguments.

The hon. Gentleman argued that, in some way, funds for the arts are different from funds for other activities. Again, I cannot agree with him. It is inconsistent to argue that there should be special arrangements for donations by businesses or individuals to the arts but that those arrangements should not apply to donations by those same businesses and individuals to sporting activities, or to charities engaged in looking after the welfare of the disabled, children or the elderly. Many hon. Members would argue that such tax relief should be given on donations to charities engaged in animal welfare and other activities which we favour. I do not understand why the hon. Gentleman singled out the arts from all the charities that we would wish to support.

The hon. Gentleman argued that expenditure on the arts is labour-intensive, and that tax relief on donations to the arts would reduce unemployment. Those are strange comments from an hon. Member who, earlier this evening, voted against a much smaller amount of money being used to provide tax relief for workplace nurseries.

Mr. Barney Hayhoe: My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) asked me at the end of a wide-ranging speech for an assurance that the Government would give further constructive consideration to these matters. I gladly give him that assurance.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. That being so, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 38

STAMP DUTY

'In subsection (5) of section 47 of the Finance Act 1973 for the words "stamp duty of £1" there shall be substituted the words "stamp duty of NIL".'.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause is in my name and in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), who has sensibly departed. Its purpose is simple, and I promise to detain the House for no more than one minute. It eliminates capital duty, which is a form of stamp duty, now governed by European law. It is imposed on new share capital on the formation of a company or on later increases in its issued share capital.

United Kingdom business and its counterparts in Europe have been urging the abolition of that duty for some time, because it is an impediment to the growth of business. Although the Government support that aim, they argued that they were constrained by EC rules and were, therefore, unable to accede to requests to abolish the duty. However, on 10 June this year, at the Internal Market Council a directive was adopted allowing member states to fix the level of duty at between zero and 1 per cent. At present, in British law, it is a compulsory 1 per cent. Therefore, member states which wish to abolish the duty completely are authorised to do so. I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary can confirm that the Government will now act to abolish the duty.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) was right to draw attention to the position under the new directive on stamp duty, but I am sure that neither he nor any other hon. Member would expect me on the Government's behalf to accept on Report a new clause with a cost of £80 million or more—five or more times the cost of the stamp duty package that we debated earlier. Any decision on the future of the tax would only be taken in the context of budgetary considerations. The case for a reduction in or abolition of the rate of duty would have to be considered alongside any other tax reduction proposals as a matter of priority.

My hon. Friend has performed a useful service in drawing our attention to the fact that there is stamp duty on capital raising and that there are arguments for suggesting that it may be an impediment. No doubt, this is a matter of which we should take account at a suitable occasion in the future.

Mr. Terry Davis: The amount of stamp duty may be regarded as an "impediment" on raising money through the market, but it can be argued also that fees charged by accountants, lawyers, merchants and other who take part in a share issue—

Mr. Neil Hamilton: They provide a service.

Mr. Davis: Those charges can also be regarded as an impediment to raising money through the market. I do not expect the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) to agree with me—he is in favour of those people; we are not.

Mr. Hamilton: By leave of the House, I do not propose to rise to the bait offered by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis). Having heard what my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary said, I hope that we shall return to this matter on another occasion. I therefore ask leave of the House to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 43

RELIEF FOR EXPENDITURE ON ELIGIBLE SECURITIES

'(1) This section has effect where an individual, who throughout a year of assessment is resident in the United Kingdom, incurs expenditure on acquiring eligible securities.

(2) For the purposes of this section eligible securities consist of:—

(a) shares or stock which at the time acquisition by an individual to whom the provisions of this section apply (or, if later, on 5th April 1986) form part of the ordinary share capital of a company resident in the United Kingdom and are quoted on a recognised stock exchange; and

(b) units in such authorised unit trusts as the Board may by regulation prescribe.

(3) An individual to whom the provisions of this section apply and who has, in any year of assessment, incurred expenditure on acquiring eligible securities may, by notice in writing given within six months after that year, make a claim for relief from income tax on an amount of his income equal to so much of such expenditure as does not exceed £500.

(4) The Treasury may by order made by statutory instrument increase the amount of £500 in subsection (3) of this section to such amount as shall be specified in that order.

(5) The following provisions shall have effect as respects relief under this section—

(a) the amount of any expenditure in respect of which a claim for relief might otherwise be made under this section as regards any year of assessment shall be reduced by the aggregate amount of the proceeds of any disposals of eligible securities made during that year by the individual concerned;

(b) in the event that an individual to whom relief has been given under this section as regards any year of assessment disposes of eligible securities in any subsequent year of assessment (being a year of assessment ending on or before 5th April 1986) and does not in such subsequent year of assessment incur expenditure on acquiring eligible securities in an amount equal to or exceeding the proceeds of all such disposals, then he shall forfeit so much of such relief as is equal to the amount by which such expenditure falls short of such proceeds, or, if there is no expenditure so much of such relief as is equal to such proceeds;

(c) a claim for relief may require it to be given only by reference to the income of the individual without extending to the income of his spouse;

(d) subject to paragraph (c) above, relief shall be given by treating the expenditure as reducing first the earned income of the individual, then his other income, then the earned income of his spouse and then his spouse's other income;

(e) the relief shall be given in priority to relief under section 168 of the Taxes Act or section 30 of the Finance Act 1978.

(6) Where the Board is of opinion that any acquisition or disposal of eligible securities which is material for any of the purposes of this section is not at arms' length and accordingly directs that this subsection shall apply, then for the purposes of this section there shall be substituted—

(a) in the case of an acquisition of eligible securities, for the expenditure on such acquisition; or

(b) in the case of a disposal of eligible securities, for the proceeds of such disposal; the market value of such securities at the time of such acquisition or disposal.'.—[Mr. Kirkwood.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The provenance of the new clause was provided by the speech made by the Chancellor on 11 June 1985 at the Maurice Macmillan memorial lecture, which he delivered to the Wider Share Ownership Council in the Grand Committee Room. The terms of the new clause are neither original nor entirely new to the House. In 1981 my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) introduced a similar measure. The idea behind the new clause was pioneered in France, where the scheme has been in operation for some years. The scheme has been extended to Belgium, Sweden and Norway. It has found great favour abroad and has produced economic and financial benefits in other European countries. I suggest that it has friends not only abroad but in the House, including Conservative Members.

The scheme involves giving tax relief on acquiring securities in certain circumstances. The details of the maximum limit to the amount of relief in the period of the tenure and the other terms of the scheme would all be open to negotiation and discussion. The key feature is that the money that would be granted relief would be wholly additonal investment. Life assurance and pension funds have tax advantages — why not equity acquisition as well? Tax neutrality is a worthwhile goal at which to aim, but in today's fiscal conditions why not have an element of equity purchase too?

[Mr. Archy Kirkwood]

The main purpose of the relief is to arrest and reverse the tide of investment in corporate form, in contradistinction to the sad decline in the personal sector of investment. Under the heading "Wider Share Ownership" the Chancellor said:

"In the 1950s, for example, private investors accounted for two-thirds of all transactions on the Stock Exchange. The proportion is now probably below a quarter. And until very recently the decline was accelerating. The proportion of UK shares owned directly by individuals fell from 37 per cent. in 1975 to 28 per cent. by the end of 1981."

The opportunity is there for the Government to do a great deal more to encourage the private sector to return to the stock market. I accept that they have done something by reducing stamp duty and that a certain amount has been done under the employee share ownership scheme, but a scheme of the sort that is proposed in the new clause would produce a great increase in turnover in the stock market and would lead to a strong market performance in future. I urge the Government strongly to consider the scheme.

2.45 am

Mr. Wrigglesworth: As my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has said, the new clause is an attempt to implement in the United Kingdom a scheme to encourage share ownership purchase similar to that pioneered in France by Rene Monory in 1978. The French scheme was subsequently amended by Mr. Mitterrand's Minister, Mr. Delors. As my hon. Friend said, such schemes have been introduced with considerable success in other European countries such as Belgium, Sweden and Norway. A similar scheme is proposed in the Netherlands.

The Government might claim that their privatisation programme will lead to much wider share ownership, but that is questionable. The extensive programme of asset sales — it is estimated to average about £2·5 billion annually for the next three years — will not necessarily build a large base of private shareholders. By comparison with the United States or Japan, the British record of individual shareholding is poor. Less than 4 per cent. of individuals in Britain hold shares compared with almost 20 per cent. in the United States and almost 17 per cent. in Japan. Even the 8 per cent. of the adult population to which share ownership in Britain rose as a consequence of the BT flotation has fallen to 7 per cent. as a result of subsequent share disposals.

The unprecedented campaign and the incentives to attract small investors may again be emulated by the sale of British Gas but it will be hard to sustain in future issues. The evidence of British Aerospace is not encouraging. Of the 44,000 who held up to 99 shares each on that sale immediately after flotation, only 3,279 remained a year later. That was a staggering reduction. Of the 80,000 who held between 100 and 500 shares, only 13,000 remain. The total number of shareholders fell in a year from 157,829 to a mere 27,175. It will not be until the end of the voucher incentives for the larger shareholders in BT — those who hold 3,000 shares or more — that a full picture of the concentration of share ownership in BT will become possible.

It is clear that the take-up of employee share options in the privatised companies has been extremely limited. A parliamentary answer on 9 January gave the proportion of shares held initially by employees. It was 3·6 per cent. in British Aerospace, 1·4 per cent. in Cable and Wireless, 3·7 per cent. in Amersham International, only 0·1 per cent. in Britoil, 4·3 per cent. in Associated British Ports, 0·03 per cent. in Enterprise Oil, 1·3 per cent. in Jaguar and 1·9 per cent. in BT. These are minute percentages of the employees.

Even though the privatisation programme has not yet resulted in wider share ownership and employee share ownership on the scale that was claimed for it, it has undoubtedly kindled interest in the concept of share ownership among many who would not previously have contemplated it, and that is to be welcomed. The number of employee share ownership schemes approved by the Inland Revenue since the fiscal incentives were promoted in the Finance Act 1978 has grown impressively from 33 in 1979-80 to about 433 now. There are nearly 800 if employee share ownership schemes are included. It shows a substantial growth on the basis of the scheme introduced in 1978 that bears some resemblance to this new clause.

Even if these schemes can be viewed as a form of deferred profit sharing, like other forms of wider share ownership they are transforming the character of the market economy and conferring the benefits of capital ownership upon a wider number of people than entrepreneurs and those who are fortunate enough to have a substantial accumulation of capital. The time is opportune to provide incentives through the tax system to give a new impetus to these developments and to stimulate the rapid growth of an industrial third force, the co-operative sector, and radical innovations such as employee buy outs to revive companies which have failed through incompetent management rather than through adverse market conditions.

The new clause would build on the modest take-up of the 1978 profit-sharing scheme which, although it started well, still covers fewer than 2 per cent. of employees. It provides the framework for stimulating these developments as well as boosting the equity base of companies and stimulating savings. It would help us to move away from the inbuilt discrimination in the taxation system which channels 70 per cent. of our savings into safe institutional investment in building societies, insurance companies and pension funds, compared with only 50 per cent. in the United States.

The variants on the Loi Monory scheme and the Delors scheme which have been introduced in Europe have helped to promote an inflow of cash which, according to the Investors Chronicle, has been an important factor in limiting the extent of market setbacks and contributing to a further substantial rise in prices. The introduction of schemes such as that contained in new clause 43 has taken place in combination with the creation of equity funds, which in Sweden showed a phenomenal growth from £13 million in 1979 to £165 million in 1983 and made a significant contribution to the buoyancy of the Swedish stock market.

The potential for employee shareholding schemes is at present strictly limited by the requirements of the institutions' protection committees: that not more than 5 per cent. of a company's pre-tax profits can be used in any one year and not more than 1 per cent. of issued share capital can be subscribed in any one year. For a large British company with a turnover of £1 billion, a capitalisation of £200 million and profits of £50 million this would mean that no more than £2·5 million of equity could be purchased annually. It would take 20 years to build up an employee's stake of as much as 20 per cent. This is a most regrettable state of affairs. By accepting the amendment the Government should take this opportunity to review the obstacles that stand in the way of wider share ownership. We hope that the Financial Secretary will respond to that opportunity.

Dr. McDonald: I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). He referred to employee share ownership schemes and to the promotion of co-operative share ownership. The Opposition might view the new clause with more favour if that was the purpose of the new clause, but it does not limit tax relief for employees or co-operative share ownership. Tax relief is to be made available to individuals and the maximum relief to be made available will be £500. However laudable its aim might be, the new clause provides yet more relief to those who already have. Even though the maximum amount of money that can be invested in shares in any one year is limited to £500, this comparatively small amount is beyond the means of many people. This would not be our first choice when considering how tax relief should be distributed.

Secondly, the richer the investor and the higher his rate of tax the more this relief is worth. Neither the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who moved the new clause, nor his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South gave an estimate of its cost. I hope that the Economic Secretary will refer to it so that we may have some idea of the size of the give away that the new clause envisages.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I compliment the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) on his patience in batting last in the order but on having nevertheless instituted an interesting debate at this hour on the proposals in the new clause, and his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), who spoke of the wider share ownership aspects.

I have considerable sympathy in principle with proposals which promote wider share ownership by individuals and which encourage investment in British industry. The record of the Government on wider share ownership is good. But with regard to investment in United Kingdom industry, we have felt it more appropriate to target relief for new investment where it is most needed —for example, through the business expansion scheme.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South referred in particular to the example of the Loi Monory, but the situation in France is, and has been, different from that in our stock market. One of the objectives of the French scheme was indeed wider share ownership, but they also wanted to strengthen their stock market and improve the capital base for French companies, which was much less developed than that in the city. They wanted to reduce the gearing of companies and provide funds for additional investment. It is not on all fours with the position in the United Kingdom.

The other French objectives, other than wider share ownership, are less relevant for us because of our larger stock market. They also have a different tax system in France and it is not possible, therefore, to make a direct comparison with that country, nor with the other countries mentioned in the Investors Chronicle article. Some of the growth in the stock markets of those countries has been due, in any event, to the increase in foreign investment.

The first questions to ask about the new clause are, as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) said, the cost and whether such a provision would represent a sensible use of those resources. We calculate that for every 1 million cases, the tax relief would cost about £150 million. It is not possible to predict in advance how many people would take advantage of such a scheme, but I have given the round figure of about £150 million.

The trouble is that such investment would not be wholly additional. The expectation is that, at least in the first year, and probably in other early years, much of the cost would derive from switching by people who already have share ownership. It would be bed and breakfast; they would sell and re-purchase or sell one and buy another. It would be difficult to isolate individual purchasers in that way.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, as a result of the Budget, bed and breakfast has become legal again?

Mr. Stewart: Bed and breakfast has never been illegal. It has sometimes been easier and sometimes less easy to do. It seems to be an ordinary stock exchange operation. I am not suggesting that we should provide an opportunity for it, with heavy cost to the taxpayer, which would not bring substantial funds into the market for the reasons that I have given.

It was pointed out that similar new clauses were debated four or five years ago. I am afraid that hon. Members will have recognised that the arguments that I am adducing are similar to those which may have been used on those occasions. I have sympathy with the objectives of the new clause, though I do not believe that this would be the way to achieve them, and the considerations that were put forward four of five years ago still apply. For those reasons, I cannot commend the new clause to the House.

Mr. Kirkwood: I refute everything that the Minister said about the application of the Loi Monory, but perhaps we should go there and investigate the position. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Further consideration adjourned. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Bill (not amended in the Committee, and as amended in the Standing Committee), to be further considered this day.

Isles of Scilly

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

3 am

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Even at 3 o'clock in the morning I warmly welcome the opportunity of raising the problems facing one of the most beautiful parts of the country, the Isles of Scilly. In doing so, I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for agreeing to reply to this debate, because it has had a change of title. My original intention had been to raise the problem of electricity charges on the Isles of Scilly, but because of a pending court case it was thought that this might be sub judice. With the Minister's agreement I have now brought forward the debate on the general problems of the Isles of Scilly.

Those problems are deep-seated and long-standing. To many holidaymakers enjoying themselves in the Isles of Scilly these islands must seem like paradise, but they are a paradise with real problems. I hope to touch on some of those problems straight away, but before doing so perhaps I could call in aid no less a person than HRH Prince Charles the Duke of Cornwall, who last year wrote a foreword to a very comprehensive study carried out by Graham Moss Associates into the economy and the development of those isles. In his foreword Prince Charles pointed out that the islands have a unique environment which is enjoyed by many thousands of people each year. He went on to say:

"However, in recent years, economic pressures have become more intense and the Islands' economy has become more fragile."

These islands, five of which are inhabited with a population of just under 2,000, are some 30 miles west of Land's End and they rejoice, perhaps quite rightly to an extent, in the title "the fortunate islands". But, as I have said, there are real and long-standing problems. The cost of living on the islands is appreciably higher than on the mainland in many regards. It was calculated last year, in the Graham Moss report to which I have referred, that probably the cost of living on Scilly is 10 per cent. to 35 per cent. higher than on the mainland. Even if one excludes housing costs, which are exceptionally high, the cost of living is probably 8 per cent. to 12 per cent. higher than on the mainland. This extra cost springs in part from the difficulties of transportation. Practically everything consumed on the island has to be brought, normally on the ferry, from Penzance, some 40 miles away, or by helicopter; and there is now a Skyvan service to the islands.

Similarly, all the produce grown, the flowers and the early potatoes, has to be transported to the mainland. The difficulties are compounded if one happens to live on one of the four off-islands, because normally there is that extra leg of a journey from the main island, St. Mary's, to the off islands. It is not a question only of freight. It is also a question of passengers. This is a considerable burden on holiday trade because fares are a very big component of any holiday on the Isles of Scilly and also for islanders themselves when they go to the mainland.

Perhaps I should point out that the Government's recent changes in student travel grant arrangements particularly hit the islanders and, whereas a £100 grant might be quite reasonable for somebody living on the mainland fairly near to his university, for someone who has to travel from the Isles of Scilly that initial leg of the journey before he gets to the mainland is very expensive.

I must not stray too deeply into the vexed question of electricity. However, the islanders have had a 14 per cent. increase in electricity charges this year, whereas the other consumers of the South-West electricity board, on the mainland, have had an increase of under 7 per cent. The charges for electricity on the islands are 37 per cent. higher than on the mainland.

Housing is another very big item of expenditure, and it is difficult to build houses on the islands. The sites and the water and other services are not available, and any properties that become vacant are immediately snapped up for holiday homes or, in some cases, for people coming from the mainland to live. We all know that a distinguished former Member and former Prime Minister lives for part of his time on the island, and is welcome there. He has on many occasions spoken up for the islanders.

Water is a big problem on the island, as is refuse disposal, which has been a major headache over several years. The difficulties continually impinge on the two main industries that sustain the economy of Scilly—tourism and horticulture. I would hate to give the impression that all is gloom. When some two years ago I had the honour to become the Member for St. Ives—my constituency includes these islands — I was worried about their economy. There has been a general upturn in the tourist trade. This year, as well, growers have done reasonably well with their daffodils and potatoes. The islands have considerable strengths. They have a versitile and talented population. I am always struck by the amount of talent — particularly among the young people who have come back to Scilly after a spell on the mainland —by their enterprise, and the way in which they are tackling the problems of the economy.

The Island Council has recently been restructured and an environmental trust has been set up, partly due to Prince Charles's interest in the matter, and there is the project for the extension of electricity to the off-islands, which is being carried out now. That is perhaps one of the biggest developments in the history of Scilly. It has given some uplift to the morale of the islanders.

However, the problems have been there for many years. It would be wrong to say that everything is all right with Scilly, and we need do nothing more. That is rather the traditional approach of successive Governments. They have rather waited for a crisis to hit the islands—be it replacement of the Scillonian, the ferry that linked the mainland to the islands or, quite recently, the threat of the possible closure, for financial reasons, of the islands' airport.

When these crises have arisen, the Government have normally responded, although they may have taken some time to do it. The time has come to try to get away from this rather piecemeal approach to dealing with these deep-seated problems.

What really rankles among my constituents on the islands is the difference between the policy that is handed out to them and that for their counterparts in the Scottish islands. For example, the ferry services to the Scottish islands are heavily subsidised from Government funds.

On electricity charges, the Scottish islanders are in the happy position of paying the same tariff as the consumers on the mainland. Here is the big difference between the treatment given to the Scottish islanders and the treatment which the islanders of Scilly receive. That is grossly unfair to the islanders I represent. I have just been refreshing my memory by looking back through Hansard while we were discussing this year's Finance Bill. In the 1953 Finance Bill the Conservative Government in which Mr. Rab Butler was Chancellor decided that in future income tax should be paid by the islanders. They had escaped it up to that point. The islanders were subsequently made to pay excise licence duty and road fund licence duty.

In recent years the Government have argued that the islanders must be treated in the same way as everyone else in the United Kingdom. My complaint is that in the matters of transport and electricity they are not being treated in exactly the same way as the rest of us who live in the United Kingdom. That is unfair and I hope the Government will direct their attention to those problems.

I can understand the reluctance of the Government to give operating subsidies, be they for a ferry service or for electricity. At the moment there is a subsidy towards electricity, although it is paid for by consumers in the area of the south western electricity board on the mainland. I can understand the Government's reluctance to go down the path of operating subsidies, but if they are not going to go down that path, then they should give some other compensating payments to the islanders. To a certain extent they do, and I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Minister will say something about rate support grant. I would be the first to acknowledge that the islanders have been treated quite well in that respect. But there is a case for doing more.

One imaginative idea which has been put forward is that the islands should be made a duty-free zone. That would certainly help the tourist trade, but there are other ways of helping the islands. For example, the very energetic branch of the National Farmers' Union on the island put forward and pressed for a long time a shopping list of measures which would give the island's growers some real benefit from their recently won status as a less favoured area under European Community policies. I hope the Agriculture Ministers will look at that in detail.

A programme has been drawn up with the European Community in connection with capital and other development projects using largely European funds. The trouble here is that the Government have shown a marked reluctance—I must say this—to provide their share of the finance needed to carry out integrated development operations. I hope that the Government will have a serious look at this matter because from my past experience as a Euro MP for Cornwall and Plymouth, when I was deeply involved in this matter in the early stages, I know that the Commission is eager to do something along those lines for the islands.

Some years ago, I arranged to take the director for regional policy from the Commission in Brussels to the islands. He saw the problems for himself, and the Commission is very receptive to the idea of a development programme for the islands for which the Commission of the European Community would probably provide over 50 per cent. of the necessary finance.

A considerable amount of work needs to be done, particularly on water supplies and the quays for the off-islands to allow inter-island launches to get to the off-islands much more easily than at present. A range of imaginative proposals were included in the report to which I referred earlier.

My plea is that the Government should take a hard look at Scilly and not wait for the next crisis, which could come any day. We must try to get the economy of the islands on a much sounder basis. Prince Charles said in the foreward that I mentioned earlier that he hoped that it would be possible for the islands to move towards a more secure and prosperous future. That is certainly my wish.

3.16 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I endorse the final comments of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris). I am sure that we both share those aspirations.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing these issues to the attention of the House. It is easy to forget—or for many to realise — the many problems faced by the inhabitants of our offshore islands; everyday matters which, on the mainland, we take for granted, such as easy transport links, electricity and other services. We would all do well to reflect that the Scilly Isles are rather further from the coast of England than the continent of Europe. My hon. Friend ably represents these distant parts of his constituency. His constituents will be grateful to him for raising these issues and they are doubly fortunate to have as their Member a man who knows his way round the corridors of Strasbourg and Luxembourg and knows how to harness the needs of his constituents to possible funding from Europe.

My ministerial colleagues at the Department have very much valued the contact that they have had both with my hon. Friend and with the officers of the Council for the Isles of Scilly. My noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale had a most informative and enjoyable visit to the Isles last year and experienced both their problems and their generous hospitality at first hand. I know that he would want me to record that he found his visit stimulating and rewarding; it gave him a clearer insight into the serious difficulties that remote island communities have to face. That was of great help to all of us in the Department.

I do not wish to dwell solely on the islands' problems. They have an outstanding reputation as a paradise for tourists. Distinguished royal visitors, former Prime Ministers and Cabinet Ministers have found them a haven from the pressures of the mainland. The islands are also a source of high quality horticulture.

As regards tourism, I was delighted to read the article in the April edition of "In Britain" which, in narrative form, sets out some of the islands' many virtues. On horticulture, the House needs no lessons in geography to recognise the Isles as a source of early spring flowers, and it is no surprise that the word "Scilly" is derived from another word meaning sunny.

I shall not deal tonight with some of the points raised by my hon. Friend, but I will give him a fulsome reply in due course.

The Government have been impressed by the comprehensiveness of the final report on the integrated operations study of the Isles of Scilly commissioned by its council.

European Commission regional policy aims to "promote the convergence of national economies and a more balanced distribution of economic activities within Community territory".

The integrated development operation approach is an attempt to further this co-ordination. The concept is based on the assumption that in some areas it may be possible to increase the impact of expenditure by further co-ordination of Community aid and domestic expenditure.

[Mr. Neil Macfarlane]

Throughout the preparation of the study, I was pleased to note the good working relationship between the parties involved and I am sure that that was a decisive factor in ensuring the successful completion of their work.

We are well aware of the economic problems of the islands, and the report clearly outlines a varied list of schemes aimed at improving the wellbeing of the islands, for both the residents and the many visitors attracted by their outstanding natural beauty. I note that the consultants have not only identified schemes for implementation over the next 10 to 15 years, but have given them priority ratings. That is a sensible step towards the sound future planning of the islands' economy, and is in line with the Commission's philosophy of how integrated operations studies should operate.

The European Commission and the Government have, however, made it clear that integrated operations should not be seen as a means of obtaining additional funds, whether European or domestic. The Isles of Scilly representatives have always been advised that the concept was intended to help improve the co-ordination of existing financial mechanisms for promoting development — a point which is now well reflected in the European regional development fund regulation, which came into being on 1 January 1985.

At present there is no Community machinery for considering as a totality applications which are currently handled by separate Directorates General in Brussels under different timetables.

Until the Commission has further clarified its position on the designation of "integrated operation areas", the Government will continue to submit eligible schemes from the islands at the highest rates available under the existing fund structures. To that end, my Department's officials have recently submitted a number of top priority schemes for ERDF grant aid at the highest grant rate of 55 per cent. My Department's officials will do all that they can to ensure that the Commission reaches a positive decision on those schemes. I fully accept that my hon. Friend wants a constructive policy, which is not wholly reactive, but steady, consistent and forward looking.

My hon. Friend expressed great concern about what he feels to be the injustice that the Isles of Scilly must suffer compared with the Scottish islands regarding transport services to the mainland. He has argued ably that if the transport services to Scotland can be subsidised, why should not those to the Isles of Scilly, which are of a comparable nature and equally remote. I must admit that I could, on the face of it, feel some sympathy for that view, but the case is not as straightforward as it seems. The long-standing subsidies for shipping given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland are made under Scottish legislation, and new legislation would be required to do that in England.

Government policy generally is to oppose subsidies for shipping. But above that, the ferry service to the Isles of Scilly appear to operate profitably, and the Government would find it difficult to justify subsidising an apparently profitable commercial company. We had gone about as far as we could when, a few years ago, we gave them a returnable grant for a new ship which was of real assistance, and should not be overlooked. In addition, the Isles of Scilly Steamship Company has been exploring ways of making its service more economical and reliable.

Similarly, we could not directly subsidise the air services. There are a number of them, although the backbone is the helicopter link provided by British Airways. But there are other, again apparently profitable, commercial services. The Government have, however, given the isles substantial indirect help over the past three years in the form of grants to make good deficits incurred in running St. Mary's airport, which the council took over in 1982. In total, nearly £190,000 has been provided or approved, which has enabled the council to consolidate its position so that it now expects the airport accounts to show a surplus. I am sure that my hon. Friend will share my view that that is a most welcome development.

My hon. Friend also raised the question of the disparity between the isles' and mainland electricity charges. I cannot comment on that as the matter is before the courts and is, therefore, sub judice. However, I should like to point out on a related matter that mains cabling is now being installed to the islands of Bryher, St. Agnes, St. Martin's and Tresco, for which I know the islanders have pressed long and hard. That will bring real benefits to the communities. There may be some grant aid available from the council to help householders bring electricity installations up to the standard required for mains supply where such installations do not already meet it.

The Government are providing substantial assistance towards the cabling to the off-islands, with a contribution from the Countryside Commission of £132,000. The Duchy of Cornwall has also agreed in principle to a contribution of £100,000.

An application for ERDF grant aid has also been made, and was submitted to the European Commission in June this year. A grant rate of 55 per cent. is being sought. The application was prepared following discussion with my Department and South-West electricity board officials. SWEB officials visited Brussels to seek the European Commission's support for both the concept of the scheme and the option chosen. That involved a certain amount of more expensive undergrounding because of the need to preserve the island's environment. The Commission is expected to announce its decision in the autumn.

My hon. Friend raised the question of students' travel costs and the position of the few students from the Isles of Scilly who are attending distant institutions. I appreciate the point, but I understand from my colleagues in the Department of Education and Science that a number of institutions in particular areas elsewhere have also made similar representations.

The Government made it clear from the start that any policy which would achieve a worthwhile degree of administrative simplification, as well as ending the open-ended commitment to public expenditure which the present arrangements entail, would necessarily involve an element of rough justice.

Students from the Isles of Scilly will be at some disadvantage, particularly if they choose to study at institutions at the opposite end of the country. Any student who chooses to study at an institution remote from his home will need to give careful attention to the resources available. Any help for particular groups of students could only be provided at the expense of others and we do not believe this to be justified. It would also reintroduce complications into the system which would effectively defeat our primary objective of simplification.

For all of those reasons, the Government would be reluctant to contemplate any immediate change in the present system. But, as my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science said in the House last October, if, once the new system has had a chance to settle, we are presented with compelling evidence that some students are facing hardship and if a means is available to overcome any problems in an administratively efficient way. I can assure the House that we shall look at them again. This is the only way to proceed.

My hon. Friend has raised the question of local authority expenditure and the rate support grant. He said that they had not done badly this year. The Isles of Scilly's target for 1985-86 of £1·3 million, is an increase of nearly 3 per cent. on the 1984-85 budget, and an increase of 2·5 per cent. on last year's target.

The council's grant-related expenditure this year at about £1·4 million is up 11 per cent. on last year's figure. This large increase is due to a recalculation of the Isles of Scilly special costs component, to include for the first time expenditure on transport. That will be welcomed. I know that the council has requested that sewerage and sewage disposal should be included in the special costs component, but the Government believe that the component overall adequately reflects the additional costs faced by the Isles council attributable to the Isles' remoteness. My hon. Friend will be glad to note that we have, however, agreed to reconsider the matter at a later date.

I hope that I have dealt with all the points. I am confident that everything can be studied closely by officials and Ministers. We have the interests of the islanders at heart. I am sure that my hon. Friend will be patient while I look into the other matters which he raised this evening.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes past Three o'clock am.

House of Commons

Wednesday 10 July 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

EAST LOTHIAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (MUSSELBURGH LINKS, ETC.) ORDER CONFIRMATION

Mr. Secretary Younger presented a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under section 7 of the Private Legislation Prodecure (Scotland) Act 1936, relating to East Lothian District Council (Musselburgh Links, etc.): And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be considered upon Tuesday 16 July and to be printed. [Bill 187.]

SHETLAND ISLANDS COUNCIL ORDER CONFIRMATION

Mr. Secretary Younger presented a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under section 7 of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936, relating to Shetland Islands Council: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be considered upon Tuesday 16 July and to be printed. [Bill 188.]

PETERHEAD HARBOURS (SOUTH BAY DEVELOPMENT) ORDER CONFIRMATION

Mr. Secretary Younger presented a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under section 8 of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936, relating to Peterhead Harbours (South Bay Development): And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Thursday 18 July and to be printed. [Bill 189.]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Regional Water Authorities

1. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received regarding the proposed privatisation of the regional water authorities.

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): Twenty-nine, Sir.

Mr. Hoyle: Why does the Minister persist in putting the public's health at risk by water privatisation? Does he not realise that water is an essential commodity which cannot be substituted? What will happen to investment in the water authorities, especially with respect to replacing sewerage and recreation centres? Does this mean that the water supply will be in the hands of the City of London and foreign investment? Why does the hon. Gentleman persist in this folly, especially as the public are outraged by this privatistion?

Does the hon. Gentleman not realise that if he continues with this programme the public will rise up and give him a black eye? That is no trivial matter.

Mr. Gow: I am aware that water is essential to human life. The House would do well to remember that 25 per cent. of the British people are already provided with fresh water by the private water companies. Hon. Members should understand that many great benefits will accrue to the water industry and, above all, to customers if we can bring a measure of privatisation to the water industry. The Government intend persevering in their examination to ascertain whether they can bring some free enterprise to the industry.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Long supplementary questions lead to long ministerial replies, which cannot help Question Time.

Sir John Page: Is my hon. Friend aware that private water companies are celebrating this year their 100th anniversary of supplying wholesome water to the people? Will my hon. Friend consider, during discussions on privatisation, the possibility of using the legislation covering the water companies as a model for the privatisation of the authorities?

Mr. Gow: There could be no better example of the success of the private water companies than the successful private water company of which my hon. Friend is a director. During our examination of privatisation we shall certainly consider the lessons that we can learn from the successful private companies.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: How many water authorities have been exempted from the EEC requirement which came into effect this month on the amount of nitrates allowable in drinking water?

Mr. Gow: Although that matter does not arise directly from this question, I can point out that I had a meeting yesterday with the Government's Chief Medical Adviser on the subject. I shall be announcing the decision on derogations shortly.

Mr. Stanbrook: If a decision is taken on that matter, will my hon. Friend bear in mind that it is desirable not only that costs should be kept as low as possible but that there should be no great variation of water prices throughout Britain? That would be most undesirable as regards past investment in the industry and what is available now. Such a variation might widen the gap between those areas that are fortunate in fostering investment and those that are not.

Mr. Gow: I shall certainly consider my hon. Friend's advice. I remind the House that among the advantages of privatisation will be the possibility that those who at present work for water authorities and, not least, those who are customers of the water authorities will become shareholders.

Mr. Cowans: Will the Minister reflect on the fact that water is far too important a commodity, to use his own words, to leave to the "whims" of the free market? If he will not reflect on that, I am bound to say that the Labour party in power will return it to public control. If the private sector is so good, will the Minister kindly explain why the private firm that supplies Eastbourne charges more than the public sector?

Mr. Gow: It used to be believed, even by some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, that the ratchet-effect of Socialism was such that any threat to renationalise that which we denationalised should be taken seriously. I say to the House and to the engaging Labour party spokesman on water that a threat to renationalise that which we may denationalise is no threat.

Mr. Cowans: Eastbourne.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is not the present position unsatisfactory, in that those who supply water are not properly accountable as virtually all water authorities, with some notable exceptions, meet in private? Why would a privatised system be more accountable than the present system, which is hardly accountable to consumers? What protection will there be to ensure a pure water supply?

Mr. Gow: It is because the present organisation of the water industry, though greatly improved since 1979, is not yet perfect that we are examining the possibility of a measure of privatisation. I should have thought that the Liberal party, which claims to be the party of participation, would have welcomed the opportunity for more and more customers and more and more employees to become owners of the business. It is characteristic of the Liberal party—that band of visionary missionaries with neither vision nor mission—that it should make a wet observation of that kind.

Derelict Dormant Land

2. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres of publicly owned derelict dormant land now appear on the register of vacant land; and how that compares with the figures for each of the last three years.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): At the end of June 1985 the land registers showed 113,000 acres of unused or underused land owned by local authorities and other public bodies in England. Figures for the last three years are:

1982 95,000 acres
1983 109,000 acres
1984 114,000 acres

Those figures conceal the fact that over 21,000 acres have been removed since the registers started because the land has been sold or brought back into use.

Mr. Steen: In view of the immense amount of land stuck on the registers, which I believe is only the tip of the iceberg, will my right hon. Friend consider privatising public land, raising the necessary finance through the issue of industrial revenue bonds, and amending planning laws so that a national, wasting asset may be put to excellent use?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend's proposals are interesting. We wish to persuade local authorities to use the land, because the public hoarding of land when nothing is planned for it and nothing is happening to it is unacceptable. I shall certainly consider my hon. Friend's proposals.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Is the Minister aware that a great deal of public and private land from which the negative value has been removed by public money from the Merseyside development corporation is still standing idle because private developers will not go on it?

Mr. Baker: Merseyside development corporation is undertaking some of the best developments on Merseyside, as I think the hon. Gentleman will recognise. Members on both sides of the House will agree that it is a disgrace when public authorities—local authorities or nationalised industries—own land and are doing nothing with it, and that that land should be sold and developed.

Mr. Ward: My right hon. Friend will be aware of the pressure on housing land in the south. Is it not a scandal that those authorities are still holding on to land which in many cases is derelict? Has the time not come to give up persuasion and to set a time limit on how long those authorities may hang on to what is a valuable and, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) said, wasting asset?

Mr. Baker: A third of the land is in the inner cities, and the Government are not sitting idly by. We have already issued four directions, and in June my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that he was thinking of giving warnings that he would issue instructions on a further 50 sites covering some 388 acres. We are moving energetically.

Mr. Freeson: Is not one of the biggest single obstacles to bringing derelict land back into use, particularly in inner cities, the Government's failure to remove the restrictions on the expenditure of derelict land grant? Have not hundreds of projects submitted by local authorities been held up by the Government's restrictions? Could such schemes not bring commerce, industry and housing, and private investment to match public expenditure, if only the Government would increase the permitted expenditure?

Mr. Baker: We have substantially increased expenditure on derelict land grants since we came into office. It has increased again this year to about £75 million a year. I agree with everything that the right hon. Gentleman said, and I hope that there will be an increase next year.

Office Development

3. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his policy towards the control of office development in the light of the report on office rents and rates 1973 to 1985, published in May by Debenham, Tewson and Chinnocks, a copy of which has been sent to him.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): I have read the report with interest.

Mr. Boyes: That was a pathetic answer. Does not an hon. Member who has tabled a question deserve an answer from a Minister? Should the Minister not have taken into consideration the comments by Mr. Peter Evans, the head of research at Debenham, Tewson and Chinnocks, who said that office accommodation is cheaper now than for a long time, and that one cannot claim that the rates burden is causing rent rises because the relationship between the two is not proved, rents not having risen in real terms over the past few years? How does the Minister justify that statement?

Mr. Waldegrave: I read the report with interest, because it says:

"As found in both the association's report and our survey, commercial rates in the inner London boroughs have risen by one of the lowest margins in the last 10 years and this can be attributed directly to the Government's rate capping controls."

For that and other reasons, I read the report carefully.

Mr. Dickens: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Debenham, Tewson and Chinnocks annual report is crammed with statistics and does not make good bedtime reading? Only one sentence in it could affect and influence the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes)—that which said that many office accommodation owners are moving out of the London area, and perhaps into the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Will not economic measures influence such moves, with offices then going to the provinces?

Mr. Waldegrave: The move to constituencies such as that of the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) might be the kind of phenomenon that the report shows, because it shows that because of the rates office accommodation has been tending to move out of areas such as Lambeth and Southwark.

South-East (Housing Demand)

4. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made concerning the supply and demand for houses in the south-east of England.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): While my Department does not attempt to forecast housing supply and demand, it publishes much information on recent trends. The London and south-east regional planning conference—SERPLAN—is preparing an assessment of future housing requirements in the region.

Mr. Proctor: Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the proposals to meet the alleged shortfall is that proposed by Consortiums Developments Ltd. to build a new town of 5,000 houses in my constituency between West Horndon and Bulphan? Is my right hon. Friend further aware that that proposal has led to universal and substantial all-party opposition from the Essex county council, from the London borough of Thurrock and from the villages of Bulphan and West Horndon and the local Members of Parliament? Will he take that into account when he makes his decision?

Mr. Jenkin: I am aware of the proposal to which my hon. Friend draws attention. The matter will be dealt with in accordance with normal planning procedures. There is a planning application before the Thurrock borough council, and it will be for it to take a view in the first instance.

Mr. Dubs: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that in inner London there are many badly housed or homeless people who are too poor to compete effectively in the private housing market and that his policies of cutting back on the public sector are denying many of them the chance of decent homes in their lifetimes?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman will recognise that it has been Government policy that the demand for new homes should primarily be met by the private sector and that the number of houses built by the private sector has increased substantially. The Government recognise that there will always be a proportion of the population unable to afford the full cost of private sector housing. For them, the housing associations and local authorities will provide a way to be housed. But it is up to the local authorities to make the best use of their resources and not, for instance, have up to 25,000 houses and flats empty for more than a year. If they can deal with that, they may be able to help some of the homeless.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is no proof of the size of demand for new houses in central Berkshire to justify the foisting of an excessive number of houses on to the area completely against the wishes of the people, the local planning authority and local business?

Mr. Jenkin: I am aware of my hon. Friend's forcefully expressed views on this, which I know are reflected in those of a great many of those whom he represents. The Government will be making their view public on this shortly.

Dr. Macdonald: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, according to his Department's figures, there is enough land available with planning permission to continue building houses at the present rate in Essex until 1990? Is he aware, further, that the proposals by Consortium Developments to use green belt land is opposed by the leading Labour group on Thurrock borough council and that, furthermore, Thurrock borough council is considering plans to use derelict land which is available in Thurrock and can build a further 5,000 to 6,000 houses on it and that therefore Consortium Developments' planning application to misuse green belt land should be firmly rejected by his Department?

Mr. Jenkin: I am sure the hon. Lady recognises that if Consortium Developments appealed against a refusal of permission or a failure to give permission within the specified time, that appeal would have to come to my Department and that it would be wrong for me to express any view on the merits of the proposal to which she referred.

Mr. Soames: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the south-east many people are extremely alarmed about the pressure on land for house building? That being so, will he assure the House that he will respect the integrity of the county plans, which are an important protection for my constituents?

Mr. Jenkin: Yes, indeed. The county structure plans are one of the mechanisms whereby it is possible to regulate the development of housing in areas which are already under pressure. My hon. Friend will know that the Government have made it abundantly clear again and again that they do not wish to see development on the green belt, where the protection should be permanent, and that they do not want to see good agricultural land taken. At the same time, it has to be said that there is a demand for housing in the south-east, as there is in other parts of the country. It is our policy to make sure that sufficient suitable land comes forward for that purpose to meet the demand.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Given that incomes in my constituency average about £5,000 and that the average price in the private sector is £39,000 for a flat and £48,000 for a terraced house, will the right hon. Gentleman give some thought—given that he accepts the demand for low-cost homes for sale in docklands, especially from young married couples—to introducing new schemes and methods of finance so that people can live where they work and come from and not be forced to move from the area when the demand is there, the land is there and the supply could be there as well?

Mr. Jenkin: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, and he knows of the various low-cost home ownership schemes promoted by the Government. He also knows that in his constituency the London Docklands development corporation has been among the foremost in making use of those schemes so that his constituents can occupy homes close to where they have always lived on land which for many years has lain derelict. I hope that the hon. Gentleman approves of that.

Mr. Squire: Despite comments from some of my hon. Friends, does my right hon. Friend accept that in parts of east London and south-west Essex there is considerable unmet demand for houses to buy? That must be taken into account when he considers these policies, because many young people are being driven from where they wish to live.

Mr. Jenkin: I certainly take most careful note of what my hon. Friend said. It reflects my impression, as I also have a constituency in that area.

Mr. John Fraser: Is the Secretary of State aware that in Greater London the average price of a pre-1919 terraced house is now almost £50,000, which is twice the national average and well beyond the means of many needy first-time buyers? Is he further aware that that extremely high price is a reflection of the 1,000 per cent. increase in the south-east in land prices since the Government took office? Does he agree that we have, not a housing policy, but a speculators' bonanza? Will he now engage in an exercise of positive planning to identify private land, along the lines suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), which can be used for private housing, without raping the green belt for private profit?

Mr. Jenkin: The Government certainly want to see the maximum possible use of inner city land that is available for housing for that purpose. However, one of the best ways in which inner city authorities, particularly those in London, can meet the needs of the families to whom the hon. Gentleman referred is to bring into use by homesteading or other ways the many thousands of empty houses and flats that they have on their books. It is a scandal that so many should be allowed to remain empty for so long, and that homeless families must then be put into bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I again appeal for brief questions.

Liverpool (Rates)

5. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to meet Liverpool city council leaders to discuss the council's recent decision about rates.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: No, Sir.

Mr. Parry: Will the Secretary of State at least meet elected Members of Parliament to discuss this critical position and consider meeting council leaders? Meantime, will he ask the district auditor to withdraw the letter that has been sent to councillors who are defending jobs, services and rates in Liverpool? The right hon. Gentleman knows that the previous Tory-Liberal coalition left Liverpool city council in a mess, because he saw that for himself. Is it not a disgrace that councillors could be banned from office or gaoled for carrying out their pledges to their citizens?

Mr. Jenkin: The district auditor is completely independent of central Government, which has been the case since the office was first established 150 years ago. I therefore have no power to control him in the performance of his duties. However, it is a complete fallacy to imagine that the problems which now beset Liverpool city council are all the making of its predecessors. The present councillors were given time last year to put their house in order, but they failed utterly to do anything about it. On the hon. Gentleman's first point, I shall be ready to meet Members of Parliament from Liverpool who would like to discuss the matter.

Mr. Favell: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to remind the people of Liverpool that they are heavily dependent on the charity of taxpayers in other areas, and that many of those hard-working people resent their money being poured down the bottomless hole which the leaders of Liverpool city council seem determined to create?

Mr. Jenkin: The Government certainly think it right to give substantial help to Merseyside in general and Liverpool in particular. We look to Liverpool city council to do more to help itself. Why does collecting the refuse in Liverpool cost the council double the number of rounds as, and 25 per cent. more staff than, in Birmingham, which is twice the size of Liverpool? That is an example of the woeful inefficiency of Liverpool city council.

Mr. Heffer: Will the Secretary of State repudiate what his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) said? The people of Liverpool or elsewhere do not receive charity from anyone. [Interruption.] Although many of the problems were caused by the previous administration in Liverpool, the basic problem is that the rate support grant was cut drastically by the Government over several years, and this year the housing investment programme for Liverpool was cut. On that basis, is it not clear that a reversal of policy is needed? As the Government are already intending to go in that direction, why not start now?

Mr. Jenkin: If the Liverpool city council was prepared to tailor its budget so that it could live within its target, it could have rate support grant this year of £118 million. If it succeeded in living within its target, it could manage its services with a very modest rate rise.

Mrs. Currie: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the disastrous policies of the current Liverpool city council serve only to make things worse in that sad city by deterring any potential employer from moving there? Will he say why people in south Derbyshire should have to fork out a ton of money to keep that council afloat on the Mersey when the money could be far better spent on our own ratepayers and taxpayers?

Mr. Jenkin: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I hope that members of the Liverpool city council will recognise, from what has been said from the Conservative Benches, that Parliament's patience is running very short. It is high time that they set about putting their house in order instead of continually standing with their hands outstretched, asking for more money.

Mr. Alton: Is it not the case that, by budgeting for £100 million above the income that the council will receive this year, the trouble has been brought on the heads of the councillors because they have practised policies of self-immolation? Will the Secretary of State give the House an assurance the he will not send a commissioner to Liverpool —he would be seen as the Prime Minister's henchman — but will instead allow the law to run its natural course? Will he also give assurances to council employees, who are worried about what will happen to them when the money runs out?

Mr. Jenkin: The employees of the council, including the members of NALGO and of the teachers' unions, have already made their anxieties extremely plain to the ruling majority on the Liverpool city council. The law will take its course as the district auditors' proceedings go through the normal process. I have no power whatever to send in commissioners. I hope that the Liverpool city council will take the steps that still remain within its powers to set its affairs in order.

Mr. Wareing: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the people of Mossley Hill do not need a Tory Member of Parliament when they have the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton)?

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the people of Liverpool are trying to put their affairs in order? They have 17 priority housing areas. He has seen the housing problems on Merseyside, and will see them again during his visit next Friday. He refuses to acknowledge the real needs of the people of Merseyside and prefers instead to dissipate taxpayers' money on international garden festivals and Tate galleries for the north, which, while desirable, are not first priorities for the people of Liverpool.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman has been less than fair to those who successfully carried through Britain's first international garden festival. Nothing did more to lift the spirits of the people of Liverpool than that festival last year. They demanded that it should be opened again this year, and it has been. That in no way excuses the failure of the Liverpool city council to use the time that it was given last year to put its house in order, to seek to get more efficient services and better value for money, and so live within its income. It is because the council has failed to do that that it is now facing very serious problems.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Minister accept some responsibility, as the Minister responsible for Merseyside —as was his predecessor—for the fact that hard drug-taking among young people has increased fourfold, while at the same time Government policies have created a situation in which the leader of Liverpool city council, a JP and retired schoolmaster who has never broken the law in his life, is being turned into a law-breaker by the Government because he wants to defend services for the elderly, the disabled and the children in Liverpool?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is seriously misrepresenting the situation. If Councillor Hamilton or any other councillor of Liverpool city council chooses to go outside the law and vote for a budget or rate which may or may not be illegal, that is a matter for the courts. That is their decision. It is in no sense a decision of the Government, and I repudiate wholly what he has said.

Council Housing Stock

6. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will institute a survey in all major cities of council housing stock to discover how much money necessary repairs will cost.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): My Department has already launched such an inquiry. On 11 April of this year my Department wrote to all local housing authorities in England asking them for information on the condition of their housing stock, and the expenditure they estimate is needed to put it in good condition. Local authorities' returns are now being processed and I hope initial results will be available by the end of this month.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that Sheffield launched such a survey, the results of which show that hundreds of millions of pounds are needed at a time when the trail of destruction of cuts by the Government is not only allowing the infrastructure to degenerate on a grand scale but is causing the superstructure to degenerate? When will the hon. Gentleman realise that, as a result of those cuts and the ensuing rate capping, it is impossible to provide services for people in the way that councils have been doing for years because the Government are cutting out the money that is needed to repair council houses, for which the waiting lists grow longer every week?

Sir George Young: On the first point, my Department is indeed analysing the results of the survey that Sheffield council has done. As I said, we hope that the results will be available by the end of the month. With regard to reductions in public expenditure investment in housing, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, between 1974 and 1979 public sector investment in housing fell by 45 per cent., after allowing for inflation, and since we came to power it has fallen by 26 per cent. on the same basis, so I reject his criticism.

Mr. Galley: Has my hon. Friend had any discussions with the Halifax building society about the approval of repair schemes for pre-cast reinforced concrete houses in major cities or elsewhere? If so, can he tell the House what types of houses and what methods of repair may now be eligible for mortgages from the Halifax as a result of what seems to be an excellent initiative by the society?

Sir George Young: I was delighted to learn that the Halifax building society has agreed that PRC houses repaired under the NHBC schemes will automaticaly be accepted by the society for a mortgage. It has done this in advance of formal approval by the NHBC. I very much welcome that initiative, which I think will be greatly welcomed by many owners. I hope that it will not be too long before other building societies follow in its wake.

Mr. Cartwright: Does the Minister recognise that the massive problems of dampness and condensation, which affect so many flats in constituencies like mine, result directly from the fact that many tenants simply cannot afford adequate heating in their own homes, particularly when they have to contend with wickedly expensive and inefficient heating systems put in during the 1960s? What steps are the Government planning to help local authorities to tackle those problems?

Sir George Young: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I visited his constituency and met a number of the tenants in some of the more difficult estates in Greenwich. If Greenwich borough council wishes to spend part of its HIP on improving the heating systems in local authority stock, the Government would not question its priority. We shall be discussing at a later stage with Greenwich and other local authorities which have difficulty what can be done through the newly established unit on urban housing renewal, which my Department launched a few weeks ago.

Mr. Frank Cook: *Having carried out this survey, will my hon. Friend also take the opportunity to examine the length of time for which council houses remain void in the Middlesbrough area in particular, and the outstanding rents that are owed in that area? If the two things were brought together, after 50 years of almost continuous rule by the Labour authority in Middlesbrough, the situation would improve for council house and other tenants in that region.

Sir George Young: I agree with my hon. Friend that if houses are left unlet there is a loss of income. Likewise, if rents are not collected, the local authority is also out of pocket. This may inhibit the level of service that it can provide to tenants and ratepayers. I hope that Middlesbrough will respond to the prodding of my hon. Friend and reduce the number of vacant properties and outstanding debts.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has the Minister seen the Royal Institute of British Architects' survey on local authority housing entitled "Decaying Britain", which shows that £10,000 million is needed to deal with the backlog of repairs and maintenance? Is the Minister aware that selling council houses will not raise that amount of money? Where will it come from? Will the Government cough up? Can the people who live in that housing be assured that these problems will be resolved?

Sir George Young: As of a few days ago, I understood that the policy, supported by a number of the hon. Friends of the hon. Gentleman, was to sell council houses. I am surprised to learn that this policy does not have the support of the hon. Gentleman. On the figure of £10 billion that he mentioned, I have seen a range of figures, from £10 billion up to £20 billion, from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. When we have the results of the survey to which I referred we shall have a much clearer picture of how much money is needed to catch up with the backlog of repairs to local authority stock.

*The question was in fact asked by Mr. Holt. see Official Report, 11 July 1985, c. 1291.

Mr. Hill: My hon. Friend realises that repairs and maintenance are a serious matter for any city. The citizens who occupy council tenancies in Southampton are very angry with the Labour-controlled council because its repairs fund is underspent by £600,000, due mainly to a series of mistakes and omissions. Whatever may be the council's excuse, this is deplorable when one realises how much of the housing stock of some cities is in need of repair.

Sir George Young: I hope that the electors of Southampton will wreak their vengeance on a local authority which has failed to spend the resources that have been made available to it. It is worth reminding the House that expenditure this year on renovating public sector housing stock is running at over £1 billion. That is an increase on the 1979 figure.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: Does the Under-Secretary of State really need an inquiry to point out to him that the major social problem in many of our inner cities is the repair of houses, when people are constantly complaining about the condition of their houses? When the report is published there will be only one recommendation: that local authorities need money to help them to repair their housing stock.

Sir George Young: I referred not to an inquiry but, to a survey. We require up-to-date, accurate information about what is needed to put local authority housing stock into a better condition. My Department has asked for this information to be made available in time for the public expenditure round. When we have the information we shall be better placed to make decisions and solve the problems to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred.

Dr. Cunningham: Is the Secretary of State confessing to the House and to the millions of people who live in substandard and inadequate accommodation that the Government do not understand the problems and do not have the information? If, when the survey is completed, the overwhelmimg evidence that is already available from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Royal Institute of British Architects and others is confirmed, will the Government provide the extra resources that are needed to help the millions of families who are living in squalor, dampness and freezing conditions?

Sir George Young: The problems to which the hon. Gentleman has just referred have not arisen only during the last four or five years. They are due to years of neglect and bad management of local authority stock. The Government are trying to obtain an up-to-date and accurate assessment of the resources that are needed. When we have that information we shall be better placed to negotiate the resources that are needed.

Halvergate Marshes

7. Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made by the Government to save the Halvergate marshes.

Mr. Waldegrave: One hundred and eighteen applications have been received under the Broads experimental scheme, covering nearly 95 per cent. of the estimated total eligible grazing marshes. The scheme will run for three years and all the applicants have agreed not to plough or destroy their marshland and to manage it in sympathy with conservation objectives. In return, they will receive an annual payment of £50 per acre. This take-up is very encouraging and should do much to ensure that this landscape is preserved.

Mr. Lord: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer. I am very pleased that the Halvergate scheme is proceeding so well. At the same time, I urge him to continue to seek a balance between agriculture and conservation, particularly in environmentally sensitive areas such as the Halvergate marshes.

Mr. Waldegrave: This experimental scheme is an outstanding example of co-operation between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Countryside Commission. It may provide useful lessons for the development by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, of his environmentally sensitive areas scheme.

Mr. Dalyell: Is not £50 an acre quite a lot of money to pay people for not doing what they ought not to have done anyway? Is this not an argument for the listing of sites of special scientific interest, just as buildings are listed?

Mr. Waldegrave: The problem in the Halvergate area is that there are very few SSSIs. We are involved there with general landscape matters. The interesting point is that the £50 per acre scheme is cheaper than the management agreements for which payments were being made, so it can be argued that the scheme is good value for money.

Mr. Budgen: Has my hon. Friend calculated by how much it would be necessary to reduce cereal prices to remove the financial inducement to plough areas such as the marshes?

Mr. Waldegrave: That would be a difficult calculation to make. The cereal problem is not the only factor. Pressure from the dairy industry meant that there were fewer dairy followers to go to grazing in the Broads, which meant that there was a further incentive to plough. It is a little more complicated than my hon. Friend believes.

Dr. David Clark: Will the Minister pursue the request of his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), because the figures would be interesting? Further to the Minister's reply to the hon. Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord), who is PPS to the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, will he give the House a categorical assurance that no farmers in Halvergate are applying for grants to drain parts of that wetland?

Mr. Waldegrave: On the fundamental point, there is no disagreement between us. The Government have been among the leaders of those seeking more realistic cereal prices in the European Community. It would be rash of me to assure the hon. Gentleman—as I once assured the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—that no field in this area will ever be ploughed. However, we hope that the great majority of the area is now safe.

Capital Spending

8. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received since 19 June from the Association of County Councils on capital spending.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: None, Sir. But I met all the associations on 20 May to discuss the review of the capital control system and the chairman of the ACC wrote to me after that meeting.

Mr. Hunter: Bearing in mind the association's concern about the capital control system and the Audit Commission's condemnation of it, will my right hon. Friend comment on the strength of that feeling and assure us that he will give careful consideration to a recommendation that he either has received or is about to receive from the joint working party of the Department of the Environment and ACC officials?

Mr. Jenkin: The report that Ministers have received certainly confirms the need for a change in the system. It also identifies a number of options, which we have been discussing with the local authority associations. We seek two objectives. The first is to get better control of the totals of capital spending by local authorities, and the second, which is no less important, is to give local authorities greater certainty so that they can plan their expenditure more efficiently.

Mr. Jack Thompson: Is the Secretary of State aware that the present system of capital spending controls is causing absolute chaos for local authorities at all levels, because they do not have the opportunity to plan ahead? Is he aware that capital spending must be planned on as long a term as possible, yet some authorities are working on plans covering less than six months? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that he should consider introducing a proper system of capital spending controls? One cannot criticise controls of some sort, but they must be on a longer-term basis.

Mr. Jenkin: I do not agree with what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I hope that he took some comfort from my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson) on 26 June, when I said that we did not propose to take any action at present where we noticed that there was the prospect of an overspend on local authority capital spending this year. I know that the statement was widely welcomed by local authorities.

Housing (Elderly Persons)

9. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing units built for the elderly were completed by local housing authorities in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Sir George Young: The latest figures of completions of local authority dwellings for the elderly are 10,300, 7,600, 7,600 and 8,500 in 1981 to 1984, respectively. Complete figures are not available for 1980.

Mr. Haynes: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that that is a terrible record and that the Government and particularly the Secretary of State ought to be ashamed of themselves? The Government regularly trip out the claim that they look after the elderly, yet in my constituency and, no doubt, throughout the country, elderly people are living in two-bedroomed houses or three-bedroomed houses which could be allocated to young married couples. Because the Government have cut back on finance, properties for the elderly are not being built. What does the Minister intend to do about that?

Sir George Young: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that local authority renovations in 1984 added 5,200 to the figures which I have just given and that the number of housing association schemes has risen from 1,800 to 2,500. The figures indicate a rising trend, which I hope he welcomes.

Mr. Dickens: Do not the figures announced by the Minister this afternoon represent a good record for pensioners? Do not the figures illustrate vividly that pensioners, in terms of pensions and living accommodation, are far better off under the Conservatives?

Sir George Young: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his robust defence of Government policy. It is worth remembering that a growing number of pensioners are owner-occupiers and have a substantial equity in their own homes. They do not look to the local authority for accommodation in their retirement, but are happy to buy leaseholds on suitable accommodation provided by the private sector—a fact overlooked by the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes).

Housing Investment

10. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local housing authorities which have expressed approval of current Government policy in respect of housing investment.

Mr. Gow: No such list is maintained.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister accept that if there were a list it would be incredibly short? Is he aware that the majority of housing authorities which have to face staff decay and the reality of need, even if Conservative, would be exceedingly critical of present policy? Has the Minister seen the pertinent comments by the retiring ombudsman about improvements, or does he think that everyone other than Ministers is out of step?

Mr. Gow: The common experience of mankind is that all those who receive allocations would like more. The House should understand that.

Mr. Marlow: Given the appalling record of mismanagement by many Labour-controlled local authorities, instead of listening to their whingeing about not having the funds and not being able to cope, why does my hon. Friend not require them to hand over much of their housing to skilfully managed private sector companies, which would have three advantages: first, they would not be politically motivated, secondly, they would be using private not public funds, and, thirdly they might actually know what they were doing?

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend rightly draws attention to the importance of improving the management of our public sector housing stock. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State last month launched the urban housing renewal unit, which is devoted to a much closer partnership between the public and private sectors in trying to find solutions to our housing problems.

Mr. Chris Smith: Since 100,000 homeless families report to local authorities every year, since millions of families are badly housed and in need of council accommodation and since 400,000 construction workers are on the dole, costing the British Exchequer £2,400 million a year, would it not make social, compassionate and economic sense to put those people to work building more houses?

Mr. Gow: The whole House is concerned about the problem of homelessness.

Mr. Dobson: Humbug.

Mr. Gow: It is unworthy of Opposition Members to claim a monopoly of compassion. I am looking forward to visiting the Brent, East and Brent, South constituencies on Monday week, when, in the company of the right hon. and hon. Members who represent those constituencies, I shall examine the severe problems of homelessness in that area. A real contribution to solving the problem of homelessness could be made if some of the 25,300 local authority-owned dwellings which have been empty for more than a year were brought back into use.

Mr. Fairbairn: If my hon. Friend wants a cheap way of improving housing imvestment, will he immediately sell off the historic buildings in which his Department keeps sculptures, which are surrounded by neat little lawns with expensive little notices telling us that we are not allowed to walk on them, so that the buildings can be restored as homes for people by people who care about old buildings?

Mr. Gow: I am not sure that I entirely understand my hon. and learned Friend's suggestion but as it comes from him I shall examine it most carefully.

Mr. Rooker: If the Minister and, indeed, the Secretary of State are so concerned about the homeless, why is the Department refusing to have a British element in the 1987 International Year for the Homeless? Secondly, does the hon. Gentleman agree that an element of Government policy should be investment in housing, including repairs, new build and renewal, at a rate that is at least equal to that of deterioration?

Mr. Gow: I shall discuss with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development, who represents the sponsoring Department, the first issue raised in the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question. Secondly, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State told the House earlier this afternoon that £1 billion a year from housing investment programme allocations is being spent on the repair of our local authority housing stock. In addition, another £1 billion a year is being spent from the housing revenue account.

Southwark Borough Council

12. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings there have been between officials of his Department and senior officers of Southwark borough council since the beginning of 1985; and what were the reasons for such meetings.

Sir George Young: There have been two such meetings this year: a discussion about the redevelopment of the Bonamy estate and one about the disposal of land on the borough's land register. However, my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction is arranging to meet the elected representatives of Southwark, together with their officials, in the near future to discuss the unwarranted delays being experienced by tenants seeking to exercise their right to buy from the council.

Mr. Bowden: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer. I hope that when the meeting takes place my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction will tell the officials of Southwark borough council of the frustration, anger and disappointment that so many of my constituents feel because of the lack of progress with their right-to-buy applications? Will he say what he intends to do about the incompetence and intransigence of Southwark borough council in dealing with the applications?

Sir George Young: I understand my hon. Friend's indignation. He has been in regular contact with my Department about the frustrations of the tenants in his constituency. My Department has formally warned the council under section 23 of the Housing Act 1980 that we are contemplating intervention. Before we take that step we wish to discuss the issue with councillors and officials in the near future. Southwark borough council indulges in meaningless procedural requirements, which delays the opportunity for tenants to buy their homes.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister think again about the powers of the ombudsman? It appears that Southwark and many other authorities are guilty regularly of what is found to be maladministration. There will be no effective remedy until the ombudsman is given power to impose a solution when a local authority is not going about its affairs properly.

Sir George Young: I have noted what the hon. Gentleman has said. I have no doubt that the Government Departments that are responsible for these matters will take account of what he has said and consider whether there is any remedy for the injustice that he has described.

Business Rates

13. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what responses he has received to his letter of 8 March asking for details of the effects of business rates on the location of employment.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received six replies from organisations I consulted. A number of other bodies have also volunteered their interest.

Mr. O'Brien: Will the Minister accept the conclusions of the Cambridge report entitled "The Effects of Rates on the Location of Employment"? The report was commissioned by the Government at a cost of £50,000. It concludes that there is no evidence that rates or rate increases have an effect on employment. It states also that rating does not have an effect on the location of employment in local authority areas. Will the Minister accept the report in full?

Mr. Baker: The dossier which the CBI sent to me does not support what the hon. Gentleman says. If he believes what he says, let him make a speech in Birmingham, where the rates have gone up by 42p this year, or in Newcastle, where they have gone up by 54p. Let him try to persuade the business men in those two great industrial cities that rates are not important.

Mr. Fallon: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a department store in Darlington has a rates bill this year of over £250,000, that many smaller businesses have to pay rates of over £100 a week and that high rates in the north are not only driving businesses away from the region but are dissuading them from coming to the north?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is right — and hon. Members on both sides of the House know from experience that he is right—in saying that high rates by high-spending authorities affect areas adversely. That is true both in jobs and in the domestic area.

Mr. Straw: Why is the Minister refusing to accept the conclusions of the independent study which his Department established? Does he appreciate, since he referred to Birmingham, that that city had the fastest rate of job loss when the Conservatives were in control there and that the rates fell? Is he aware that the report not only said that there was no relationship between rates and unemployment but that it went on to say that higher levels of spending in Labour areas led to higher levels of employment? As there is now clear evidence that Labour policies by Labour-controlled authorities are working to bring down unemployment, when will the Minister change his policies, which have led to massive cuts in services and jobs and have in no way helped the businesses which he claims to represent?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman lives in an unreal world. After the big increase in Birmingham, Ericsons told the leader of Birmingham city council:

> "Your decision to increase your prices, the rates, by 43 per cent. has, at a stroke, reversed our attitude towards our planned further expansion in Birmingham."

That is the real world. High rates affect business decisions and employment.

Written Questions

3.32 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to draw your attention to, and ask your advice about, written question No. 104, which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler), which appears at page 4454 of the Order Paper and which, according to the note on the Order Paper, was tabled only yesterday, but nevertheless will be answered immediately today. That question, clearly put down at the instance of the Home Secretary, asks

"the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he has decided on changes to the immigration rules to comply with the recent judgment of the European Court of Human Rights."

It is clear that the Home Secretary is using this planted question as the occasion to make an announcement about his decision on the matter.

On 3 June I moved a Standing Order No. 10 motion that we should debate this subject, but you, within your discretion, decided that that was not the occasion for such a debate. A month later, the Home Secretary, speaking about the matter, said:

"I made it clear at the time of the decision that we would take whatever steps were necessary to ensure that we were complying with the convention as interpreted by the Court. I hope to announce our plans for doing so shortly."—[Official Report, 4 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 508.]

The implication to a large number of people of a statement such as that by the Home Secretary must have been that he would make an announcement to the House about the Government's decision on a matter of enormous constitutional and human importance to many thousands of women in Britain.

What will now happen is that a written answer will be made available to the hon. Member for Westminster, North and to the press. It will be available to the news media for the rest of the day and be subject to the news management of the Home Office during that period. However, the House will not have an opportunity to question the Home Secretary about his decision.

I am therefore asking you, Mr. Speaker, in your role as guardian of the rights of hon. Members to explain how we can secure a statement to the House by the Home Secretary in oral form so that we may question him on a decision of very great importance indeed.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman well knows that it is not for me to summon Ministers to make statements. I have no authority over that. It is some three or four years since I heard the phrase "planted question", so I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means by that, either. Copies of written answers are always available in the Library, so the right hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members who are interested in the subject—I know that many are — will have an opportunity of seeing the answer to this question.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Planted questions answered by putting the replies in the Library does not give Members of the House of Commons an opportunity to pursue this highly important——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Faulds: It is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I said that I had no knowledge of this planted question theory.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the answer that the Minister will give is a matter of law and might require a change in the immigration rules, would it be in order for him to make a statement, as he must before such changes can be put into operation, so that he can be questioned and these matters can be debated on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The shadow Home Secretary raised a point of order, but are we not just being presumptuous, because many times when we table questions we get a holding answer saying that the Minister will make a statement shortly? How on earth can we now discuss what might be in an answer when we have not yet seen it?

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This procedure is within the rules of the House, but Ministers are aware of special interest. I received letters this morning from two Mr. Patels, which are fairly typical of my mail. They have fiancée problems. The Home Secretary is aware that certain areas and certain hon. Members have a specific interest. Is it not your experience, Mr. Speaker, that when this kind of thing has occurred the Minister concerned has informed individual Members and given them the opportunity of contacting the Minister's private office on the matter?

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I acccept what you said, that this is not a point of order, but may we have your advice on the matter? Giving a written answer to a question, whether planted or not, is giving information to Parliament, and is within the rules. However, this is a most important matter, and for the Government to proceed in this way is wrong. We need to discuss it.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. None of this is a matter for me. I also am a constituency Member of Parliament, and I have an interest in the matter, too. I have not seen the answer to the question. I shall be sending to the Library also. It is not a point of order for me.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have stated that it is not a matter for you, and we understand that. No doubt Ministers will argue that the procedure is in order. However, would I not be right in saying that when a matter is controversial, hon. Members should be able to question Ministers? Does not the procedure that has been adopted illustrate the contempt that Ministers have for the House of Commons?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We do not know whether the matter is controversial. I have not seen the answer.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will appreciate that I have asked several questions on the issue recently. I was contacted by the press this morning and virtually told the answer. Many newspapers are running this as an important issue in their evening editions. I recognise that a planted question is not an issue for you, Mr. Speaker, but if the answer is known, and has been given to the press, is that not a matter for you?

Mr. Speaker: The House well knows my oft-repeated comments on this matter. If the press has information that is embargoed, it should never make use of it before hon. Members have had an opportunity to see the answer.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot take any further points of order on this matter. The House well knows that it is not a matter for me. It will have to be pursued in other ways.

Mr. Kaufman rose——

Mr. Speaker: I shall hear the right hon. Member.

Mr. Kaufman: Thank you, Sir. May I put this to you, in the presence of the Government Chief Whip? Since I raised my point of order, evidence of concern in the House has manifested itself—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—and it is clear that if you had not decided to curtail any further points of order it would have manifested itself further. That being so, may I say, in the presence of the Government Chief Whip, that I hope that the Government will take account of what has been said this afternoon, that they will consider the comments carefully and that they will come back to the House with a response.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is this a different point of order?

Mr. Skinner: It is adjacent to the matter that is being discussed.

On Monday there was a fairly considerable change in the Government's policy — for which they are, of course, not responsible. The Government decided to relax trade with Argentina. The information came in the form of a written question and answer. Some would say that it was a planted question and a planted answer. However, we are not into that, because we have heard enough about it.

I should have thought, Mr. Speaker, that you, as the custodian of our affairs, would want the House of Commons, at all times when this is possible, to be able to debate the issues of the day. On Monday, I and others said, "Is it not a scandal that we have a written question and answer on trade with Argentina being relaxed?" At one time, that was a big affair. Today, my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has raised another issue. I took only a passing interest in that matter. The Home Secretary made a promise to the House —not just to my right hon. Friend, but to Mr. Speaker —that this matter would be dealt with in the House. He was saying that you, Mr. Speaker, would be in charge of the proceedings when the matter was raised.

The last thing that we want is for the Front Bench continually to be heaping insults upon the Chair. I make a suggestion along the lines of your statement last week, after you were faced with a problem. You gave an off-the-cuff response, but came back a few days later—I do not want to have to repeat this story, because it is difficult to remember and difficult to digest—and said, "In future, I shall look at matters in a more studied fashion."

You have heard the complaints about the Government's growing practice of abusing the form of written questions and answers. I suggest that you examine this matter and return with a statement on a future occasion.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is plainly not a question on which I can make a statement. It is nothing at all to do with me. The House well knows that this is a matter for the Government. Whether statements are made, whether answers are given and whether written or oral questions are asked has nothing to do with me.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): On a separate point on the same issue, Mr. Speaker. May I put it to you that you are the guardian of Back Benchers' rights in the Chamber? We respect your task. Some of us have many cases relating to the particular problem of the immigration of fiancées. The problem is that, once the issue is raised in the press as a result of a reply to a written question, a number of our constituents will come to us with different parts of the reply. If we have no opportunity in the Chamber to ask the Minister questions on the different aspects, we have no way of answering our constituents' questions. Is it not part of your duties, Mr. Speaker, in protecting the rights of individual Members who are faced with these problems, to ensure that the information comes to the House in the proper way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has never given the Chair that responsibility. It is not a matter for me.

South Africa (Sanctions)

3.44 pm

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish machinery to impose economic sanctions on trade with South Africa subject to conditions relating to the system of apartheid operated in South Africa.

It is extremely unfortunate that the subject of sanctions against South Africa has to come before the House of Commons in the form of a ten-minute Bill. The people of this country would have expected the Government to have given time for a full debate on what is an extremely important issue.

The Bill has five main elements. The first is to give the Secretary of State, by order, the power to control the import and export of goods to and from South Africa. That is a general provision. Secondly, there is a power to stop the import or export to or from South Africa of oil or products derived from it, coal or products derived from it, uranium and all militarily strategic goods of a description included in groups 1-4 of part II of schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985. Thirdly, there is the element that gives the Chancellor of the Exchequer power to prohibit and regulate transactions between the United Kingdom and South Africa relating to individual residents in or bodies corporate registered in South Africa, directly or indirectly, of gold, currency payments, securities, debts and the import-export transfer and settlement of property. Fourthly, the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall prohibit the import of Krugerrands, dealing in gold and currency, the payment of any capital moneys, directly or indirectly, to any person resident in South Africa or body corporate in South Africa. Fifthly, there is the power to request Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to effect the United Nations Council on Namibia decree No. 1.

The position in South Africa is deteriorating daily. I have heard and seen that on the radio and television today. Over the past nine months there have been over 500 deaths in that country, the vast majority of which have been at the hands of the security forces or the police.

In the past week the South African Government's think-tank report proclaimed that apartheid has failed to solve South Africa's racial problems, and warned that attempts to enforce it would only exacerbate racial tension. That long-awaited report from the Government-funded Human Science Research Council recommended talks with the leaders of all races and the establishment of a democratic system open to all South Africans. The report also noted that nearly 66 per cent. of the black population favoured the use of violence to bring about change. I and many people believe that that shows that the level of repression in South Africa is such that the majority of blacks are prepared to resort to violence to secure basic freedoms.

One of the report's most striking points is the acknowledgement that the security legislation, whilst theoretically designed to ensure the security of the state, has, in practice:

"been largely employed to deal with persons and organisations engaged in extra-Parliamentary opposition to Government racial policies."

The report concludes that the security legislation is

"a threat to the security of the state . . . the mistrust of a legal system is one of the strongest incentives for revolution."

That comment is made in a report on the internal problems of the country funded by the South African Government. The South African authorities clearly break and disregard international law with their illegal occupation of Namibia and by acts of international terrorism — we have heard some prominent people talking about international terrorism — such as their bloody incursions last month into Botswana, when a number of innocent men, women and children were killed, and the attempted sabotage of an American oil installation in Angola.

When South African subjects carry out illegal acts in the United Kingdom—as the Coventry four trials have shown; the results are in this morning's newspapers—the South African Government openly defy the British Government's request for the return of South Africans who were involved in that illegal act, although the bail conditions were underwritten by the South African embassy in London. The bail amounted to some £400,000. The decision not to return those people to stand trial in the United Kingdom was a political decision by the South African Government.

The British Government's response to acts of international terrorism, which resulted in bloody slaughter within a Commonwealth country, is to call in the South African ambassador and to slap his wrists. I asked a question about the number of visits the South African ambassador has had to the Foreign Office and the reply states that there have been seven since August 1984. There is a path between Trafalgar Square and the Foreign Office where from time to time one might bump into the ambassador for South Africa. The Government did not even recall their ambassador from South Africa for consultation, which would at least have shown some visible signs of disapproval. Even the Americans recalled their ambassador. Against this background of growing tension and conflict the international community are taking steps in one form or another to bring pressure to bear on the South African authorities to introduce fundamental reforms to give the majority of people in South Africa their basic democratic rights and freedom.

In the United States over 20 Bills have been submitted through Congress with Republican and Democratic support and in the next few weeks the President of the United States of America will have to make a decision either to continue with his policy of constructive engagement or to support the majority decisions of the Congress. In Canada, only this past weekend, a package of economic sanctions against South Africa has been announced as part of the international action aimed at getting Pretoria to abandon apartheid.

The Nordic states have acted jointly to halt flights to South Africa. The Swedish Government, in June, recommended severely curtailing contacts with South Africa. A seven-page Foreign Ministry report urged that cultural, scientific and sports contact with Pretoria be avoided so as to express Sweden's disapproval of apartheid. France has announced measures against South Africa. The European Parliament in April, agreed a resoulution which outlined actions that should be taken against South Africa and called on the Council of Ministers to act forthwith.

Only yesterday in London the Commonwealth Committee on South Africa fully supported the Security Council resolution No. 566. These are only an illustration of what is happening on the international front. All these countries and organisations are rejecting the theory of constructive engagement. The only country that is openly advocating the status quo is our own, leaving us in total isolation and apart from the rest of the international community, which can be clearly seen as siding with the apartheid regime. The United Kingdom has a very important role to play in bringing about change in South Africa. Since 1979, when the Labour Government left office, we have invested something over £300 million each year. That is an increase since 1979 of 600 per cent.

On the question of trade, the Government have openly encouraged trade with South Africa, spending over £600,000 of taxpayers' money in promoting 85 trade missions since 1979. We are the biggest international prop to the system of apartheid. The arguments we have heard from the Foreign Office against the limited boycott of South Africa are twofold. First, it is said the blacks in South Africa are divided about sanctions. It is a bit difficult to take a Mori or NOP poll in South Africa on this question, particularly when the answers one may give could land one in jail and up until recently carried a minimum sentence of five years' imprisonment. The South African Council of Churches stated in a six-point recommendation that disinvestment was, and I quote

"one of the few remaining methods to achieve justice without violence".

The second argument put forward by the Government is that sanctions do not work, but when pressed to apply limited sanctions, such as no new investment, they argue, because one has conceded the principle of sanctions, further actions and measures would be required if the limited sanctions do not work.

We have the sports boycott through the Gleneagles agreement. We have the arms embargo through the United Nations. I challenge the Government, in the face of mounting international pressure to say that this will not work. I repeat the words of Bishop Tutu when he appealed to the people of the United Kingdom at St. Pauls' last November to "ensure that your country exerts political, diplomatic, but above all economic pressure on the South African Government to persuade it to go to the Conference Table of a National Convention with the authentic leaders of all sections of our community, and for us blacks it would mean our real leaders, now in jail or in exile."

I ask the House to reject the argument from the hard line Members on the Conservative Benches. We want to rid South Africa of 20th century slavery, which is what segregation and apartheid means, and to stop the United Kingdom from becoming isolated in the international community. I ask the leave of the House to bring in this Bill.

3.54 pm

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Mr. Speaker——

Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has a right to be heard.

Mr. Carlisle: My right hon. and hon. Friends and I sat and listened to the epistle read out by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) with a certain amount of interest, but a certain amount of sadness.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it relate to this matter?

Mr. Boyes: Yes it does. Will the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) tell the House whether he has any interest in South Africa?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman has a financial interest, no doubt it will be in the Register of Member's Interests. [Interruption.] Order. The hon. Gentleman has hardly begun.

Mr. Carlisle: The predictability of the Opposition in their usual question to me is answered in the Register of Members' Interests, as you say, Mr. Speaker. I have nothing further to add. I was tempted to ignore the squalid introduction given to the Bill by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central. Perhaps if it had not been for his emotive language, the ignorance that he displayed and——

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said that no doubt the hon. Member would declare his financial interest. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the Register of Members' Interests, but how can we know what is in that register at this stage, and how can the public know? As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman has conceded the fact that he has had a number of free trips to South Africa. He has a duty and an obligation to make it clear that he has been to South Africa at the expense of the South African authorities.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is a matter of honour for hon. Members to declare any interest in the Register of Members' Interests. If the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) has any other interests, I am sure that he will declare them.

Mr. Carlisle: The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has put that point many times and obviously does not remember much of what he says in the House, which is of benefit to us. He should know, as I have declared to the House, that I have no financial interest in South Africa.

The House has been asked to hear the usual parade of conscience by a member of the anti-apartheid movement, supported by Labour Members. It is a conscience that they see fit not to parade when they talk about human rights in other countries.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): That is not true.

Mr. Carlisle: I will concede, as I have always done, that I find apartheid a violation of human rights, and I abhor the system. I have always said so publicly and I repeat that assertion today. However, the House has to ask itself whether the introduction of the Bill will be of any benefit to those whom it is intended to benefit—that is, blacks in South Africa—and what effect those sanctions would have upon the blacks in South Africa and the many other people in South Africa who should also be remembered.

What the Opposition and those who advocate sanctions do not understand is that they will create an enormous loss of jobs in South Africa. A 20 per cent. disinvestment by the west would see a loss of 90,000 jobs for the whites within the South African economy and the loss of 350,000 jobs for the blacks. I should not wish to advocate that for a policy.

The second effect of sanctions on South Africa is the fact that many foreign workers, of whom there are about 1 million in South Africa, would have to leave the country and that is understandable, given the unemployment position. The third effect is perhaps one of the most telling and sad facts about this Bill. It would halt those reforms that have recently taken place in South Africa.

[Mr. Carlisle]

As usual, Labour Members have jeered ironically, and I would admit that those reforms are inadequate in terms of western ideals. We must recognise that reform there has been, and the advancement of the black in South Africa has been considerable in South African terms over the past five to 10 years. This measure would halt those reforms in their tracks, and I remind hon. Members that the changes that took place in the United States and advanced the blacks in America occurred in conditions of economic prosperity and not in the conditions that Labour Members want to see, of economic depression.

The last effect that this Bill and disinvestment would have upon South Africa is that they would undoubtedly increase violence in that society. I suspect, and I say no more, that there are many Opposition Members who would wish to see that violence increase against the elected South African Government, whether that Government be elected by the whites alone or by the whites, and the coloured and Indian populations. The case is severely undermined by the violence in that country perpetrated by the ANC and others who would, of course, welcome disinvestment.

If we are to have some sort of influence—and here I have a genuine sympathy and understanding with the Opposition — upon the South African Government, surely we would be better able to exercise it on the basis of some form of involvement with British companies investing in that country, rather than trying to disinvest and cutting ourselves off from them. The record of British companies in South Africa is extremely good and the wages of 98 per cent. of the black workers is above the EEC code laid down in Europe. We must ask ourselves whether this measure and the measures proposed by the United States Congress will benefit the blacks. I suggest they will have the opposite effect.

Evidence put forward by various commentators against disinvestment is very considerable. The opinions of the hon. Member and his hon. Friends are in a minority, certainly in South Africa as well as in the rest of the world. Prominent people like Alan Paton, who is no supporter of the South African Government, has said there should never be disinvestment. Even Bishop Tutu, who was mentioned by the hon. Member, caused some consternation when he questioned whether disinvestment would have any effect. I leave the house with the words of Chief Buthelezi who leads some one million blacks of the Inkatha tribe in South Africa, whose word I would trust rather more than the ignorant words of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central. Chief Buthelezi says:

"If the West wants to increase black bargaining power it must double up on its investments, not disinvest."

For that reason and certainly for the good of the black people in South Africa, I ask the House to reject the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Richard Caborn, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mr. Andrew Faulds, Mr. Robert Hughes, Mr. Peter Pike, Mr. Allan Rogers, Mr. Ernie Ross, and Mr. David Winnick.

South Africa (Sanctions)

Mr. Richard Caborn accordingly presented a Bill to establish machinery to improve economic sanctions on trade with South Africa subject to conditions relating to the system of apartheid operated in South Africa: And the same was read the First time: and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 25 October 1985 and to be printed. [Bill 190.]

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

Not amended (in the Committee) and as amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New clause 9

MITIGATION OF CORPORATION TAX LIABILITY OF INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES AND HOUSING ASSOCIATIONS

'(1) Where in any accounting period of a body to which this section applies the rate of corporation tax exceeds such special rate as Parliament may fix for the purposes of this section the body may claim that the corporation tax charged on the income of that body for that period shall be calculated as if the rate of corporation tax were equal to that special rate.

(2) The bodies to which this section applies are:

(a) any registered industrial and provident society as defined in section 340 of the Taxes Act and any such co-operative association as is mentioned in subsection(8) of that section;

(b) any housing association for the time being approved for the purposes of section 341 of that Act;

not being a society, association or company under the control (within the meaning of section 302 of that Act) of one or more companies which are not themselves bodies to which this section applies.

(3) For the purposes of this section the income of a company for an accounting period is its income charged to corporation tax for that period as defined in section 85(6) of the Finance Act 1972.

(4) The special rate for the purposes of this section shall have effect for the financial year 1985 and subsequent years and be 30 per cent.'.—[Mr. Hattersley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.7 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The purpose of the new clause is to provide what is wrongly, though properly, called a special rate of corporation tax, a rate of 30 per cent. which this new clause would apply to registered industrial and provident societies and to housing associations. The incidence of this tax would be importantly felt and is desperately needed by housing associations and co-operative societies.

I said that I regarded the term "special rate" as something of a misnomer, because the idea of a special rate implies, and certainly in uninformed circles is taken to mean, that something to the advantage of the group in question is being proposed. This clause deals with the rate of corporation tax paid by industrial and provident societies and housing associations. It is not demanding, and I am not asking for them to be specially advantaged. I am asking that that group of institutions should be removed from their present situation, in which they are disadvantaged compared with their commercial competitors.

Some of my hon. and right hon. Friends may argue — I would argue on another occasion — that the advantages of these non-profit making institutions are such that they should be given a positive advantage from corporation tax. But that is not what we are arguing for today. We are asking for their treatment to be comparable with and no worse than that which is given to commercial companies. The new clause merely seeks to relieve the societies and the associations of the discriminatory tax penalties which they presently suffer as a result of last year's Finance Bill.

When we sought to amend last year's Finance Bill to avoid these unfair penalties, I assumed that the Government in reforming corporation tax — as they chose to describe their proposals—had simply forgotten the effect which their proposals would have on friendly societies, provident and industrial societies, co-operatives and housing associations. I assumed that they had not realised the necessity of making special arrangements for these institutions to ensure that they would not be disadvantaged. It is impossible for me to be so charitable this year. The Government must know of the damage that their tax policy is now doing to these institutions, yet they have chosen to do nothing to rectify the injustice of last year's Bill.

Last year, when I moved the amendment which would have avoided the injustice coming about, the Financial Secretary sought to rebut the Opposition's arguments simply by saying that all tax innovations ought to be welcomed and that only fiscal conservatives would oppose a change of this kind. I understand why anyone who is responsible in any degree for Government economic policy welcomes changes of any description, but I cannot support a change—I did not support it, and I now want to remedy that change—that puts an important section of the economy at a disadvantage.

Now that Treasury Ministers have had a year to ponder the injustice, I look forward to hearing whether it will be argued that no such injustice exists or whether it will be said that the injustice exists but that it is just the bad luck of the institutions involved. My suspicion is that the failure to remove it is at least in part the result of the Government's prejudice against some of these institutions, co-operative societies especially.

The problem faced by the co-operative societies is easy to describe. When, in 1965, corporation tax was introduced, the rate of 40 per cent. was applicable to all companies — large and small companies and industrial and provident societies. In the early 1970s, the assessment of corporation tax was changed to what is called the imputation system. That system gave relief to businesses in respect of advance corporation tax on distributions. But since industrial and provident societies by their nature could not make such distributions, they were not originally required to pay the tax at the full rate. So when the imputation system was first introduced there were two special categories of enterprises which faced special problems for which the Government made special and necessary allowances. They were co-operatives and the like and companies or institutions which could not, sometimes by rule and often by practice, make the normal level of dividend distribution. Special arrangements were also made for small concerns which distributed a smaller proportion of their profits than the new rate of corporation tax hypothesised — 52 per cent. based on average distribution, which was anticipated to give a 40 per cent. yield.

At that time, the Government accepted that in smaller firms and institutions where the proportion of profit distributed was smaller than in normal commercial undertakings, a special accommodation had to be made. To accommodate the small companies, the small company rate was introduced. Initially, it was 42 per cent. Then it was 40 per cent. Then it was 30 per cent. That was designed as a special encouragement to small firms.

[Mr. Roy Hattersley]

The Government of the day acknowledged that a parallel position existed in and for the institutions listed in the new clause. They acknowledged that co-operative societies by their nature distributed a smaller and a fixed percentage of their profits. Therefore, a special rate was fixed for them.

The differential between normal commercial companies and friendly, industrial, provident and co-operative societies was not meant to favour the latter group. It was not meant to ensure that those institutions paid less than others in tax. It was meant to give them equality of treatment.

The point was described exactly by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) in Committee on last year's Finance Bill. I did not warn the hon. Gentleman of my intention to quote his words because I felt certain that he would be here to take part in the debate. I am gratified to see that my judgment on that issue about him is correct, and I repeat that I cannot imagine a better way of describing the position than that which he used a year ago. He said:

"if one accepts the principle of the differential between imputation where one can and cannot distribute, there should be a lower rate for building societies, and presumably co-operative societies, so that we still maintain the justice effected in 1972." —[Official Report, 1 May 1984; Vol. 59, c. 286.]

4.15 pm

The new clause seeks to restore the justice that the Government in 1972 believed to be proper. Yet last year the justice effected in 1972, in the hon. Gentleman's terms, was removed. Co-operatives are now taxed at full corporation rate, whilst private and commerical companies are allowed to deduct their shareholders' liabilities on the distributions which are made.

When the special rate for co-operatives was withdrawn last year, I am told that the Co-operative Union, speaking on behalf of co-operative societies in general, met the Inland Revenue. The Co-operative Union assures me that the Revenue itself, acting as the Revenue always does in a role almost independent of that of the Treasury and its Ministers, agreed that to introduce the scheme proposed in last year's Finance Bill and to abandon the special rate for co-operatives would be to militate against the interests of co-operatives in a way which placed them at a severe fiscal disadvantage to their commercial competitors.

The talk about fiscal neutrality does not appear to apply to co-operative societies, to industrial and provident societies, to friendly societies and to housing associations.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): My right hon. Friend is on to a very important point in arguing for, in effect, simple equity. He is making a compelling case, and I welcome that as chairman of the Co-operative parliamentary group in the House. Will he emphasise that a fundamental difference is that a co-operative shareholding is quite distinct from that in a company and that co-operative members do not benefit from rights issues? Again I am extremely grateful to my right hon. Friend for the very strong and unanswerable case that he is advancing.

Mr. Hattersley: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend as well, because he is right when he says that, by their constitutions, co-operative societies have members—in some cases they are nominally described as shareholders — who do not enjoy the normal privileges and advantages of shareholders. There are no rights issues and no scrip issues, and the proportions of the profits that they receive are always limited by convention, often limited by rule and sometimes limited by law. It is because of the limitation on distribution that, were there not to be a special rate for co-operatives, the co-operatives would be enormously disadvantaged.

By their nature, co-operative societies minimise profits to their shareholders because they exist to maximise benefits to the consumers. Very much the same rule applies with the co-operative wholesale societies in England and Scotland which, although having a new and different constitutional form, nevertheless do not distribute profits in the way which is common in commercial undertakings, and they could not be allowed to do so. It is for the reasons that my right hon. Friend explained that, were they to be treated as if they were normal commercial companies operating under normal commercial rules, they would continue to be disadvantaged in the way that I have described.

When the Financial Secretary wound up last year's debate, he made two points in rebuttal, having criticised the Opposition for not accepting any change, no matter how unjust. First, he said that the problem that we described did not arise, and he added that in any case it arose only in a very few cases. He said that fewer than 30 industrial and provident societies and what he described as rather more than 50 building societies would be adversely affected.

At the end of the debate, I was glad that the hon. Gentleman at least conceded that some of these societies, worthy in themselves and an important part of the economy—the co-operative movement represents 6 per cent. of the total retail trade—were adversely affected by the new rule. But I made it clear on behalf of the Opposition that we regarded this as a gross injustice which ought to be removed if only one society was affected.

However, more and more co-operative societies seem certain to be affected because of the reorganisation now going on within the co-operative societies. They are amalgamating. They are becoming larger. As they become larger, they become more profitable. As they have become simultaneously larger and more profitable, an increasing number are being required to pay a rate of tax which is unjust compared with that of commercial competitors.

I shall conclude—no doubt the Chief Secretary will soon conclude the speech that he will give rather than the one that he is preparing—with three examples of the new iniquitous system, which the Finance Act 1984 brought about. They relate to successful co-operative societies.

The Sheffield society, which was called the Brightside and Carbrook when I was a subscriber, would have paid £510,000 under the scheme that existed before the Finance Act 1984. Under the new scheme it pays £675,000 on exactly the same turnover, and if the new clause is accepted, the tax liability at 30 per cent. will produce a yield to the Treasury of £306,000, which will more or less return it to its position before the discriminatory clause was introduced.

Under the old scheme the Plymouth co-operative society would have paid £20,000. Under the new scheme it pays £708,000, and if my 30 per cent. proposal is accepted the society will be required to pay £531,000, which is little more than was levied from it under the old scheme, but much more in line with what was regarded as just before the Finance Act 1984.

Under the old scheme the Peterborough society would have paid £705,000, under the new scheme it pays £800,000, and under my scheme it would receive a benefit which would return it more or less to its position before the Finance Act 1984.

We are asking for a return to the position that exised before the Finance Act 1984, which acknowledged that because of the co-operative societies' patterns of profit and dividend distribution, to levy corporation tax on them in the same way as on commercial undertakings would put them at a fiscal disadvantage. Surely that is wrong. I hope that the Financial Secretary will agree to change it.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I support the new clause because I welcome the opportunity to support mutual organisations. Yesterday we discussed an amendment which sought to help friendly societies. We all know, especially those of us who come from and represent northern constituencies, of the important social and economic role that mutual organisations, such as friendly societies and co-operative ownership enterprises, have played in the north and, indeed, throughout the country. We should support those organisations because their owners and participants, whether consumers or producers, workers or customers, are motivated by a prime interest in the organisation. They participate in and organise the societies not for private gain, but for the benefit of the co-operative and the community that it serves.

The new clause would help co-operative societies, especially co-operative ownership in housing, which is a relatively recent development. It has become a significant part of the housing sector—some would say not nearly as significant as it should be—only during the past two decades as a result of the pioneering work of a small group of enthusiastic supporters including Mr. Harold Campbell, who played a major role both through the Co-operative Housing Agency and by promoting the idea of co-operative housing in Government circles and throughout the country.

As the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said, the new clause seeks to extend the lower rate of corporation tax to a variety of institutions defined in the Taxes Act. As I understand it, that includes credit unions, industrial co-operatives, housing associations and self-build societies. In my constituency, self-build societies, co-operative housing bodies and housing associations are making a most worthwhile contribution to the community's housing needs, especially in the south Middlesbrough area.

One of the best features of that development, which my colleagues and I should like to see extended to other areas, is the mixture and proximity of different types of housing ownership. Rented accommodation, self-build accommodation, part-rent and part-owned accommodation, co-operative owned accommodation and privately owned accommodation are together in the same development. That provides both a good social mix and, more importantly, a chance for consumers to have a wide range of opportunities to buy or rent houses, and to participate in housing schemes, as their inclination and pockets will allow. That sort of development, which the new clause would encourage, should be supported by the House.

The trouble is that, even if the Government accept the new clause, it will do little to reverse the dreadful decline in support for this type of housing venture and institution that has occurred since they came to office. There has been a 21 per cent. real fall in gross loans and grants to housing associations since 1982-83. That means that in the north-east the Housing Corporation cannot meet the bill for more than £4 million worth of major repairs to housing association properties, of which some £2·27 million relates to properties for which local authorities are prepared to provide funds, but to which the corporation cannot respond. For a Government who say that home ownership is one of their most important aims in housing policy—they said that in the housing expenditure White Paper—they have been especially tardy in helping the low-cost home ownership programmes, which have become a growing proportion of housing association activity.

4.30 pm

We all know from our experience in our constituency surgeries, possibly from our own personal experience, and from those with whom we have contact, that low-cost home ownership and the role that the housing associations can play in it is vital.

In the north-east, the housing associations were allocated only £16 million, compared to bids of up to £45 million. Therefore, there is a substantial gap between what the associations could do to help the housing needs of the north-east, where the gap is considerable, and what they are enabled to do. We have rehearsed, during general economic debates in this House, the arguments for investment of that sort. It is just the type of investment on which the Government should be embarking at present. There is a real need, in areas such as the north-east, for this type of housing accommodation. There is also a real need for the spin-off in jobs and growth which would arise if the Government were to respond to the bids of £45 million made in the north-east by the housing associations.

In view of the Labour party's new enthusiasm for home ownership, it is interesting to note that in the 1985-86 programme there are only 300 houses under this heading for the whole of Cleveland county, where the smallest number of bids in the north-east region were made. Those are in Middlesbrough, which I have already mentioned. Perhaps some of the local authorities and their representatives on the boards of housing associations should investigate that apparent lack of interest, because many of us believe that the developments in co-operative housing and housing associations in the past 20 to 30 years have led to a third force in housing that is of enormous benefit to the community.

We hear a great deal from the Conservative Benches about the shortage of rented accommodation, but the references are usually to private rented accommodation. In recent time, to the benefit of many communities, there has been an enormous growth in the number of rented units of accommodation available through housing associations as an alternative to council housing. That is a very desirable development. I hope that the Government will support it.

The Conservative Government's limitations on capital finance have already held back the development of housing co-operatives. While the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and some of his hon. Friends may be enthusiastic about the development of housing co-operatives, which were supported in the past by the late

[Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth]

Tony Crosland and others who established the Co-operative Housing Agency, only 8,000 units of housing have been provided since the Government started to take action in that area many years ago. Those 8,000 units have been provided by about 200 registered co-operatives. One of the reasons for the small number of units is that Labour councils throughout the country have been adamantly opposed to the development of housing co-operatives and housing associations because of the blind ideological commitment of those Labour councils to council housing as the answer—and the only answer—to the housing problems in their areas.

There is no better example than Liverpool. Under the Liberal council, 2,000 homes were provided in over 30 registered co-operatives—a high proportion of the total in the country as a whole. Therefore, it is not surprising that the registered co-operatives in Liverpool have been given a tribute——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying rather wide of the new clause.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I am marshalling the case in support of the new clause, which seeks to aid mutual bodies, such as the housing co-operatives to which I am addressing my remarks. In demonstrating why the new clause should be supported, I think it is appropriate that I should point out the developments that have taken place in housing co-operatives in past years. I have also tried to show why such developments have not taken place more rapidly than some of us would have liked to see.

I was pointing out that one of the reasons for the slow rate of development is the antagonism towards those mutual bodies, which provide housing and other forms of enterprise, by councils such as Liverpool, because of their commitment only to local authority housing. It seems to me that that is a perfectly valid point to make, because the new clause is concerned with encouraging the development of mutual housing associations and mutual bodies which can provide facilities of that sort.

I hope that the House will support the new clause, because the distinctive type of housing that is involved could make a major contribution to the country's housing and social needs. One of the best ways to encourage that sort of development is through the taxation system, and it is wrong that the mutual bodies should not be on all fours with companies in that respect. They should be given the fairly modest encouragement that the new clause envisages. As I said earlier, the new clause would do very little to make up for the deficiences in respect of which the Government have been guilty since they came to office.

I am very pleased that the Government, after some dithering on coming to office, kept the Co-operative Development Agency in existence. The agency is doing a first-rate job but it could be doing a much bigger and better job if more resources were made available to it. In the 1960s and early 1970s, I was, together with other colleagues, responsible for putting together the proposals that led to the establishment of the agency. We also saw it not only as a promotional body but as a body that would provide substantial funding for co-operatives of all sorts. I appeal to the Minister, in considering the new clause, to have regard to the good work of the Co-operative Development Agency and to the extra work that it could do if given more resources.

The case made by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook in favour of helping mutual bodies also applies to resources for the Co-operative Development Agency. That body, which at national level can do a certain amount, could do a great deal more if it had the co-operation, support and resources of the local co-operative development agencies that local authorities have established in some areas to promote mutual bodies and co-operatives of one sort and another. We want to see the co-operative sector and the mutually owned sector develop as a significant force in the British economy. We want to see bodies with a diverse ownership. That is why in consideration of the Bill last night we proposed amendments to seek to make share ownership in institutions established under the Companies Act much broader, to try to introduce incentives to spread ownership.

We should like to see the co-operative sector as a dynamic and much more substantial third sector of co-operative employee-owned enterprises than is currently the case. We believe that this requires a new framework, including the development of strong co-operative support organisations along the lines of the Spanish Laboral Popular, which has helped to foster the Mondragon group of co-operatives, with which I know many hon. Members on both sides of the House are familiar. That has been an enormous success. There are other reasons, in addition to the support which is being given by that body. The provision of up to 75 per cent. of the finance for new co-operatives is an enormous help to the establishment of such mutual organisations, and we have nothing comparable in this country.

In addition to the modest incentives provided in the new clause, we also want to see a new form of incorporation.

Mr. Hattersley: I would not interrupt the hon. Gentleman's exposition on co-operatives in general and on Social Democratic party policy in particular were he not doing damage to the case which some of us want to make. What we are arguing for in the new clause is not a special incentive. The strength of the case which I have tried to make out, and the strength of the case which the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) made a year ago, is not that this proposal provides anyone with some special incentive that gives an advantage, but that, unless the new clause is accepted, people will suffer from a disadvantage. If the hon. Gentleman insists on talking as if he wants to give people some special advantage, he totally undermines the case which he is making for the co-operative movement.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I do not accept that. I take the right hon. Gentleman's point that it is a powerful argument, when a Conservative Government are in office, to suggest that mutually owned organisations should be on all fours with institutions registered under the Companies Acts, but I should like to think that he and his right hon. and hon. Friends will also accept from me and my right hon. and hon. Friends that the concept of mutual ownership and co-operative ownership is so desirable that it should be encouraged by other incentives, in addition to the modest incentive of putting it on all fours with company-registered institutions, as the new clause proposes.

I was seeking simply to demonstrate our commitment to the co-operative sector. As you will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for many years many of us have had, and continue to have, long associations with that movement, and we believe that a great deal more should be done beyond putting these institutions on all fours, as the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is proposing.

I will not go into the details of the proposal which we have made for encouraging the co-operative sector. That will no doubt be appropriate on another occasion. New clause 9 is a limited but helpful step in the direction of giving co-operatives and other voluntary developments support on equal terms with conventionally owned companies. I hope that the Government will respond to the pressure that has come from various parts of the co-operative movement, and that they will seek to make up for some of the damage that their other policies have done by accepting what is, after all, a modest and fair proposal.

4.45 pm

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) and of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) regarding not only co-operatives but housing associations. I think that the comments were well taken.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook may not be aware that my constituency was and, indeed, still is the home of many well-known co-operative associations, particularly in the footwear industry. At the end of the 19th century, far-sighted employers set up many institutions as workers co-operatives or entities in which the principle of sharing the profits and involving the work force in the management of a company was enshrined. I think that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was quite correct. He may be interested to know that my council—which, incidentally, has a Conservative majority—has recently decided to provide finance for our local co-operative development association. One of the best managed co-operatives in my constituency is in Brixworth, which I have visited and which I intend to visit again soon.

Housing associations are very important to my part of the world with its high proportion of elderly citizens who depend a great deal upon the work of institutions such as the Abbeyfield, which in turn depend upon local housing associations for support. Therefore, I agree with the sentiments.

However, I have experienced great difficulty in accepting some of the arguments put forward in the debate. I should like to address some of the arguments, in particular those advanced by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. The essence of his argument is that the imputation system, the rate of advance corporation tax, which has been in operation for a decade now, in a sense benefited companies which had a distribution policy and were able to distribute some of their profits by convention or practice. For those entities which by convention or in terms of their own internal statutes or requirements did not distribute profits, his argument was that if one took the old corporation tax rate of 52 per cent., one had to deduct the standard rate of tax, the advance corporation tax, which the company was deducting from the dividend flow and paying to the Inland Revenue, with the shareholder receiving only the net payment and, therefore, 52 per cent., where, in a simplistic world, all the profits were paid out. I make that assumption to simplify the argument, although we know that it is not the case.

At one extreme, if a company paid out all its profits, with a 30 per cent. standard rate of tax and the old 52 per cent. corporaton tax rate, that would bring down the figure to a 22 per cent. rate of tax—mainstream corporation tax, as it is called — which would compare very unfavourably with a lower company rate and, indeed, with the rate at which larger companies would be paying corporation tax. I think that that was the argument that the right hon. Member was advancing.

I have problems with that argument, and I should like to advance three in particular. I will not pursue the obvious argument that companies do not distribute all their profits, but in the argument one would have to make some assumptions about the average rate of dividend distribution in the economy before one could compare those companies which distributed profits with those which did not. I did not pick up the exact calculation which the hon. Gentleman was making on that point, but I know that he shared the point with me.

My three points are as follows. First, it depends on which industry and company one picks before a generalisation can be made about dividend rates. There is no way in which one can make a general argument, as the right hon. Gentleman tried to do, about companies in relation to dividend rates. They vary from industry to industry, from type of company to type of company and from year to year, whether we are in recession or in boom. It may be legitimate to use that argument in a debate, but if the right hon. Gentleman tried to reduce the argument to an amendment or to a new clause to be included in the Finance Bill I think that he would be in serious difficulties because one cannot generalise about the dividend rate. It is a fair debating point, but, in practice and reality, one which cannot be sustained in considering legislation.

I suspect that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook understands that point. He advanced the argument that a company is interested only in the net cost of its dividends. It assumes that the advance corporation tax that it deducts from dividends and pays to the Inland Revenue is a payment on behalf of shareholders as part of their total tax liability. That is the nature of our tax legislation and I cannot quarrel with it, but the reality is that companies look at their total corporation tax rate, not just at their mainstream rate. That is the rate which is shown in their accounts and which is used by financial analysts and the stock market when it compares the performance of different companies. Companies therefore look at their total corporation tax rate. When the right hon. Gentleman says that he is comparing the 30 per cent. rate for workers' co-operatives, housing associations and friendly societies with a higher rate nominally, but with a lower rate in reality, because of the payment in advance on account of shareholders' liability to tax, that, in the real world, is not the way in which companies look at it. They look at their total corporation tax liability.

Another argument relating to the main philosophical thrust of the right hon. Gentleman's case is that dividends are assessable at the higher rates of tax, not just at the standard rate. He knows that the advance corporation tax that is paid by companies on dividends paid out is added back. The net dividend is grossed up at the standard rate of 30 per cent., the advance corporation tax rate, but the shareholder is liable to higher rates of tax. It is not true to say in a simplistic way that the imputation system to which he referred earlier is simply about the standard rate of tax.

[Mr. Roger Freeman]

It is not. It is about the part deduction by a company of a shareholder's ultimate liability to tax, but one has to look at the total liability of the shareholder.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) made an interesting point about rights issues but it seemed to me to be a bogus point. He appeared to argue that the entities that the right hon. Gentleman's new clause encompasses—housing associations, workers' co-operatives and friendly societies—do not have rights issues, whereas companies have rights issues, and that there is injustice, in the sense that corporate shareholders benefit from rights issues whereas this benefit is not available to the owners of the entities that are referred to in the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook's new clause.

Many hon. Members will be aware that if one takes up one's rights in a rights issue all that happens is that the total equity of the company may have grown by the subscription of new cash to the company but that there is no change in the financial status of the individual shareholder who takes up his rights. Therefore, I cannot follow the argument of the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe. If a shareholder does not take up his rights but sells them, he is subject to tax, but he gives up part of his equity ownership in the company. He gains cash through the sale of his rights but he forgoes an equal amount in terms of the value of his remaining ownership in the company, assuming that he remains a shareholder. I do not therefore follow the right hon. Gentleman's argument. The fiscal relevance of rights issues is not relevant to the new clause or to the argument upon it.

As for the main part of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook's argument, he acknowledged that the small company rate of tax is 30 per cent. That rate is referred to in new clause 9. I imagine that the right hon. Gentleman chose that rate not only because it is the income tax rate but because it is relevant to the rate that is paid by small companies. However, the right hon. Gentleman correctly pointed out that he is addressing his argument not to the smaller entities that would pay 30 per cent. but to the larger entities where the rate of corporation tax will be 35 per cent. in the fiscal year 1986. He argued that for the larger entities paying 35 per cent. one must deduct a proportion of the advance corporation tax on dividends paid out to shareholders. That brings the effective rate which should be borne by the company below 30 per cent.

I do not accept that argument. One should stick to the 35 per cent. rate of corporation tax for the larger entities caught by that rate for two reasons. The first is fiscal simplicity. Many farmers in my constituency choose to be taxed at income tax rates rather than at corporation tax rates. They do not incorporate themselves. That may or may not be wise. I submit that it is for the convenience of the business world that there is a 35 per cent. standard rate of corporation tax that will apply from fiscal year 1986 and a lower rate of 30 per cent. That is widely understood, so I am not in favour, unless there are compelling arguments, of variations.

The second and more important point relates to a matter to which the right hon. Gentleman did not refer, namely, the major capital allowance changes that were announced in the 1984 Budget and incorporated in the Finance Act 1984. He knows that many large companies, although on a nominal rate of 52 per cent., were paying actual rates of corporation tax that were considerably less than that. As a general rule of thumb in the banking world one assumed, in the analysis of an industry, that the actual rate of corporation tax was between 25 per cent. and 30 per cent. for industry as a whole. What has happened as a result of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's 1984 Budget and the Finance Act 1984 is the reverse of the right hon. Gentleman's argument. The rates of corporation tax for companies have risen in many instances because capital allowances have been withdrawn. The position of entities like co-operatives and housing associations which did not have the benefit of capital allowances has remained unaltered. The effective rates of corporation tax for service companies have fallen, but for manufacturing industries and for some exploration companies they have risen. The actual rate is very close to the nominal rate. From fiscal year 1986 onwards it will be 35 per cent. Therefore, the injustice to which the right hon. Gentleman referred does not exist.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Is that not an argument for not abolishing capital allowances? Is that not the core of the argument to which the hon. Gentleman should address himself?

Mr. Freeman: As the hon. Gentleman knows, that is an entirely separate issue which has been debated on its merits: whether there should be specific fiscal incentives for capital investment. I am very much in favour of encouraging correct capital investment, but it must be capital investment in either the public or the private sector that will make an adequate return on outlay. The right way to do that is not by the continuation of our very generous capital allowance system but by proper management systems for the review of capital investment projects and other projects to which I have referred in previous debates on the Budget and the Finance Bill and to which I intend to return later.

5 pm

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook made a speech at the meeting of the Crosland Society at Trinity college on 7 June 1985. I draw the House's attention to the speech because it explains what sort of entities would benefit from the new clause, and what the right hon. Gentleman has in mind as examples of co-operatives. Towards the end of the speech, the right hon. Gentleman said:

> "We have to realise that if we are commited to a more equal distribution of power as well as of wealth, the old Morrisonian model of centrally controlled public utility does not meet our needs."

The right hon. Gentleman made it clear that old-style nationalisation is no longer relevant to the future of the Labour party or our economy. Some enlightenment from the right hon. Gentleman would be helpful because it is confusing that later in the same speech he spoke about institutions that have been privatised by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the time

"when a privatised utility is returned to public ownership"

and spelt out the type of control there would be if Labour renationalises British Telecom, British Aerospace — although that is not a public utility—and British Gas which Conservative Members hope that the Government will succeed in privatisating next Session. What does the right hon. Gentleman mean when he refers to the renationalisation of utilities such as British Telecom and British Gas? What type of control will there be? Will they be genuine workers' co-operatives? The right hon. Gentleman ruled out the Morrisonian nationalised industries. Does the right hon. Gentleman imagine that if British Telecom is returned to public ownership it will be a gigantic workers' co-operative? That is the only conclusion one can draw from his speech.

I can understand the thinking behind the new clause, if the right hon. Gentleman is serious about his intention regarding the 30 per cent. rate of corporation tax for those entities. Perhaps the real reason is to benefit the utilities that the Labour party would renationalise as workers' co-operatives if, heaven forbid, it is returned to power, because they would be subject to this rate of corporation tax. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will enlighten the House.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I wish only to add a few words of support for the new clause which aims to overcome the tax penalties that emanated from the Finance Bill last year. All sorts of organisations are affected, including industrial societies and other mutual organisations such as the friendly societies and the various types of co-operatives. We have heard from both sides of the House examples of the effect of the removal of the differential rate of corporation tax on those organisations.

We had a long debate on friendly societies yesterday. Already, we have seen that the Government's action is crushing these organisations. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) quoted Mr. Madders, the chairman of the friendly societies liaison committee, who said that the Government's action could result in friendly societies becoming extinct. That would be sad because the societies have a long-established tradition and have been in existence for about 100 years. They have served the people of Britain, especially those on lower incomes and in rural areas. The new clause would help the mutual organisations to come to grips with the severe competition with which they must contend.

The Government's line on friendly societies is that if they want to remain alive they must compete in broader areas of business where they would encounter more forms of taxation. They would have to employ staff to overcome the intricacies of tax problems. They do not have the necessary expertise or manpower. They rely on the voluntary help of people who do not have the skill or the time to deal with the complicated taxation matters which the organisations inevitably must deal with if they are to survive in the competitive areas into which Ministers suggest that they should move.

The Government's removal of the differential rate of corporation tax is an additional crushing action on the friendly societies. We argue our case not only from the economic point of view, but from the social aspect. That aspect is most prominent in my mind when considering the corporation tax treatment of friendly societies.

The local postman often plays the role of the deposit collector in rural areas, especially in the north of England. The postman does his rounds and collects deposits. He makes sure that Mrs. Smith is alive and well by checking the milk bottles on her doorstep. We must consider the friendly societies in that context. Social services have been cut; that is a broader issue and I do not wish to go wide of the point, but the social angle must be taken into account when considering the effect of last year's Finance Bill on mutual organisations.

Some hon. Members have mentioned the effect of the changes on co-operatives and much mention has been made of housing associations. I regard my constituency as a deprived area in housing terms and hon. Members who represent deprived parts of the country welcome all initiatives to help overcome the housing crisis which has resulted from the Government's crazy economic policy. It is distressing for the co-operatives to be crushed at a time of housing crisis. In my constituency there are 2,640 families in houses unfit for human habitation, houses with black fungus crawling up the wall and so on.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): I understand the argument, but so that we may be better informed may we have an estimate of how many more properties would become available if the hon. Gentleman had his way and there was a reduction in corporation tax for housing associations?

Mr. Randall: We are not talking about a swamping action but about a fairly small reduction. The effect will not be massive and the new clause will not change the world, but small improvements can contribute to creating a better society. I do not think that the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) would like small co-operatives or housing associations to disappear because they help, in their small way. I see that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): The hon. Gentleman refers to small co-operatives and friendly societies. What rate of corporation tax do they pay now? Surely they benefit from the differential rate for small companies. Is the hon. Gentleman thinking of the larger co-operatives?

Mr. Randall: My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) made an interesting and useful point about the larger co-operatives when he said that because of competition co-operatives were having to get together and that we were experiencing a "fewer and larger" syndrome. That means that the tax paid by the larger co-operatives makes them uncompetitive compared with their commercial counterparts.

Mr. Eggar: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that, for instance, most of the members of the Co-operative Wholesale Society will benefit because they are covered by section 340 of the Taxes Act? I do not have a copy of that Act but is the hon. Gentleman suggesting ways of helping the Co-op to beat Sainsburys and Tescos? Is that what he is really after?

Mr. Randall: The hon. Gentleman should go to the Library and check whether he is really talking about section 340 of that Act. I have been asked an ill-prepared question and I do not want to waste my time on it. I want to talk about the future of co-operatives.

A specific example of the importance of co-operatives is in high technology. The Labour party is now strongly associated with high technology. I regard the Labour party as the party of the future and of high technology. There is no question about that.

Many small companies involved in high technology are co-operatives. Such businesses, by their nature, are high risk. There is a serious downturn in the electronics industry and this is causing liquidations. The uncertain future and the changes in technology mean that a company might soon be producing obsolete products which it cannot sell and so it will become unprofitable.

One advantage of co-operatives is that the equity can be shared among a number of owners. Many instances of that have occurred in Scotland. I think of the closure of the British Steel plants. Many organisations have branched out. Joint ownership is laudable and should be encouraged. The removal of the benefits which existed until March last year has had serious effects.

[Mr. Randall]

We are talking about helping high technology not in a massive way, but in a small but significant way. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook will recall visiting the Earls Court exhibition and speaking to three people who owned a small company. They explained how difficult it was to raise the capital to float the company. They did not intend to expand the business because they could not afford to go through yet another nine months of raising money.

5.15 pm

Such organisations should not be discouraged by an oppressive tax regime. Diverse ownership is the principle behind co-operatives and should be encouraged. It gives employees the opportunity to take part in the management and running of a business.

The new clause is worth supporting. It will ensure that mutual organisations such as co-operatives and friendly societies can go from strength to strength rather than being destroyed.

Sir Peter Hordern: When I first saw the new clause I confess that I was attracted by the notion that co-operatives, friendly societies and housing associations should be relatively well treated compared with other companies. After all, co-operatives and friendly societies have had a long and honourable history. Long before the welfare state the majority of people in Britain were covered by friendly societies.

There is more to the clause than meets the eye. I understand that friendly societies and co-operatives were favourably treated in terms of corporation tax before the changes made last year. The Opposition are suggesting that they should be yet more favourably treated.

I agree about the need to encourage small companies. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) referred in particular to high technology companies. In passing, the hon. Gentleman said that the Labour party was the party of high technology. When I first came to the House similar claims were made. The Labour party described the trend as the "searing white heat of technology." Shortly after the Labour party came to power, it put its plans in hand in the shape of the national plan. It needed evidence that there was a real interest in technology, and created the Department of Technology. More importantly, it put Mr. Frank Cousins in charge. The reason for placing Mr. Frank Cousins in charge was not —as it might seem to the general public and as we were led by Lord Wilson of Rievaulx to believe — to encourage technology but to find Frank Cousins a job. That job-finding practice has been done before and will no doubt be done again.

I was interested in the remarks made by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West about encouraging small companies and technology. He was right to say that these companies suffer from an acute shortage of capital because they do not have much of a track record to impress bankers. The fault that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West ascribes to the present system does not apply to small companies because small companies have the benefit of the small companies corporation tax rate. I hope that the Minister will tell us how small companies, whether they are co-operatives or industrial provident societies, will be affected by the proposal.

Small companies do not suffer in the way that the new clause tabled by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) suggests. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will say how many co-operatives pay the full rate of corporation tax. My guess is that not many pay the full rate. Most are small, individual, friendly and provident societies that we all want to see thrive. They are doing well under the present corporation tax rate.

The Chancellor's measures taken in last year's Finance Act were intended to avoid distortion in the operation of corporation tax. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) made that point in his excellent speech when he said that there had been too much of a buzz and distortion about investment. Companies should concentrate on making profits, and any distortion of the corporation tax in favour of a specific form of money-making activity — for instance, co-operatives and friendly or industrial societies — departs from the principle set out in the Chancellor's measures.

Some distortions do exist in corporation tax. As I see the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) present I shall mention one area where distortion arises, and that is in Northern Ireland. I am in favour of a distinctive form of corporation tax for different parts of the country. The system of regional aid and grants has been extremely wasteful and we should reduce the cost of work either by reducing national insurance contributions or corporation tax in the regions most affected by the tax

——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We have strayed from the new clause. I hope that we may return to the mitigation of corporation tax liabilities.

Sir Peter Hordern: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The new clause invites us to make distortions in corporation tax, and I know that I cannot ask your opinion on that. If distortions must exist they should not be in the techniques of corporation tax or its operation but in its coverage. It is an established practice for grants to be given to firms in Northern Ireland to recover corporation tax.

The substance of the new clause remains to be proved. I understand why the Opposition want to make a case for the co-ops and that some Opposition Members may be sponsored by the Co-operative Wholesale Society. I hope that the Minister will tell us whether the Co-operative Wholesale Society as a trading unit suffers in terms of taxation when compared with such trading units as Sainsburys or the other big multiple organisations. The new clause does not make the case and I believe that the fewer distortions in corporation tax, the better.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I declare an interest as a member of several co-operative societies, many of which have gone bankrupt. I was a member of the Sowerby Bridge co-operative society and I am a member of the Oxford co-operative society.

The Opposition have a simple motive in tabling the new clause. We want to encourage the co-operative principle and to encourage the co-op which has fallen on hard and tough times. The co-op is not organised on the same basis as the giant organisations and cannot fight Sainsburys, Tesco and Asda. The Government want to put the co-op on the same competitive footing as the giants in terms of taxation. The co-op is not organised for that form of competition.

The Opposition want to encourage the principle of co-operation and the co-ops. The tax concessions to co-operatives in the rate of corporation tax has been accepted by Labour and Conservative Governments. It originated in the Heath Government, and there is no reason why what the Heath Government giveth the Thatcher Government should take away. The only reason can be that the Thatcher Government have a distaste for the principle of co-operation and for any principle decreed or decided by the Heath Government. That is another manifestation of the difference between the Heath Government, which wisely agreed a distinct rate of corporation tax for co-operatives, and the Thatcher Government, with their extremist composition.

The Opposition seek to repair the damage caused by the Finance Act 1984 by restoring the special tax concession for co-operatives which all previous Governments have accepted.

Sir Peter Hordern rose——

Mr. Mitchell: I shall not give way.

The Government are clear in their commitment to remove that privilege and to put co-operative societies on the same tax footing as private firms. I know that the Economic Secretary to the Treasury will say that co-operative societies should be treated the same in tax terms, but I say that co-operatives should have special treatment. They are a special form of organisation which deserves a special concession which all Governments have conceded in the past. That is an advantage — not a major advantage—that the co-operatives need because of their peculiar form of organisation and the specific competitive difficulties they face. Their interests are different from crudely and directly motivated, profit-oriented firms. The co-operatives' role is much wider and they have a commitment to serve their members and to advance certain principles in society. Co-operation is only one of those principles. Such aims and objectives merit and justify special treatment.

The Government will doubtless claim the principle of equality. They do not like co-operation, and do not know what co-operation and working together means. They will proclaim the virtue of one system of reduced corporation tax for all. The Opposition say that that is not right or reasonable. The co-operatives deserve a special advantage that they once had and that we are seeking to restore. The advantage springs from the co-operative principle which is not to maximise profits for their shareholders but to further the cause of their members and to maximise the benefits for their consumers by returning any profit or surplus in the system to those members at intervals in the form of the dividend in proportion to their purchases.

The central principle of co-operative societies is a commitment of service to, and a desire to advance and improve the position of, their members. Generally speaking, the members of co-operative societies are not the wealthy in society. Indeed, in most cases they are not even the middle class, because the co-operative principle has always been strongly rooted in working-class areas. Their aim is to improve the position of the less well-off, and that is another argument for the special tax concession that they had and that we are seeking to restore by the new clause.

5.30 pm

Although there have been accusations of giantism against the co-operative wholesale societies, the impact of competition from undoubted giants such as Sainsbury has forced the co-ops to come together to achieve the benefits of strength and size to enable them to face competition. It is unfair, therefore, to tax them with this form of liability when it has been forced on them by the nature of the giants with which they are competing. Nevertheless, the giants among the co-operatives are organised on exactly the same co-operative principle. Although they may be concerned with production, they are organised in the interests of the consumers, their members, rather than in the interests of the profit of their shareholders.

With more than 12 million members in about 500 separate societies, it is clear that the co-operative societies have a role which is worth encouraging. They appeal to millions of people who do not have large spending power. These are people to whom the pence really count and for whom the principle of co-operation—the return of the "divi"—is important.

My hon. Friends and I hold strongly to the view that it is fair to give organisations which perform that important social purpose the advantage which was accepted by all Governments up to the time of the passing of the Finance Act 1984. We want to return the position to the status quo ante Lawson. That position, which we say the societies should have, arises from the nature and organisation of co-operatives. When, in the early 1970s, there was a change in the basis of corporation tax, a Select Committee examined the possibility of changing from the classical system to the imputation system. That Committee received representations from, among others, all interested bodies, including the Co-operative Union and the various co-operative societies. It agreed that the change would be unfair to the co-operatives and that there should be a special rate to recognise their unique role.

When, therefore, the new chit system was brought in, there was a special rate; without that rate, there would have been a massive increase in taxation for co-operative societies. The reason for the distinction was simple. Co-operatives do not make distributions, as companies do, and, as the imputation system gives relief to a business in respect of the advance corporation tax on distributions, the co-operatives would have been paying tax on the full rate of mainstream tax. They were therefore given a special rate in recognition of their special role.

The Government argue that, because they are bringing down the rate of corporation tax, the co-operatives should be on the same basis as other private firms, so that they will all pay the same rate. However, the reasons for the special concession remain. If there was justification for the concession, it remains valid whether at the higher or lower rate.

When the Chancellor introduced his 1984 Budget, the co-operative societies protested against the abolition of their special rate, not because that rate had given them an advantage but because, if there was no special rate, the co-operatives would be liable to corporation tax at the full rate, whatever the full rate was, whereas companies could deduct the tax liability of the shareholder on the distribution.

After that proposal was made, a meeting took place between officials of the Inland Revenue and a deputation from the Co-operative Union. That took place in September of last year, when spokesmen for the Inland

[Mr. Mitchell]

Revenue agreed with the co-operatives that the withdrawal of the special rate would disadvantage the co-ops compared with companies, and they agreed to advise the Financial Secretary accordingly.

The Inland Revenue officials also confirmed at that meeting what had been said by their predecessors in 1971 to the then Select Committee which recommended the special rate in the first place—that there had been no change in the circumstances to alter the co-operatives' position.

That was the situation at that meeting in Somerset house in September of last year. Subsequently, the co-ops received the news that there would be no amendment of the 1984 legislation and that the special rate would be abolished. That seemed to be a negation of the agreement —or at any rate the feeling—of that September 1984 meeting. It seemed an unreasonable decision which bore no relation to the position that the Inland Revenue officials had taken at the meeting. If the grounds were as the officials had then suggested, there should have been a change. That change has not been made, and that is why we are proposing in the new clause that it be made.

Why are the Government, in their zeal to remove anomalies and have a more uniform and simple tax system, so preoccupied with removing only those anomalies which help the mass of the people, particularly the less well-off, rather than the tax perks and advantages of those whom the Conservatives, by and large, represent?

The Government demonstrate that zeal — as the Minister will no doubt do when he replies — single-mindedly against one section of society—those whom my hon. Friends and I represent — whereas when it comes to any similar zeal for uniformity, efficiency and simplicity in the system which might harm the supporters of the Conservative party, it suddenly dries up. The cold glint behind the steel-rimmed glasses turns warm and affectionate, and changes proposed in that direction are suddenly withdrawn.

Let us consider some of the privileges and anomalies that are being attacked, amid howls of protest only from Opposition Members. When it comes to tax concessions which might benefit workplace nurseries or tax changes which might benefit friendly societies and working-class organisations such as the Buffaloes, or to considering postmen's Christmas boxes, the Government are full of zeal for tax reform and efficiency. When we speak of a special concession for the co-operatives, which benefit working-class people and help the humblest in society to improve their lot, giving them more power as consumers, the Government are full of energy and efficiency, bustling with zeal to clean up anomalies. But as soon as we consider anything which harms concessions to the Conservatives in society, it becomes political and cannot be done.

The Government stopped short of the sort of changes, for example, that the Secretary of State for Education and Science wanted to make in the grant system, because that would have harmed their section of society.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member must restrict his remarks to the question of the mitigation of corporation tax liability.

Mr. Mitchell: My zeal for the new clause has overcome my normal caution and desire to stay within the rules of order.

There is a case for a special rate for co-operatives to demonstrate the Government's attachment to furthering the cause of co-operation and to demonstrate that we regard co-operatives as something of a higher order and a better form of industrial and economic organisation than the simple profit-oriented greed of the company that has only shareholders. By the new clause, we are therefore giving the comparatively small advantage to the co-operatives that they have always had.

There are various arguments for doing that. The former economics editor of The Times, Mr. Peter Jay, was writing in the mid-1970s about the theme, which has now been taken up in America, of furthering co-operatives as a means of breaking the deadlock in society between capital and labour and ending the constant wages inflation that seemed to be the dominant theme of the economics of the 1970s. There are economic, social and political reasons for recognising co-operatives as a higher form of economic and industrial organisation that should be encouraged.

We have to recognise that at the moment the co-op is not as healthy or as powerful as it was, and it is certainly not the intimidating organisation that Conservative Members have been trying to paint it as. It is having a difficult time in competition with Sainsbury, Asda and Tesco. One reason is that it is a democratic organisation that serves its members and puts their interest higher than sheer greed for profit.

A second reason is that the co-op has social commitments and responsibilities that spring from being a co-operative organisation. All those factors have to be recognised in the way the co-op is run, and if they are recognised, the co-op is put at a competitive disadvantage. We could argue that the clause is not only recognising a higher organisation, but repairing a weakness under which the co-op now labours. It is totally single-minded fallacious pursuit of the principle of tax equality for the Government to kick the co-op when it is in that state, as they did in the Finance Bill last year.

By the new clause we should recognise the unique role and special importance of the co–operatives, and express our desire to encourage that vital social principle.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): The House started off listening with interest to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), but during his speech our interest waned. His special pleading on behalf of the co–operative movement killed his case. If I had anything to do with the co-operative movement, I should not ask him to advocate my case.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the profit motive of companies such as Sainsbury and Tesco and compared that with the co-operative movement. What is wrong with the management of the co-operative movement? Why is it not making profits? Why do people who used to go to the co-operatives now go to Tesco and Sainsbury? The simple reason is that they are cheaper, so that is where the British working man and woman are now buying their goods. Let me make it clear that I have no vested interest in Sainsbury, Tesco, Fine Fare or any other supermarket.

Mr. Eggar: Does my hon. Friend agree that the speech of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) called on people to shop at Tesco or Sainsbury because they are more efficient than the Co-operative Wholesale Society?

5.45 pm

Sir William Clark: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. The special pleading became a little sickening, because in my view the co-operative movement has gone down because it cannot face the competition. When the hon. Gentleman began his speech he spoke about two co-operatives that had gone bankrupt. It is small wonder that they go bankrupt if they cannot face the competitiveness of Tesco, Sainsbury and so on. The co-operatives are owned by their members, and the hon. Gentleman maintains that the mass of poor people go there. If that is so, why are the co-operatives not more successful? The Opposition are always saying that everyone is poor. If everyone is worse off, surely people should be flocking to the co-operatives, which should be thriving, but the reverse is the case, and people are shopping at Tesco, Sainsbury and so on.

One of the best co-operative movements that we have seen in the past few years is the co-operative that has been formed by the National Freight Company. That co-operative works, but before the employee buy-out it was a loss-making organisation. It is now highly profitable. Is it not possible for the co-operative movement to do that? I do not know whether the hon. Member for Great Grimsby has anything to do with the co-operative movement, but if he has I suggest that he either pays a little more attention to why the co-operative movement has gone downhill or resigns from the movement.

I come next to housing associations. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) did not know what section 340 of the Taxes Act covered. It covers the mutual societies and the rest, which do a good job. Housing associations do a first-class job.

Housing associations have done good work in the sale of the houses and flats they have owned. That is a good thing, but we have to do more. We should not single out any section, because the sale of houses and accommodation of housing associations is an incentive to buy for people who belong to the associations.

I shall trace the history of corporation tax so that we may discuss the subject with more clarity than is evident in the clause tabled by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). If the right hon. Gentleman looks at corporation tax, he will see that it was introduced at a rate of 40 per cent. It was then increased to 45 per cent. and when the Conservative Government took office it came down to 40 per cent. In 1973, as the right hon. Gentleman will recollect, the imputation system was introduced, whereby advance corporation tax became an advantage to distribution—a 30 per cent. advantage.

In an articulate speech of great clarity, my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) dealt with the matter. If a company distributed the whole of its profits, and if the profits were 100 units, and there was a 52 per cent. rate of corporation tax, that left a possible dividend of 48 units. If the 48 units were grossed up, it would be 70 units. With 30 per cent. ACT off, that brought one down to 48 units. In my reckoning, that meant that the effective cost of corporation tax on a distribution was just over 31 or 32 per cent. That was an advantage to companies that could distribute profits.

Mutual societies, co-ops, and housing associations do not distribute profits in that sense. That was the origin of the special rate for the mutual societies and so on. That special rate was 40 per cent. But then, as has been mentioned, in 1984 my right hon. Friend the Chancellor stopped stock relief and cut down capital allowances. He made the reason perfectly clear last year. He did it so that overall he could cut the burden of corporation tax. It was at 52 per cent., then it was at 50 per cent., 45 per cent. and 40 per cent., and it is coming down to 35 per cent. in 1986, which is one year hence. That reduction in corporation tax is an incentive for our whole economy. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, who has special responsibility for matters affecting our economic future, will agree. Corporation tax reductions must generate economic activity. That is the idea behind them.

The special rate was and is set at 40 per cent. The Opposition want it to be reduced to 30 per cent. A rate of 35 per cent. should be the lowest level for every mutual society. What happens if the co-operatives and the housing associations do not make huge profits? They are not in business to make huge profits. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby said, their profits are small. In the past, the co-operatives have enjoyed the advantage of paying dividends fully tax free, which are chargeable against their gross profits. Now they give a discount with their stamps, which are fully allowed for tax purposes.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on achieving a maximum 35 per cent. rate of corporation tax for next year. The corporation tax level for any business earning £100,000 profit is 30 per cent. The new clause is slightly redundant because most of the mutual societies — the co-operatives and housing associations — make profits below £100,000 and would suffer only 30 per cent. corporation tax. This new clause would impose another anomaly on our tax system. If we say that all organisations should pay corporation tax at 35 per cent., let us stop special pleading. Small businesses, small mutual societies, co-operatives and housing associations would be on all fours if this measure were accepted. I trust that my hon. Friend will resist the new clause.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) explained that the measure followed from a similiar amendment that he moved to last year's Finance Bill. The new clause has enabled us to have an interesting and, in some ways, rather general debate on the societies — the provident societies, co-operatives, housing associations and building societies—that are affected by the new clause.

We have had a wide-ranging debate and it is not easy for me to pick up all the threads. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) referred to the taxation of housing associations. Under section 341 of the Taxes Act, which applies to approved housing associations, rents received by associations are not liable to tax. Interest paid by associations qualifies for tax relief for their members and the profits on house sales are exempt from capital gains tax. Housing associations are liable to the full rate of tax only if the profits exceed £100,000, when they move beyond the small companies rate. Although most hon. Members would agree that housing associations need encouragement, I believe that the regime under which they operate is favourable.

[Mr. Ian Stewart]

A number of hon. Members referred to the nature and virtues of co-operatives. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook suggested that the Government had a prejudice against co-operatives. That is not the case. The hon. Member for Stockton, South spoke of the Co-operative Development Agency's work. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) referred to the work of the co-operative development association in his area. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) referred to the possibility of co-operatives becoming more involved with the high technology sector. Hon. Members generally have recognised the valuable role that co-operatives can play.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that he thought that the co-operatives should be especially advantaged and should have special treatment because they particularly look after the interests of consumers whereas companies with shareholders do not. He said that they were suffering from competition from these companies with shareholders and that this was not necessarily fair. They therefore needed special treatment. There is a certain inconsistency in that line of argument. Any company, whether an incorporated or a co-operative body, that looks after the interests of consumers and customers is likely to flourish and any body that neglects them is likely not to do so well. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) referred to the reasons for the decline in the co-operative movement. I do not think that any of us disagrees with the fact that the co-operative societies — the industrial and provident societies, housing associations and building societies— that are covered by the suggested provisions of the new clause play an important and sometimes central role in various activities in the community. We want them to prosper and develop.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said that he was asking not for special advantages for the co-operatives and the other societies but for comparable treatment with commercial companies. He said that it would be wrong to call the proposed 30 per cent. tax a special rate and that he wanted to ensure that those societies were not disadvantaged. He referred to the "discriminatory pressures" of the 1984 changes in the corporation tax regime for capital and other allowances. He referred to the "injustice" of last year's legislation.

Even if the comments of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook were justified—I shall endeavour to show that they were not — they conflict with what his colleague the hon. Member for Great Grimsby said. The hon. Gentleman felt that the co-operatives should receive special treatment because they were a higher form of organisation. I do not want to dwell on this difference between Labour hon. and right hon. Members, but it is important in understanding the new clause to be clear about what they said. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said that he was not asking for special advantages; he was merely suggesting that last year's changes brought about particular disadvantages for the co-operative societies. He looked back to the introduction of corporation tax in 1965 and then to the significant change made in 1972, from the "classical" system to the "imputation" system. He said that special arrangements were introduced at that time for small companies—the small companies rate—and for the societies because of their acknowledged special circumstances. That is the point on which we differ, because his argument is that the maximum rate of 40 per cent. which applied to those societies from that date recognised that the industrial and provident societies were in some way disadvantaged by the imputation system and, therefore, that a special rate should be retained to shield industrial and provident societies from the impact of the 1984 corporation tax reforms. I hope that that is not an unfair representation of the right hon. Gentleman's argument.

6 pm

I should like to take the right hon. Gentleman through the arguments, which will show that that is an incorrect interpretation of what happened. It was not the imputation system which damaged the societies from 1972 onwards. The rate of corporation tax which was, at that time, raised from 40 per cent. to 52 per cent. caused the problem. Before the imputation system was introduced, all companies paid the 40 per cent. corporation tax rate. With the introduction of the imputation system and the application of advance corporation tax payments for incorporated companies being offset by a higher rate of corporation tax, which rose to 52 per cent., the societies were damaged, but they were damaged by the rate change and not by the imputation system. It was, therefore, fair that there should be a special rate for industrial and provident societies, not because of the structural change but because it would have been wrong to make them pay the 52 per cent. which was the rate chosen to offset changes effected by advance corporation tax.

When the rate returns to 40 per cent., as now, and goes to 35 per cent. as it will next year, there is no longer a case for retaining a special rate because the industrial and provident societies are not disadvantaged by having to pay a rate above that which operated under the old system. The 40 per cent. rate was introduced, not to advantage them but to stop the 52 per cent. rate disadvantaging them.

The right hon. Gentleman argued that a special rate should be retained to shield societies from the consequences of last year's tax reforms. More than 99 per cent. of the industrial and provident societies pay the small companies rate, which we reduced last year from 38 per cent. to 30 per cent. Like small incorporated companies, if their profits are below £100,000 they are already enjoying a lower rate of corporation tax. Larger societies would pay the normal corporation tax rate. Most building societies pay the small companies rate, and the great majority of co-operative retail societies will be paying the small companies rate.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: May I confirm that the Minister is not misleading the House when he gives such volume figures? How much business do the societies which pay at the higher rate conduct? Many of the societies to which he referred may be substantial but they may conduct little business.

Mr. Stewart: That is a fair point. I was coming to it immediately. I do not intend to mislead the House. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West mentioned some of the smaller societies. About 20 of the 200 retail societies conduct about 75 per cent. of the turnover. The top 10 per cent. therefore conduct three quarters of the business. The smaller societies mostly benefit from the small companies rate.

The larger co-operatives, housing associations and building societies pay at the full corporation tax rate.

During the 10 or 12 years before last year such societies enjoyed a highly privileged regime. When the imputation system was introduced, the offset for companies between advance corporation tax and the 52 per cent. rate was set to produce a broadly neutral revenue outturn for the incorporated sector. At that stage it did not and could not take account of the influence on rates of tax paid caused by 100 per cent. first-year capital allowances and by stock relief because they had not been introduced. The 100 per cent. capital allowances were introduced after the imputation system and stock relief was introduced in 1974. Those allowances were designed to ameliorate the 52 per cent. basic rate of corporation tax.

If we take into account what happened in the 10 or 12 years that followed, first, inflation turned out to be higher than had been anticipated and, therefore, stock relief came to play a much larger part in the tax affairs of distribution companies. Secondly, there was a period of heavy investment and many companies and societies took the opportunity to shelter their profits from corporation tax through capital allowances. They, therefore, enjoyed a relative advantage through an unintentional combination of circumstances during that time.

All that is happening as a result of the 1984 changes is that the societies are being brought back to a more normal and ordinary basis of tax charge. They will still be better off than under the classical system. They will still be better off than companies because their dividends to members are allowed in full against their taxable profits whereas company dividends suffer a 30 per cent. deduction which is allowable as an offset against advance corporation tax although it does not fully cover the corporaion tax charge. In that respect, societies, co-operatives and so on are at an advantage compared with the incorporated company sector. Although such societies and co-operatives in recent years have taken great advantage—as it was reasonable for them to do—of an extraordinary combination of high capital allowances, high stock relief and a lower ceiling to the corporation tax rate, that is not a regime which we choose to perpetuate. It was a set of circumstances which did well for the societies and I do not begrudge them that. It enabled them to accumulate reserves in a satisfactory way and I hope that they will be useful to the societies. There is no argument for introducing a different system of corporation tax or a lower rate for those societies merely because they were able to take unusual advantage of a set of circumstances in recent years. I therefore ask the House to reject the new clause.

Mr. Hattersley: May I first clear up the distinction—there is not a shadow of difference—that the Minister of State seemed to see between my speech and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)? Much to my regret I missed my hon. Friend's speech, but as I understand it he was arguing for the principle of assistance because co-operatives are, in the Minister's words, a "higher form of organisation" which should be given special benefit. I share that judgment. I believe that the co-operative organisation is a superior form of organisation. I should like and hope one day to be able to give them special assistance. My hon. Friend and I are in agreement on that point.

That is a subject, as I know my hon. Friend will agree, for another new clause or for an amendment, not the one that we are debating today. My hon. Friend and I equally agree that the new clause is only a step towards the superior treatment that we should like to see given to restore the previous position that co-operatives had in the fiscal lexicon.

The most surprising speech of the day was that made by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). As I understand it, he was opposed to the new clause and to the reorganisation of tax liability that I suggested for co-operative societies in particular. This is surprising, because last year when we debated the subject he was the most passionate advocate of the position which the new clause advocates. The hon. Member shakes his head. I have already had the good fortune to quote one paragraph from his speech. Let me quote his peroration in full:

"In 1972, the Finance Bill was introduced by a Conservative Chancellor and it was seen that equity should be carried through. I hope that my hon. Friend will either now—if he can say it now all well and good—or between now and Report say that when corporation tax comes down from 50 per cent. to 40 per cent. the differential, whether it is 31 per cent. or something else—I shall not argue the percentage—will be between the top rate of corporation tax and the rate that building societies pay. If it is not, there will be an injustice because building societies and co-operative societies do not have the right to distribute their profits."—[Official Report, 1 May 1984; Vol, 59, c. 286.]

If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me for saying so, he could not have put it more clearly a year ago, yet this afternoon he argued quite the opposite. I do not know why that should be, but the case he made a year ago is much stronger than that which he has made today and was not in any way undermined by the speech of the Minister of State. As I understand the last passages of the speech of the Minister of State, the Government case now is that co-operative societies, housing associations and the rest were unfairly advantaged in 1972. If he is not saying that, I do not understand how he can possibly advance his case.

With corporation tax at 52 to 55 per cent. it was necessary to have a 40 per cent. special rate to meet the needs of co-operative societies because of their special conditions in that they distributed only a small percentage of their profit. If it was necessary when the normal rate was 52 per cent. to have a co-operative rate that met their needs of something like 80 per cent. of the usual figure, why is it not necessary to have 80 per cent. of the usual figure to meet the special conditions of co-operative societies?

It is no good the Minister of State saying or implying that the change in the top rate of corporation tax has absolved the co-operative societies from the need to pay at a rate which penalises them. I gave him three examples—Sheffield, Peterborough and Ipswich. Each of those societies demonstrates that under the new arrangement, which is trumpeted about the country as a reduction in corporation tax, they are now paying more because the new method of calculation excludes them from the special rate. If they were not specially benefited 30 years ago and they are paying more now in comparison with what they might have been allowed to pay had the old arrangements been allowed to continue, the only possible conclusion anyone is able to draw in logic is that there is unfair discrimination against the societies and it operates—I do not know whether by intention or by mistake—because they distribute a very small proportion of their profits.

The Minister if State's answer was wholly unconvincing but not surprising. The speech of the hon. Member for Croydon, South was equally unconvincing but astonishing. In the light of what the Minister of State says we shall divide the House or we shall continue to argue the case of equity for co-operative societies and the proper incentives that they need to multiply and to profit.

[Mr. Hattersley]

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—
The House divided: Ayes 197, Noes 267.

Division No. 268] [6.13 pm

AYES

Alton, David
Archer, Rt Hon Peter
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bagier, Gordon A. T.
Barnett, Guy
Barron, Kevin
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Beith, A. J.
Bell, Stuart
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boothroyd, Miss Betty
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'f'rmline E)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Brown, N. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne E)
Brown, Ron (E'burgh, Leith)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Caborn, Richard
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carter-Jones, Lewis
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clarke, Thomas
Clay, Robert
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Donald
Concannon, Rt Hon J. D.
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cowans, Harry
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Craigen, J. M.
Crowther, Stan
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Dr John
Dalyell, Tam
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Deakins, Eric
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Douglas, Dick
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eastham, Ken
Edwards, Bob (W'h'mpt'n SE)
Ellis, Raymond
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fatchett, Derek
Faulds, Andrew
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Forrester, John
Foster, Derek
Fraser, J. (Norwood)
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Garrett, W. E.
George, Bruce
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Gourlay, Harry
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hamilton, W. W. (Central Fife)
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hattersley, Rt Hon Roy
Healey, Rt Hon Denis
Heffer, Eric S.
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Holland, Stuart (Vauxhall)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Dr. Mark (Durham)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Janner, Hon Greville
Jenkins, Rt Hon Roy (Hillh'd)
John, Brynmor
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kennedy, Charles
Kilroy-Silk, Robert
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Leighton, Ronald
Lewis, Ron (Carlisle)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Livsey, Richard
McCartney, Hugh
McCusker, Harold
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McKelvey, William
MacKenzie, Rt Hon Gregor
Maclennan, Robert
McNamara, Kevin
McTaggart, Robert
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Meacher, Michael
Meadowcroft, Michael
Michie, William
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Miller, Dr M. S. (E Kilbride)
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Molyneaux, Rt Hon James
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Nellist, David
Nicholson, J.
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Owen, Rt Hon Dr David
Park, George
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Penhaligon, David
Pike, Peter
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Radice, Giles
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, M.
Richardson, Ms Jo
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Rogers, Allan
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Wm. (Londonderry)
Rowlands, Ted
Ryman, John
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Short, Mrs R.(W'hampt'n NE)
Silkin, Rt Hon J.
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Smyth, Rev W. M. (Belfast S)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steel, Rt Hon David
Stewart, Rt Hon D. (W Isles)
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Thomas, Dafydd (Merioneth)
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Thorne, Stan (Preston)
Tinn, James
Torney, Tom
Wainwright, R.
Walker, Cecil (Belfast N)
Wareing, Robert
Weetch, Ken
White, James
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Wilson, Gordon
Winnick, David
Woodall, Alec
Wrigglesworth, Ian
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Frank Haynes and
Mr. Sean Hughes.

NOES

Adley, Robert
Aitken, Jonathan
Amery, Rt Hon Julian
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Batiste, Spencer
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Bendall, Vivian
Benyon, William
Bevan, David Gilroy
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Body, Richard
Bonsor, Sir Nicholas
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Boyson, Dr Rhodes
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buchanan-Smith, Rt Hon A.
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nick
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, W. S.
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cockeram, Eric
Colvin, Michael
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Couchman, James
Cranborne, Viscount
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Durant, Tony
Dykes, Hugh
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Fletcher, Alexander
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Franks, Cecil
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Gilmour, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gorst, John
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Gregory, Conal

Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Ground, Patrick
Grylls, Michael
Gummer, John Selwyn
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Hannam, John
Haselhurst, Alan
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hickmet, Richard
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hill, James
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holt, Richard
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irving, Charles
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Joseph, Rt Hon Sir Keith
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
King, Rt Hon Tom
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Edgbaston)
Knox, David
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Lyell, Nicholas
McCurley, Mrs Anna
MacGregor, John
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McQuarrie, Albert
Major, John
Malone, Gerald
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Miscampbell, Norman
Moore, John
Morrison, Hon C. (Devizes)
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Neubert, Michael
Norris, Steven
Osborn, Sir John
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Porter, Barry
Powley, John
Proctor, K. Harvey
Pym, Rt Hon Francis
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Renton, Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speed, Keith
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stevens, Martin (Fulham)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stokes, John
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlington)
Townsend, Cyril D. (B'heath)
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Waldegrave, Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Wall, Sir Patrick
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Warren, Kenneth
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wiggin, Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Wolfson, Mark
Woodcock, Michael
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)
Younger, Rt Hon George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones and
Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 1

SPIRITS, BEER, WINE, MADE-WINE AND CIDER

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I beg to move amendment No. 129, in page 2, line 6, at end insert—

'(3A) With respect to wine or made-wine imported into or produced in the United Kingdom on or after 29th July 1985, Schedule 1 to this Act shall have effect with the substitution—

(a) for the words "of less than 15", in each place where they occur, of the words "not exceeding 15"; and

(b) for the words "or not less than 15" of the words "exceeding 15".'.

Mr. Speaker: I have reconsidered my grouping with this amendment, and now propose to take Government amendment No. 129 on its own, and to take, separately, amendment No. 2, after amendment No. 1.

Mr. Hayhoe: In the Committee debate on clause 5, strong representations were made about the adverse effect of the clause on the import of Cyprus sherry, and the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) persuasively and eloquently argued the case for a change. Subsequently, I met the Cypriot Minister of Commerce and Industry and members of the Cyprus wine trade. That meeting was followed by talks with the Customs and Excise, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Cyprus high commission, representatives of the United Kingdom importers and a small deputation led by the hon. Member for Hodge Hill.

It became clear, as a result of all these discussions, that the difficulties did not centre on clause 5 but stemmed from a combination of European Community regulations, which were applied within the United Kingdom from January of last year and which contained an anomaly affecting medium and dry style Cyprus sherries, and the provisions of the 1984 Budget. The full impact on Cyprus sherry of this combination did not come to light last year because it was masked by the importers taking advantage of the loophole on blending that clause 5 is closing. It was not until that loophole was blocked that the serious nature of the Cyprus problem became apparent.

As I said in Committee and subsequently, there was no intention of causing a severe disadvantage to the Cyprus sherry interests when action was taken in 1984. I have sought to establish what is necessary to restore the pre-1984 position for Cyprus sherry. Part of that is the amendment that I now commend to the House.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Before the Minister sits down——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has sat down.

6.30 pm

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): I should like to thank the Minister of State for his kind words about my persuasion and eloquence in Standing Committee. I raised this issue on behalf of the Labour party and I was supported in Committee by my hon. Friends the Members for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). We were acting at the direct request of the Co-operative Wholesale Society, which is one of our biggest importers of Cyprus sherry.

[Mr. Terry Davis]

I am assured that the society and the other members of the Wine and Spirit Association regard the Government's amendment as a most satisfactory solution to the problem which we drew to the Minister's attention in Committee. Not only will it avoid the impact of clause 5 of the Bill; it will also restore Cyprus sherry to the tariff classification which it enjoyed two years ago. As a result, the consumer will pay 50p less for a bottle of Cyprus sherry. Cyprus sherry will be cheaper now than it was as a result of the blunder made 12 months ago.

I am not blaming the Minister of State for what happened. It was obvious from our discussions in Committee and our private discussions afterwards that the Minister had not been told about this problem. I should like to pay tribute to his readiness to find a solution which will benefit not only the trade and the consumer, but also the economy of Cyprus. To be blunt, I believe the problem was known to the Government, to the Ministry of Agriculture, to the Foreign Office and to the Customs and Excise. Unfortunately, no one told the appropriate Treasury Ministers. I thank the Minister of State for acting so promptly and for responding so helpfully to our representations.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): This amendment is the result of co-operation between the Opposition and the Government. Very often the Opposition plead for something and the Government willy-nilly resist it. I hope the Minister will not take this unkindly, but I believe the situation about Cyprus sherry was not known to him precisely, at least in Committee. It was clear to both sides on the Committee that something was going wrong and that if something was not done quickly a long-established industry would fade away along with all the other long-established industries that have faded away during the course of this Conservative Administration.

I am pleased that the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) got together and got to the bottom of the problem. I am pleased that the Minister has said the amendment will put the matter right. The problem in Cyprus may be a small one in relation to industry in this country, but it would have had very serious ramifications for the economy of Cyprus. I am glad that the Minister has solved the problem, that the economy of Cyprus will not be damaged, and that the economy of this country, certainly in the Manchester area and in Birmingham, will not be damaged either.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) wants to intervene when the Minister comes in, if he does. I hope that, in a spirit of co-operation, the Minister will give way so that we can put this matter right and for once have unanimity in the House.

Mr. Randall: My contribution to this debate will be brief because we had a considerable debate in Committee.

I believe that the Government were not aware of the anomaly caused by the change which took place in the 1984 Budget, and the way in which the importers were mixing their various grades of sherry overseas. That affected the imports. That anomaly was having a detrimental effect not just on the economy of Cyprus and the standard of living of its people, but also upon the retail and distributive outlets in this country.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) pointed out, the Co-operative Wholesale Society is our largest importer of Cyprus sherry. I know that the society was deeply concerned about the effect of this anomaly. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek): I am delighted the Minister has had consultations, and from what he said they seem to have been very thorough. If the amendment is accepted, an anomaly will have been overcome, and that will be to the benefit of everybody.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The amendment was moved by the Minister. Why did he not seek to reply to the debate?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me; it is a matter for the Minister.

Clause 3

HYDROCARBON OIL

Mr. K. Harvey Proctor (Billericay): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 26, leave out subsection (2) and add—

'(2) In section 9(2) of the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979 (oil delivered for home use for certain industrial purposes) the words "but do not include the use of oil as fuel or, except as provided by subsection (3) below as a lubricant" shall be deleted and there shall be inserted in its place the following:—

"(c) use in the bench-testing of an internal combustion piston engine by a motor vehicle manufacturer or motor vehicle engine manufacturer during the research development manufacture or preparation of such engine or any part thereof but do not include except as provided in subsection 2*(c)* above the use of oil as fuel or, except as provided by subsection (3) below as a lubricant".

(3) Subsection (1) above shall be deemed to come into force at six o'clock in the evening of 19th March 1985 and subsection (2) shall be deemed to come into force on the passing of this Act.'.

The purpose of the amendment is to allow fuels used in research and development of automotive engines to be exempt from duty under the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979. This is not a new idea or a new amendment. The amendment covers only the bench testing of engines for research and development in the motor industry. The cost to the Exchequer would be around £3 million a year for the industry as a whole. Ford carries out this type of work in my constituency of Billericay and would save about £500,000 a year.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment has been closely involved in EEC moves to reduce pollution levels of vehicle exhaust gases. Like me, he believes that British development in lean-burn technology—that is, altering the ratio of the fuel to air mixture in the engine—is the key to more acceptable emission technology throughout Europe. The motor industry is spending millions of pounds to achieve these improvements, and much of the work is carried out by Ford at Dunton in my constituency, where the company employs 3,316 people. It is the largest employer of labour in my constituency.

This is a tax on innovation and is not levied in some of our overseas competitive markets, such as Germany, which puts the United Kingdom industry at a serious disadvantage when competing for research work of this nature. Engine research and production is vital for Britain if we are to maintain a high technology base, and is vital for our overseas trade. Ford produced over 780,000 engines last year in the United Kingdom and 46 per cent. of those engines were exported, earning for Britain £250 million.

The research being carried out into new generations of engines will have a continuing benefit for the United Kingdom balance of trade. Ford recently announced a £157 million investment in new engine development at Dagenham in order to produce about 200,000 engines a year, the majority of which will be for export. The developments are the result of long and expensive research activity in my constituency and bring to a total of £370 million Ford's engine investment in the United Kingdom in the last two years.

Lean burn still has enormous development potential; that is why we should be anxious to ensure that the United Kingdom motor industry does not suffer development costs that are not experienced by some of our competitors abroad. There is a case for arguing that all aspects of automotive engine research, which include engine testing both in vehicles and on test rigs, should be excluded, but the difficulty in controlling such exemptions is recognised, and this modest amendment applies only to rig testing where separate fuel storage facilities and records can be easily verified.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will look carefully at the points made in the amendment and be able to regard them with some favour.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) on moving the amendment, and I shall be extremely disappointed if the Minister of State does not accept it.

The need for the amendment arises out of section 9 of the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979 in which considerable concessions were made. The provision covers the exemption of petroleum products used in the manufacture of an article, for cleaning plant and for certain lubricating purposes. I should not have thought it unreasonable to extend it still further.

My hon. Friend was right to say that any tax on what we call research and development is a tax on innovation, enterprise and the way that the country is likely to go. I should have thought that the amendment was the right course to follow.

It might be helpful to read a short paragraph in a letter that I have received from Ford:

"the engines we produce at Dagenham and Bridgend have substantially increased our exports from the UK and offer the prospect of reduced emission levels and improved fuel economy."

The Minister of State should take account of this observation:

"But the payment of excise duty is imposing a substantial cost on our research and development programme in the UK. The petrochemical industry is not charged duty on fuel used in this way and certainly we are at a disadvantage compared with companies in Germany where there is a tax rebate on such uses of fuel."

Everyone knows that the motor car industry in the United Kingdom is struggling. We also know that our leading competitors are France, West Germany and elsewhere and that we must be on level terms with them. We are concerned not only with the lean-burn engine but with the use of ceramics for cylinder blocks. All these have to be experimented with, and many petroleum products have to be utilised to find whether they are suitable for the market. I should have thought that what leads to a better and more efficient engine and a more adaptable way of producing cars was what the Treasury in all its wisdom should encourage.

If my right hon. Friend fears that the fuel might be used for vehicle use on the open road, it could be dyed just as diesel is dyed, and some tracer compounds could be included in it. There are very few sites in which it would have to be organised in the United Kingdom, because it would involve only the main motor companies. Storage facilities could be agreed, and there could be a pipe feed between the storage facilities dedicated for the purpose and the few sites in question.

As my hon. Friend said, we are talking about static engine testing. It is for the motor industry, which is very competitive. Unless R and D work is done, the industry could be going into extremely heavy weather. Therefore, I support my hon. Friend's suggestion. I know that the Minister of State does not want to make many concessions on this occasion, but when the takes account of the importance of research and development to British industry, especially the motor industry, which is under considerable strain, bearing in mind that the amendment will deprive the Treasury of only £3 million a year, I hope that he will regard this as an area in which he should make a concession.

6.45 pm

Mr. Terry Davis: I am not unsympathetic to the amendment, even if it comes from what I regard as a surprising source. Nevertheless, I should like to know a little more about the cost involved, and I await the Minister's response before advising my hon. Friends how to vote.

Dr. Marek: I am also not unsympathetic to the amendment, but I wonder whether it is the right way to proceed. I am worried whether there would be sufficient control, and I am not assured that it would add anything significant to research and development. I am all for increasing the sums that companies spend on R and D, but I should have thought that the best way to do that was to provide fiscal incentives generally rather than to go for it piecemeal, as this proposal seems to do.

Mr. Hayhoe: As my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) said, the purpose of the amendment is to relieve from excise duty hydrocarbon oil —mainly it would be petrol—used in the bench testing by manufacturers of motor vehicle engines. As my hon. Friend said, this is not a new proposal. I understand that this relief or something similar to it has been sought for at least 20 years and that successive Governments have taken the view that it is inappropriate to grant it.

I was glad to note my hon. Friend's comments about the Ford motor company's research and engineering centre in his constituency. I am sure that we all welcome what is being done there to develop a lean-burn engine. Looked at in isolation, the case for giving duty relief on oil used as fuel in research and development of lean-burn motor engines especially is at first sight reasonable. The amount of revenue forgone in this very restricted area would be small as a proportion of the total yield. But if the relief was so drawn, only a few major motor manufacturers would be involved and the administrative effort would not be great.

[Mr. Hayhoe]

Those are the simple arguments in favour of the relief sought by my hon. Friend. However, his amendment is drawn more widely, and there would be a strong probability of further repercussions. The amendment goes further than relief for research and development and seeks relief also for fuel used in bench testing during the manufacture or preparation of engines. It also covers the manufacture or preparation of parts.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) asked about the cost. From what I have said he will appreciate that it is very difficult to give an accurate estimate.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why?

Mr. Hayhoe: I have just explained why. It is very difficult to judge how far the amendment would go in covering the work being done by manufacturers. At the moment the best estimate that I can give is that it would be several million pounds. The best estimate that the Customs can produce of the non-road use of petrol is in the order of £50 million to £100 million, and it could be argued that a very substantial part of that, if not covered directly by the amendment, would be somewhat on all fours with the amendment, and I am sure that the case for equity would be argued by others saying that they should also benefit from it.

There are knock-on effects and, as my hon. Friend said, there are control difficulties, though he thought that they could be overcome. I am not sure whether the control arrangements that apply to diesel oil which is used for particular sections of industry, which are relieved, will be as effective as the hon. Gentleman thinks in dealing with the wider questions of control that would arise, if the amendment were accepted.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Will the Minister give us slightly more information about his estimate of the cost? He seems extremely vague on that subject. What estimates has he received, what consultations did he have, and what representations did he receive that lead him to believe that the cost would be several million pounds?

Mr. Hayhoe: I received that advice from my advisers, who studied the terms of the amendment, which do not necessarily provide what the hon. Members who tabled the amendment wish to suggest. It is important on Report to deal with the words before us. The approach in Committee is different because we can deal more generally with the ideas behind the matter, and if the words are defective we can correct them later. My advice is that several million pounds are involved.

Mr. Skeet: My hon. Friend is not unsympathetic towards the amendment. Will he undertake to consider the matter seriously and to see whether, within his terms, he can assist us? Will he bear in mind that such assistance is provided in Germany and other Continental countries, and that something should be done to help the British motor industry?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am glad to undertake to have further consultations, and a better estimate of the cost involved, especially with a closer definition of the proposed changes, may be made.

The duty on petrol has generally been regarded by successive Administrations—I emphasise that this is not a new matter which has arisen in recent months—as one on the product itself, wherever it is used. Exceptions are made for refineries, fishing boats, and for petrol and oil when it is used as a manufacturing material and furnace fuel. The House will be aware of the reduced rates that apply for aviation gas. The exceptions are few, and successive Governments have maintained that line.

Apart from the control difficulties, which arise from possible abuse, revenue would undoubtedly be lost. I accept that my estimates are not as accurate as those which I normally give.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister did not take the amendment seriously.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall continue to ignore the hon. Gentleman's series of interventions from a sedentary position.

The relief proposed in the amendment is not as clearly defined as one would wish. In those circumstances, and following the precedent of many of my predecessors who have replied to similar debates or dealt with similar representations from the industrial interests involved, I cannot commend the change to the House. If the amendment is not withdrawn, I hope that the House will reject it.

Mr. Proctor: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for replying to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) and me. I was surprised that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) was surprised that I moved the amendment. During the last Parliament, I represented more Ford employees than any other hon. Member, and in this Parliament I represent many Ford workers, some of whom work at the Ford research and development establishment in my constituency, some work in my former constituency of Basildon, and some may work at Dagenham, but live in Billericay, Wickford or other parts of my constituency.

Mr. Terry Davis: I have respected the hon. Gentleman for his consistency in opposing subsidies, and this appears to be a subsidy to research and development.

Mr. Proctor: I am certainly opposed to subsidies in principle. As the hon. Gentleman knows, one represents one's constituents to the best of one's ability, and there is no inconsistency in that.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Proctor: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, who seems to interrupt everyone from a sedentary position, but is not prepared to make a speech. He makes only stupid interventions.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his remarks in replying to the debate. I am grateful for his undertaking to reconsider the point to see whether a more tightly defined amendment can be tabled in future. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call the next amendment, it may be appropriate to announce that I have reconsidered my provisional selection of amendments, and propose to select amendment No. 45 in the name of the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann).

Clause 5

BLENDING OF CERTAIN WINES TO CONSTITUTE PRODUCTION OF WINE

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 3, line 17, leave out clause 5.

The amendment would remove clause 5 from the Bill. I do not wish to detain the House long, because the matter was debated at length in Committee. Although I was not a member of the Committee, I read its reports, and hoped that there would be a Government amendment to deal with the problem raised by Opposition spokesmen on behalf of my constituents and Cinzano.

Amendment No. 129 dealt with the Cypriot problems, but did not cover the problem of blending for Cinzano. Cinzano resides in my constituency, and for many years has bottled all its vermouth in Telford. The company came in 1977 when the area suffered, as it still does, from high unemployment. Since then, sales of vermouth have fallen by about 20 per cent. in the United Kingdom, and this has obviously created problems for the company. With great relief, last year to save money it was able to start blending the different strengths and so maintain its bottling production in Telford. Clause 5 puts directly at risk about 50 jobs in my constituency and hundreds of jobs throughout the country. I appreciate that that may not be many, but it is important and should be considered.

Before the Budget, my noble Friend Lord Thorneycroft and I put our arguments on behalf of Cinzano to the Minister of State, who listened carefully. Clause 5 arises from a court case which was taken last year by Customs and Excise against Cinzano and which Customs and Excise lost. The question was whether blending was legal or whether it should be liable to double taxation. The House of Lords eventually ruled in favour of my constituents. It is regrettable that the Finance Bill is being used to change that decision, which has been in force for some time. In the past others engaged in blending when it was to their advantage.

In proposing the amendment, I do not blindly argue that the House should accept it to save jobs. Although that is important, sometimes there are more important matters. There are two strong arguments behind Cinzano's case. First, it is desirable to encourage bottling in the United Kingdom. It is better to use British people to bottle imports, and thus create jobs and add value to the raw product, than to import a finished product.

7 pm

Secondly, I am greatly worried about the danger that the proposal will lead to retaliation in other countries. I have in mind particularly the problems in the past in Italy where the sale of Scotch whisky has met with resistance, and has had to be dealt with at the highest level. Italy has acted honourably and has agreed to the sale of whisky in Italy without difficulty. If we introduce a piece of legislation that appears to be aimed at an Italian company, or at vermouth producers generally, Italy may try to retaliate. If that were to happen, it would be to the disadvantage of Britain.

Mr. Campbell Savours: The hon. Member is making a substantial case. He will know that many hon. Members feel strongly on the matter. Some of us intend to press the matter to a Division. Will he vote with us against the Government?

Mr. Hawksley: It would not be the first time that I voted against my own party. I certainly have no fears of voting for what I believe in. If there is a Division, the hon. Gentleman will see how I vote. It is important that the matter should be aired. If hon. Members feel that it is necessary to force it to a Division, that is up to them. It is interesting that in Committee the Opposition did not bother to push the matter to a Division.

Retaliation from foreign countries is a risk that must be considered. Cyprus, South Africa and Australia may be satisfied that, following a previous amendment, problems affecting them will not arise, but the risk that I have mentioned should be borne in mind.

I wish to save jobs in my constituency and I make no secret of it. The arguments in favour of encouraging bottling in Britain, and making sure that we do not put our exports at risk, justify the tabling of the amendment. I hope that I have persuaded the Minister that the arguments are just and that he will accept my amendment.

Mr. Fisher: I am delighted to support the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley). The burden of his argument—although he was too polite to say it—is that the clause as drafted is nonsense and is simply a response to the situation in which the Government have put themselves. As the hon. Gentleman says, as a result of the clause, 50 jobs could be lost in his constituency. As he is an hon. Gentleman and has spoken eloquently on the subject, I am sure that he will back up what he said and join us in the Division Lobby in voting for the amendment. We shall welcome him on that occasion.

The hon. Gentleman related the background to the clause to the judgment in another place in February this year but, as I am sure he is only too well aware, the clause in this year's Finance Bill arose through a piece of faulty drafting of a measure in last year's Finance Bill when the Government were trying to comply with a judgment of the European Court.

The 1984 Finance Bill widened the differential between light and higher strength wines. Cinzano and other companies which are smaller and less well known saw that that gave them an opportunity to blend higher strength wines, with between 15 and 22 per cent. alcohol, with lower strength wines with less than 15 per cent. alcohol, and thus to pay duty on the proportional strength. As I understand the position, it meant a differential for them of 20p less duty per bottle. It arose from a mistake by the Treasury in its drafting last year, but now the Government are saying that what Cinzano is doing constitutes production.

Will the Minister in his reply say whether he agrees with me that production is already defined in the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979? I hope that the Minister will confirm my reading of that Act, in which it says that production means a material change in the product through a fermentation of grapes. According to that definition, we are concerned here not with production but with something called blending. It is an old practice, well known in Britain. That is how many fortified wines are made. The

[Mr. Fisher]

House of Lords was unanimous in ruling in February that blending was legal. Is the Minister now saying that the House of Lords was wrong in defining blending as legal, and that it was wrong in confirming the definition of production contained in the 1979 Act?

The truth is that the 1984 Finance Bill got things wrong and created a situation of which Cinzano has taken advantage. The Government are supposed to be in favour of business initiative but, when they see a company seizing an area of the market in which it can make money and provide jobs and opportunities and income in Britain, they immediately try to close what they consider to be a loophole.

I ask the Government to reconsider their view. They made a mistake last year and they are trying to cover it up this year, but the measure, as it stands, will lead to double taxation. As the hon. Member for The Wrekin has said, it will lead to job losses. It will also be a false economy, because the Treasury is likely to be the loser.

Mr. Freeman: Will the hon. Gentleman explain to the House in a little more detail how double taxation will apply if the company does not blend the product in future?

Mr. Fisher: I understand that the company wants to blend the product and, if it does so, it will suffer double taxation on the importation of the wine and on the blended product that it produces. That is manifestly unfair, and I do not think that even the Government can have intended that result. The hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) shakes his head, but I understand that to be the position. The hon. Gentleman, who was a member of the Standing Committee, will recall that the Minister appeared to give some rather cautious and circuitous reassurances about setting up bonding arrangements, but it is my understanding that the Customs and Excise would not allow small companies to have those bonding arrangements, which are seen as a way round double taxation.

I believe that the Government made fools of themselves in their drafting of the Finance Bill last year. They will not concede that they made a mistake, and in addition they are challenging the ruling in the other place. On both counts we shall oppose them, and I hope that the hon. Member for The Wrekin will join us in the Division Lobby.

Mr. Freeman: I was not intending to speak in the debate, but I should like to declare an interest as a director of Martini and Rossi Ltd., which has two-thirds of the vermouth market in branded products in the United Kingdom. Therefore, I am familiar with the problem which has been brought to the attention of the House.

It might be of assistance to the House to know how the industry has reacted to the problems that my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) has so clearly portrayed. It is important to appreciate that the ending of blending has merely put the industry back to the position in which it was before initiatives were taken by my own company—and certainly Cinzano and other companies—to blend for the purpose of mitigating the effects of the comparatively higher rates of excise duty that were introduced—with the consequential VAT rates—in the Budget last year. As a result of this year's Budget, all that happened is that we in the industry have gone back to the burden of excise and VAT duties which applied before blending.

Mr. Fisher: I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman, with his expert knowledge of the industry, could clarify one matter. Is it not the case that the duty arrangements have now been altered? They were altered by the 1984 legislation under which duty on a blended wine was payable at the higher rate rather than at the average and mixed rate. That loophole has created these circumstances, and if the so-called loophole is closed there will be job losses. It is that point which has opened up the whole area of change.

Mr. Freeman: All that has happened is that we have gone back to the situation which existed before, whereby the duty was charged on the blended product as opposed to the constituent parts of the product which was blended. If the duty was charged on the constituent parts, the duty was lower than that charged on the blended product. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right.

My point is a simple one. The hon. Gentleman talks about employment prospects in the industry. That is a perfectly fair point to make, but it is nothing to do with blending. The problems of the industry, to the extent that there are problems, existed before blending because blending has taken place, as the hon. Gentleman knows, for the last nine months only. Therefore, to connect the argument of job losses with blending and with the ending of blending is a little misleading. If there are problems in the industry because of changing tastes, competitive pressures and comparatively high rates of duty in comparison with the duty on still wine—and, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State knows, all those points have been represented to him in the past, and doubtless will continue to be represented to him—I do not think that there is any validity in the argument which relates the employment problems and prospects of the industry specifically to the episode of blending. It is more relevant to connect the problem of employment prospects and the prosperity of the industry to the situation that prevailed hitherto.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I still do not follow the point that the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) makes. On the amendment — let us not call it a wrecking amendment, but a Wrekin amendment — the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) said quite clearly that a lower duty was payable on the component parts of the blended product than that payable on the blended product. This gave an incentive to blend it in this country, and thus created jobs. The argument is that 50 jobs have been created in The Wrekin which the Government now seek to wreck. In the case of Martini, a larger number of jobs—possibly 200, but I am not sure, because Martini has a bigger share of the market — have also been created by Martini in the process of blending.

Mr. Freeman: I think that it would be fair to say that no new jobs have been created as a result of blending, and in my company no jobs will be lost by the ending of blending. The episode has had a totally neutral effect on employment prospects and employment in my company.

7.15 pm

Mr. Mitchell: In that case, is Martini blending abroad? The explicit evidence of Cinzano is that it is blending in this country and that, unless the amendment is carried, 50 jobs will be lost. We have assumed that Martini is behaving with similarly patriotic motives, with the desire to encourage jobs in the country, and that it, too, will lose jobs unless the amendment is carried. If that assumption is wrong, the argument concentrates on Cinzano, which, of the two companies, is perhaps behaving more honourably.

I hope that the hon. Member for The Wrekin will push the amendment to a Division because it is an important issue. It is well worth taking a stand against the Government. I was hoping that the Minister of State would give us the "Mr. Nice Guy" routine, of which he is the representative in the Treasury, and accept the amendment, realising that the Government have erred. The Government have erred because they are behaving with clear and simple vindictiveness. Indeed, I speak in the debate to criticise the way in which the Government are acting.

The Government have been defeated. They lost in the House of Lords where their arguments were not acceptable. Having lost at the game, they are now changing the rules of the game to get more money out of firms. In so doing, they are destroying jobs—Cinzano jobs, if not Martini jobs. On the evidence that Cinzano has provided, the Government are certainly destroying jobs. While the Government, albeit accidentally, have created 50 jobs in Cinzano as a result of blending, out of vindictiveness, to get their own back for having been defeated in the House of Lords, they are destroying those jobs, so it is worth making a stand on the issue.

The Government argue that the blending was simply a tax loophole because it was cheaper to pay duties separately on low and high strength wines which were then blended rather than to pay duty on an already blended, imported vermouth. In fact, blending has been practised regularly over the years. It is a traditional process. The great gain of the decision was that the blending was being done in this country.

The House of Lords in its unanimous ruling in February this year found that blending is legal, does not constitute production and, therefore, should not be double taxed. It is that decision that the Government are trying to reverse. The Government claim that, because of the practice of blending, they have lost £3 million from Cinzano and £10 million all told. However, in attempting to recoup the money they have lost, the Government are penalising themselves. The loss of jobs implied in the loss of blending in the country will lead to people becoming unemployed and to a loss in PAYE and national insurance contributions. This almost certainly will knock off something like £1·4 million in costs from the £3 million that the Government will gain in taxation. The Government are cutting off their own nose to spite their face in a fit of petty vindictiveness because they were defeated in the House of Lords. It is as simple as that.

Dr. Marek: It is amazing that in the debates on the Finance Bill one Conservative Member after another is pleading for more money to be given by the Treasury in the form of a tax cut or as extra expenditure for some constituency enterprise. In the past hour, we have heard the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) making a case for extra money to be provided for research and development in engines in his constituency, and the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) stating that a special situation exists in his constituency for which extra money should be provided by way of a tax concession to preserve jobs in the constituency.

Mr. Hawksley: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that I am not asking for extra money, only that last year's status quo should continue?

Dr. Marek: There was a status quo situation last year but not the year before. Conservative Members are very good at looking after their constituency interests. Nevertheless, during the past two years they have voted with the right hon. Lady the Prime Minister against all sorts of public expenditure. No matter what kind of public expenditure it was, it was bad, until last week when the Chancellor suddenly said that perhaps public expenditure was good and that it should be increased.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): As the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) will vote with us against the Government, is this not the wrong time to chastise him?

Dr. Marek: I am suitably admonished and will not pursue that line of argument. Last year Cinzano took advantage of the loophole. If there is a tax loophole it should be closed, but this one is slightly different. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that earlier this year the House of Lords unanimously concluded that blending was not production and that it would be more acceptable if duty was levied on wine at the port of entry; there would be fiscal neutrality. After wine had been imported and duty paid it could be mixed or diluted without the need for further checks by Customs and Excise.

I understand the Government's point of view. They feel that they have been "done" and that legislation has exposed this loophole, as a result of which they have lost revenue. They want to get it back, but I ask the Minister of State, Treasury to think carefully about the matter. If a substantal amount of revenue has been lost something must be done, but if we return to the 1983 position 50 jobs will be lost in Telford. Could not the Government have discussions with Cinzano and find out how small a concession needs to be made for Cinzano profitably to keep open its blending plant in Telford?

Ever since we joined the European Community we have heard about jobs being exported to France, Italy and other countries. For once the position has been reversed. Jobs have come, albeit in an unusual way, to this country and we should do everything that we can to try to keep them here. I hope that the Minister has had discussions with Cinzano. I am sure that the company would not say that the plant will be closed unless the 1984 position is retained; it would be exceedingly silly of Cinzano to adopt that attitude. The concession could be tightened up. Most of the revenue would then be recouped, but a sufficiently significant concession could be made to enable Cinzano to keep open its blending plant in this country. With 4 million people unemployed we must change direction. Manufacturing has not recovered; it is still below the level at which it stood in 1979. The Opposition believe it is most important that these jobs should be retained, and it would not cost very much to keep them here. If the Minister of State has the will, I am sure that he will find the way.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: First, may I refer to what was said by Conservative Members about my sedentary interventions. For some inexplicable reason the Minister of State suddenly took his seat when, it appeared to me, he saw that hon. Members wished to intervene during his speech. Only the Minister knows why he did that.

[Mr. Campbell-Savours]

Since we are debating a subject that is connected with sherry, perhaps I may put to him a question that I had intended to ask during his speech. During his discussions with representatives of the Cyprus Government, were employment questions raised by them? I am informed that they were. Was his judgment on that matter influenced by the possible loss of jobs in Cyprus, in the event of the Government failing to make the necessary changes?

Could it be that the 150 jobs that are at risk at the CWS blending plant at Irlam near Manchester and the thousands of jobs that will be lost in Cyprus affected the Minister's decision? If so, it means that employment implications are on the agenda. If they are on the agenda, the letter that was written by Cinzano to me and to other hon. Members is relevant to our debate. Mr. Farrar, as the managing director of Cinzano, must know his business. I am sure he objects to Government Ministers telling him his business, as may have happened this evening. He said:

"As you know, we are extremely concerned about this clause which has made it uneconomic for us to continue blending vermouth in the UK. As a consequence our Telford blending plant is likely to close with the loss of 50 permanent jobs and others in ancillary industries."

Mr. Hayhoe indicated dissent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: From a sedentary position, the Minister is shaking his head. He complained about my interventions from a sedentary position, but mine were oral. Perhaps the Minister is concentrating on another issue. If so, he should address himself to this issue. Mr. Farrar says that 50 jobs are likely to be lost. That should be a crucial consideration, particularly if it influences the Minister's judgment about Cyprus sherry. Mr. Farrar continued:

"You will not be alone on this issue. We have had support from all sides of the House and there was a fairly lengthy debate on the subject during the Committee stage when I am afraid the Minister stonewalled."

Of the 640 or so hon. Members of this House, only one Conservative Member has said that he supports the Opposition, yet he has been unwilling to give an undertaking that he will vote with us tonight. Where are the hon. Members who support the Opposition? Have they been silenced by the Whips? Have the Whips issued an instruction to Conservative Back Benchers not to speak on this issue and embarrass the Government because of the job implications?

Mr. Fisher: My hon. Friend will remember that in Committee we debated this clause for more than an hour and a quarter. During that time not a single Conservative member of the Committee sought to catch the Chairman's eye and speak. I do not know, therefore, why my hon. Friend is so surprised that Government Back Benchers are reluctant to speak tonight. We welcome the support of the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) and are delighted that he will be voting with us on behalf of his constituents. I do not know where Mr. Farrar got the idea that he has support from the Tory Back Benches, because it was certainly not apparent in Committee.

7.30 pm

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Mr. Farrar met Conservative Members. He asked for their support and they undertook that they would give it. In the light of that, Mr. Farrar wrote to me and some of my hon. Friends. I wish to know why those Conservative Members have been prevented from expressing their support in the Chamber. In reference to the effect of the clause on 50 jobs, Mr. Farrar said:

"it affects real people, real jobs"——

Mr. John Major (A Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): Try to keep a straight face.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The assistant Patronage Secretary suggests that I smiled. He knows the truth about why those Conservative Members have failed——

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Has it occurred to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that the assistant Patronage Secretary might be a consumer of these drinks?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Perhaps that accounts for the smile of the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major). Mr. Farrar said:

"it affects real people, real jobs and the interests of industry as well as the consumer. We have fought long and hard—and successfully—through the Courts for the right to continue blending without being subject to punitive taxation. Now the Government wants to overrule the decision of the Courts. Please help us to dissuade them from this action."

We are trying our hardest to persuade the Government against the course that they currently seem bent upon. We seek the support of Conservative Members.

From a constitutional point of view, there is another matter of interest to the House. I am sure that it will appeal to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), because he specialises in European matters. It has been suggested that the Government exercise positive discrimination against European products. As Britain is a member of the European Community, there is much concern about the matter. Some Members of the European Parliament have tabled questions about it. It is hard to understand why the Minister is unwilling to cede the point while those questions remain unanswered. If it could be proved that there were some form of positive discrimination against European products, the Government might wish to reconsider the matter. Even at this late stage, I ask them to take that into account.

According to Mr. Roth's "Parliamentary Profiles" the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) is sensitive to constituency issues. On one occasion, he was so sensitive that he warned the Patronage Secretary and his assistants that his seat would be at risk if he backed entry for Asian fiances. For many hon. Members, that may be an obscure issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not stray too far from the amendment.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am coming straight back into order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for The Wrekin expressed his view on that occasion and this is a far more sensitive issue for the people of his constituency. The Labour party in The Wrekin is expressing considerable anxiety about the matter and it hopes that the hon. Member will feel strongly enough to vote against the Government.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Unusually, I do not wish to go all round The Wrekin. However, I congratulate the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) on his courageous stand.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What courageous stand?

Mr. Golding: I assume that the vote will follow the voice. I know that when the hon. Member for The Wrekin votes, he will be putting his career at stake and his chances of promotion at risk.

Dr. Marek: Non-existent chances.

Mr. Golding: No. My hon. Friends are unusually uncharitable today. The hon. Member for The Wrekin is taking a correct and courageous stand against the Government and he may suffer in consequence. I have already seen sinister individuals trying to talk him out of pressing his amendment. The hon. Gentleman will not be alone in the Division Lobby. He should stick to his amendment. We shall vote with him and give him and his constituents the support that they deserve. We could feel malicious towards the hon. Gentleman because he defeated a first-class Labour candidate at the general election. But we are forgiving and we will stand with the people of The Wrekin in support of their hon. Member who has moved the amendment in their interests.

Some of my hon. Friends are slightly cynical about the intentions of the hon. Member for The Wrekin. I do not share that cynicism. I expect the hon. Gentleman to vote on the amendment, because the issue is so serious to his constituents. The Wrekin has one of the highest unemployment rates in the west midlands.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is 21·7 per cent. — 13,000 people.

7.45 pm

Mr. Golding: No doubt my hon. Friend will tell me any minute now how many of those people are male, how many are female and how many are young. I know that the youth employment rate in The Wrekin is one of the highest in the country. That is why the hon. Member for The Wrekin has been driven to put his future and his promotion prospects at risk. He is challenging not only the Minister of State, Treasury, but the assistant Patronage Secretary.

Why have the Government brought in the assistant Patronage Secretary? He is a reminder of what might happen to the hon. Member for The Wrekin if he votes in the interests of his constituents against the Government's dirty deed. I am shocked that the Government have not brought in the Patronage Secretary himself. His absence is almost a slight on the hon. Member for The Wrekin. The hon. Member for The Wrekin must go into the Division Lobby. Indeed, he must lead the way into the Lobby.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will relate his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Golding: I am saying that I think that the amendment is of first-class importance and——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am talking about the terms of the amendment.

Mr. Golding: The terms are at the heart of the matter for the constituents of The Wrekin.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Fifty jobs.

Mr. Golding: As my hon. Friend says, we are talking about 50 jobs. It is a matter of good faith. The Government are trying, through legislation, to put jobs at risk. That is the issue tonight.

The House of Lords clearly said "Keep the jobs." What a situation. The House of Lords say that we should not have penal legislation to cripple production. The Law Lords say "Keep the jobs" but Ministers in the Commons say, "Keep the revenue and do not bother about the jobs." That is nonsense.

Has the Treasury calculated how much revenue it will collect. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] Some hon. Members are taking your role, Mr. Deputy Speaker. What calculations have been made about the cost of the loss of the jobs compared with the additional revenue?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The cost is £1·4 million.

Mr. Golding: I should prefer the Minister to tell me the cost. What is the cost of the jobs? We are talking not about hypothetical jobs but real jobs. Cinzano has said real people and real jobs are involved. It should be possible for the Treasury to make calculations about the cost to the state of the 50 lost jobs. People who are unemployed are a cost on the state.

We want to know the real cost to the state of the unemployment that will be caused compared with the receipts. After that calculation has been made we shall still want to know the cost to the individual of unemployment. What will the social cost be?

The other day I gave a lad from The Wrekin a lift in my car. He had become a market trader in north Wales. He could not get work in Telford because there is no possibility of work there, so he became an itinerant. He described what was happening. It is tragic. There is no work for young people.

Dr. Marek: The Telford area has been given some status in that it has been given some regional development aid recently. That means that the Government recognise the unemployment difficulties in that area. We are talking not only about 50 jobs but about other jobs in ancillary industries. The loss of 50 jobs might not sound very important but it is not insignificant to the 50 who lose their jobs. The loss of those jobs will have knock-on effects, so the problem is more serious than the Government would have us believe.

Mr. Golding: I think that the Government gave assistance to The Wrekin just to spite us in north Staffordshire. The Government might have taken into consideration the marginality of The Wrekin constituency but not the unemployment level there. Granting assisted area status has nothing to do with the Government's sensitivity to unemployment but more to do with their sensitivity to the constituency's marginal status in election terms and the certainty that the hon. Member for The Wrekin will lose his seat at the next election.

It is disturbing that the Government are prepared to go to the length of overturning a House of Lords decision. That is almost incredible. The House of Lords took a decision but the Government, in their determination to make matters worse in the west midlands, have decided to hit Telford even harder. That is intolerable.

My hon. Friends have concentrated on one aspect— unemployment. That is the most important aspect but they have not addressed themselves to the discrimination against those who drink blended vermouth. I wonder why the Government have chosen to impose a further tax on that alcohol. Blended vermouth is a relatively mild drink, which is less intoxicating than many others. Why has the Treasury chosen to discriminate against people who drink blended vermouth? What is the justification for overturning the decision by the House of Lords?

[Mr. Golding]

[Interruption.] It seems that the Whips now want to prolong the debate. The Whips and the Whips' dummies are trying to intervene and I find it difficult to reply to monosyllabic Members on the Front Bench. If they want to ask a question, let them do so.

Treasury Ministers should not sit on their Benches like dummies in Burton's shop window only opening their mouths to utter a single, useless word. The Government must give way to the enormous pressure coming from their own Back Benches. When Cinzano wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), it told him that it expected enormous pressure to come from the Conservative Back Benches. That pressure has not manifested itself in speeches, but I assume that those Conservative Members who promised the company that they would speak on its behalf——

Mr. Fisher: They had free meals.

Mr. Golding: My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central forgets himself.

I assume that those Conservative Members who promised to support Cinzano have written to the Minister protesting about the decision. Will the Minister tell us how many Conservative Members, after being wined and dined by Cinzano, have written to him to protest about this tax and in support of the amendment? What undertaking has the Minister given to those Conservative Members?

My hon. Friends are cynical because they assume that those Conservative Back Benchers have not spoken in support of Cinzano because they were not sincere when they gave their undertaking. Of course that may not be so. Those Conservative Members may have discussed the amendment with the Minister and told him that they support it. The Minister may have given them some secret undertaking, which has led them to be absent tonight, thinking it unnecessary to give visible and vocal support in the Chamber. The Minister may have told them that he would do what the company wants. Will the Minister tell us what representations he has received and what replies he has given? If he remains seated, some of us will believe that the company was wrong when it said that there would be Conservative support for my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central on this issue.

Unless the Minister can assure us that these missing Conservative Members have spoken or written to him and discussed this matter with him, we will think that, with the honourable exception of the hon. Member for The Wrekin, who will lead us into the Division Lobby tonight, we shall be alone. There will be only one Tory Member in the Division Lobby surrounded by the supporters of Cinzano, who are the Labour Members present. I am waiting to hear what the Minister will say.

I have just received a note telling me that I am requested to shine my pants. I do not know whether that is a parliamentary note, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) for his advice. I shall conclude and shine my pants by saying that the Opposition are waiting for the leadership of the hon. Member for The Wrekin and we hope that he will not fail us or his constituents tonight.

Mr. Terry Davis: As the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) said at the outset of his speech, I have taken a particular interest in this issue for several reasons. In moving the amendment, the hon. Gentleman was rather kind to the Government in his summary of the reasons for the problem. He fairly said that the problem began with a decline in sales, but I do not believe that that decline — for which he gave no reason — can be attributed entirely to a change in taste, as was suggested by the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman).

There are several reasons. The decline in sales of vermouth began in 1980 with a significant increase in the duty on vermouth. In that year the increase was 30 per cent., and at that point the fall in sales began. That is not surprising. In the past five years total sales of vermouth have declined by 20 per cent. Last year there was a very steep increase in the tax on vermouth. It was a small amount in absolute terms, because it was only 8 per cent., but it was a big increase in relative terms because the duty on wine was reduced by 20 per cent. at the same time. Therefore, the relative duties on vermouth and wine were substantially changed to the disadvantage of vermouth.

In the last five years, the duty on vermouth has risen by 80 per cent. whereas the duty on wine has risen by only 20 per cent. It is therefore not surprising that during those five years there has been such a substantial fall in the sale of vermouth, and that decline in the total market has caused the problem for Cinzano.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin said that it was a relief for Cinzano to start blending last year, but I should remind him that the return to blending was occasioned by the big relative increase in the duty on vermouth. That was not designed to save sales; it was a step to reduce the duty and to improve sales by affecting the retail price of vermouth. Although the duty has risen significantly in the last five years, the retail price of vermouth has risen by much less. Consequently, the increase in duty has tended to be absorbed by Cinzano.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) said that the Government made a fool of themselves last year. He is absolutely right, because at the same time as there was a big increase in the duty on vermouth there were changes in the categories of wine and fortified wine. The Government made particular fools of themselves in that context because they created a loophole which the makers of Cinzano were right to use to their advantage in order to alleviate the problem caused by the increase in duty.

The Government then tried to cover up their mistake by going to court. In fact, they took the case all the way to the House of Lords on the argument that if blending took place in this country it was a type of production and, therefore, a tax should be paid on top of the tax that was paid on imported wines. In other words, there would be double taxation. That is what the Government tried to achieve by legal proceedings.

I disagree with my hon. Friends in their analysis because I believe that the hon. Member for Kettering is right to suggest that bonding is the answer to the problem of double taxation. The Minister made the point in Committee—I have examined it carefully, and I think that he is correct — that bonding is the answer for Cinzano. There is a level at which an importer must import wine in order to be given the opportunity to import into bond and to pay tax as the wine leaves bond. I entirely accept that Cinzano is above that level and, therefore, that bonding could be described as an answer.

It is not simply a problem of double taxation. Even if Cinzano uses bonding and blends in bond—so that the company pays the tax only once, as the wine leaves the bond—it still faces the overall increase in duty of nearly 8 per cent. in five years, and a decline in sales. That increase in duty applies if the wine has been blended in bond. The bonding arrangement simply puts Cinzano back to where it was a year ago, when it began to take advantage of the loophole.

8 pm

I have described it as a loophole, but let me make it clear that I am not criticising the management of Cinzano. On the contrary, it deserves praise for showing flair in spotting an opportunity to alleviate difficulties created for the company by the Government's increase in the total duty on vermouth. Clearly, sharper people work for Cinzano than work for the Customs and Excise. Indeed, a learned judge said that the Government needed not a lawyer but an arithmetician.

There are some people with extremely sharp pencils working for Cinzano, and it is to the credit of the company that it took the opportunity to save jobs at Telford. It is not true to say that blending created those jobs at Telford. There was already a bottling plant there. Those jobs were jeopardised by the decline in sales, a decline that was the result of the Government's increase in the duty on vermouth. The management of Cinzano saw an opportunity to use blending to save jobs, and I gather that there are 50 full-time jobs at the Telford plant.

What are the Government willing to do about those jobs at Telford, if they intend to insist on clause 5? I appreciate the Government's argument on the issue and I have some sympathy with it. However, that does not get them off the hook from the point of view of those jobs at Telford.

Yesterday we were told by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) to devote more time in our debates to the problems of unemployment. That is precisely what we are doing tonight, although that hon. Gentleman is not in his place. The Government have a responsibility to explain what steps they will take to save those jobs at Telford if they insist on blocking the so-called loophole that has been used by Cinzano in the last 12 months.

We can look a stage further and ask what the Government propose to do to create more jobs in blending. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) referred to the number of jobs that have been exported from Britain. As a result of the introduction of blending, jobs have been imported into Britain. To the extent that vermouth is sold in this country, it will be blended either in Italy or here. In the last 12 months, some jobs have been saved in Britain by Cinzano. That has represented, in effect, the importation of jobs. That raises interesting opportunities. What other new jobs can be provided in the blending of other drinks by other companies? I do not know whether Martini blends vermouth. Either way, what can be done to encourage that and other companies to create such jobs here?

I was impressed by the arguments adduced by the Minister of State in Committee about the cost of opposing clause 5. He said that if we did not approve the provision, the Revenue stood to lose £10 million. About £3 million of that would be derived by Cinzano. I accept that it is an expensive way of saving jobs to spend £60,000 per job. Indeed, using the £10 million, it would work out at £200,000 per job. I appreciate, therefore, why the Minister regards that as an expensive procedure.

It was not clear from what the Minister said in Committee whether he was talking about the effect of the current blending operations in this country or was referring to potential blending operations. Is that £10 million the amount that has been lost in the last year, and will be lost to the Revenue in the coming year if we do not approve the clause, as a result of blending operations already located in Britain? Or is it the Government's estimate of the money that would be lost to the Revenue if there was an increase in the amount of blending done here and, therefore, an increase in the number of blending jobs that would thereby be created?

We should know the figures because if we are being told of possible lost revenue in respect of only 50 jobs, we need to know whether the Government are adding to the cost money that would create jobs elsewhere in the United Kingdom. We are satisfied, whatever the figures, that 50 jobs are at risk in Telford new town. We must be told what the Government propose to do to save those jobs if clause 5 is approved.

The Government may be wondering whether my hon. Friends and I intend to vote against clause 5. The hon. Member for The Wrekin lost my sympathy when he said that the Opposition did not vote against it in Committee. He will see at column 103 of the Committee proceedings that the Minister assured us that he would examine the points that we had made, with particular reference to Cyprus sherry.

I am not suggesting that the Minister has not fulfilled every assurance that he gave in Committee. It would have been wrong for the Opposition to have voted against clause 5 at that stage when the Minister had given fulsome and ready assurances not only to consider the points that we had made but to meet a deputation led by Opposition Members. That is why we did not press the point to a vote in Committee.

Not having been a member of the Committee, the hon. Member for The Wrekin may not have been aware of everything that was said at that stage, and he could not have been aware of the flavour of what was said. It would have been discourteous and ungenerous of us to have voted against the Government on this issue then, particularly as we now see that the Minister of State's assurances have been fully fulfilled, for example, in relation to the previous amendment dealing with Cyprus sherry.

We are now concentrating on the issue of vermouth, the jobs at risk at Cinzano and jobs which may be at risk in other companies. We are also concerned with jobs that could be created if only we imported blending jobs into Britain, instead of leaving them in other countries in the Common Market. I await the Minister's explanation before advising my hon. Friends on how to vote on the amendment.

Mr. Hayhoe: This has been a curious debate, since it has taken place by courtesy of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley). Those outside the House who are not familiar with our procedures may have thought that Opposition Members, who have largely spoken in the debate, were so concerned over the matter that they were determined to have the debate on the motion that clause 5 stand part of the Bill.

That is not the case because the debate is being held wholly by courtesy of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin. If he had withdrawn his amendment last night, there would have been no possibility of Opposition

[Mr. Hayhoe]

Members having this debate. Normally in these circumstances, if hon. Members are determined to make their point of view heard, they sign amendments so that they cannot be withdrawn. Either Opposition Members were not sufficiently wise to follow the normal parliamentary practice and sign my hon. Friend's amendment, or they were prepared to leave the decision on whether there should be a debate, first to Mr. Speaker, to see whether he would select the amendment, and then to my hon. Friend——

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Hayhoe: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's emotion at having been caught out on the procedural inadequacies of his and his hon. Friend's actions.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister not aware that he casts a slur on his hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley)? His hon. Friend, as an honourable Gentleman, would never have withdrawn from the Notice Paper an amendment that was crucial to his constituents. We placed our faith, and were right to do so, in his hon. Friend. We are supposed to be honourable Gentlemen. The Minister should apologise to his hon. Friend.

Mr. Hayhoe: I think that my hon. Friend will be able to use what has just been said in campaigning in his constituency. I do not think that I have heard such an open-ended compliment or endorsement of a Member of Parliament by Opposition Members for a long time. Although I know that my hon. Friend will have no difficulty in defeating any candidate who may be put up by the Labour party, that full and forthright endorsement of his position will be noted by him, and he will take advantage of it.

I reiterate the point that the debate and all the speeches that we have heard from Labour Members are wholly by courtesy of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin. I hope that those who study debates in the House and are concerned with the way in which we deal with the important matter of excise duty will read with care all that has been said on this occasion. That will be to their advantage, and I hope that they will draw interesting conclusions from what has been said.

Most of the comments that have been made have concentrated on the issue of jobs, particularly the 50 jobs at the bottling plant in Telford. Some hon. Members who participated in the debate do not appreciate that, before the Budget changes of 1984, Cinzano was imported in bulk and bottled in this country. The blending was the bonus that flowed from the changes made in 1984. Those changes allowed producers of blended products, if those products were blended from two different levels of alcohol in the liquor, to pay less duty than would be paid in respect of the final product if it had been imported or manufactured in accordance with the law as it then stood. As has been said, that matter was taken to the courts, and the House of Lords, in its judicial capacity, ruled that the Customs and Excise view was incorrect and, as a result, the blending taking place was perfectly legal and proper.

Mr. Fisher rose——

Mr. Hayhoe: Let me deal with points that the hon. Gentleman made in his speech. I noted with interest the deference that he paid to the House of Lords and the great unwillingness of Opposition Members even to contemplate overturning a judicial decision by the House of Lords. I am a more robust democrat and a more robust believer in the House of Commons. I believe that in the House of Commons we are perfectly justified in looking at the state of the law that has been determined by the House of Lords—no higher body could so determine it—and deciding that, if we do not like that provision of the law, we can bring to Parliament proposals for change. That is the democratic method, and it is what we are doing in clause 5.

I am astonished that Opposition Members should seek to elevate the decisions of the House of Lords into a constitutional doctrine and that their respect and support for the House of Lords are so intense that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) should criticise me and other members of the Government for coming forward——

Mr. Fisher: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayhoe: I have listened to a long debate from Opposition Members, and I am wholly entitled to reply to the points that were made.

The 50 jobs at Telford were crucial to the issue. During the debate in Committee the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) properly referred not only to those 50 jobs at Telford but to the 150 jobs at Irlam involved in bottling and blending Cyprus sherry. It was the hon. Member for Hodge Hill who reasonably and courteously congratulated me only a short time ago on having brought forward amendments that make the blending of Cyprus sherry unnecessary. Therefore, if the 150 jobs at Irlam are involved purely in blending, they may well be at risk.

Mr. Terry Davis: There may be some misunderstanding between us. I have checked this point. There would not be any loss of jobs at Irlam as a result of amendment No. 129.

8.15 pm

Mr. Hayhoe: In other words, the removal of the need to blend at Irlam is not the determinant; and it would not be with regard to Cinzano, either. I had discussions with representatives of Cinzano, who came to see me before the Budget. I asked the specific question: could the jobs be guaranteed at Telford if the House of Lords judgment—the discussion took place even before we knew that judgment—went against the company and in favour of Customs and Excise? Alternatively, I asked, what would happen if we changed the law? I was not given a categorical assurance about that.

Mr. Davis: The Minister of State will accept my assurance that I checked with both companies and, just as I have been assured that the 150 jobs are not in jeopardy at Irlam as a result of amendment No. 129, I have also been assured that the 50 jobs at Telford are very much in jeopardy as a result of clause 5. I do not make the point in any partisan sense. I believe that those are the facts.

Mr. Hayhoe: Those are representations that have been made to the hon. Gentleman. I note what he said.

It is absurd to say that we should maintain a loophole in the excise duty provisions to allow that blending to take place, as that would create an unfairness, since the blended product would have a lower rate of duty than exactly the same product that had been blended outside the country or manufactured at the same level of alcohol outside the country. I do not believe that that method of job creation or protection would stand up to intensive survey. As has been admitted, the actual cost of those jobs would be considerable.

There could also be the adverse knock-on effects on others involved in the drinks business, who would be hurt by the unfairness and inequity of letting that "loophole" continue—I use the word that was used by Opposition Members. All that I have heard in the debate convinces me of the wisdom of the Government's proposal to maintain clause 5 in the Bill. I hope that the House will so maintain it.

Mr. Hawksley: I thank the Minister of State for his reply to the debate. We have had a good debate, which has been lively and longer than many of us had thought.

Fifty jobs in my constituency are important. I am glad that we have had an opportunity to discuss them. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) talked about the assisted area status aid that had come to Telford, which might help us to create more jobs there. He could have mentioned many other things that the Government have done to help Telford. We have had the new hospital and motorway, the enterprise zone and urban aid grants, which should create thousands of jobs. However, I still believe that, in spite of the thousands of jobs that the Government are creating there, those 50 jobs are very important. I do not ask—not that the Opposition would agree anyway—for leave to withdraw the amendment. I leave it to the House to decide how to deal with it. If hon. Members wish to support it, they know what to do.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 65, Noes 188.

Division No. 269] [8.19 pm

AYES

Abse, Leo
Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Archer, Rt Hon Peter
Ashdown, Paddy
Barron, Kevin
Beith, A. J.
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Anthony
Boyes, Roland
Brown, R. (N'c'tle-u-Tyne N)
Bruce, Malcolm
Buchan, Norman
Callaghan, Rt Hon J.
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cohen, Harry
Cowans, Harry
Craigen, J. M.
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Dewar, Donald
Dixon, Donald
Dormand, Jack
Duffy, A. E. P.
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs G.
Eastham, Ken
Fatchett, Derek
Fisher, Mark
Forrester, John
Golding, John
Gould, Bryan
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hawksley, Warren
Haynes, Frank
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Johnston, Sir Russell
Kennedy, Charles
Kirkwood, Archy
Leighton, Ronald
Livsey, Richard
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
Marshall, David (Shettleston)
Maxton, John
Meadowcroft, Michael
Owen, Rt Hon Dr David
Parry, Robert
Pavitt, Laurie
Pendry, Tom
Penhaligon, David
Randall, Stuart
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Sheerman, Barry
Skinner, Dennis
Steel, Rt Hon David
Strang, Gavin
Thompson, J. (Wansbeck)
Wainwright, R.
Wilson, Gordon
Wrigglesworth, Ian

Tellers for the Ayes
Dr. John Marek and
Mr. Austin Mitchell.

NOES

Adley, Robert
Alexander, Richard
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Batiste, Spencer
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Benyon, William
Bevan, David Gilroy
Body, Richard
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Braine, Rt Hon Sir Bernard
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Browne, John
Bruinvels, Peter
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Carttiss, Michael
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Cranborne, Viscount
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Evennett, David
Fairbairn, Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Fletcher, Alexander
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Gale, Roger
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Gardner, Sir Edward (Fylde)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Glyn, Dr Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gower, Sir Raymond
Grant, Sir Anthony
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Ground, Patrick
Gummer, John Selwyn
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hanley, Jeremy
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holt, Richard
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunt, John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Robert (W Herts)
Joseph, Rt Hon Sir Keith
King, Roger (B'ham N'field)
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Edgbaston)
Knox, David
Lang, Ian
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lord, Michael
McCurley, Mrs Anna
MacGregor, John
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
Major, John
Mates, Michael
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Dr Brian
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Moore, John
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Norris, Steven
Osborn, Sir John
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Parris, Matthew
Pattie, Geoffrey
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Porter, Barry
Powley, John
Proctor, K. Harvey
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rowe, Andrew
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Silvester, Fred
Sims, Roger
Skeet, T. H. H.
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speed, Keith
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (W Dorset)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Stern, Michael

Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stevens, Martin (Fulham)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Stradling Thomas, J.
Sumberg, David
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Waldegrave, Hon William
Walden, George
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Watson, John
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Whitney, Raymond
Wilkinson, John
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Archie Hamilton and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

Schedule 3

AMENDMENTS OF ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR DUTIES ACT 1979

Amendment made: No. 58, in page 106, line 21, leave out 'be omitted' and insert

'cease to have effect on the coming into operation of regulations under section 71A of the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979.'. —[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 13

TAX EVASION: CONDUCT INVOLVING DISHONESTY

8.30 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I beg to move amendment No. 141, in page 9, line 33, leave out from 'conduct' to end of line 34 and insert 'is dishonest'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): It will be convenient also to take Government amendment No. 3.

Mr. Kirkwood: The amendment would result in clause 13 reading:

"(1) In any case where,—

(a) for the purpose of evading tax, a person does any act or omits to take any action, and

(b) his conduct is dishonest

he shall be liable, subject to subsections (4) and (5) below, to a penalty equal to the amount of tax evaded or, as the case may be, sought to be evaded, by his conduct."

As will be clear to those hon. Members who served on the Committee, clause 13 introduces a general anti-dishonesty offence which is punishable by a civil penalty equal to the tax evaded, although that can be reduced by half at the discretion of the Customs and Excise if the taxpayer co-operates. To commit the new civil offence of tax evasion, the taxpayer's conduct must be shown to involve an element of dishonesty as clause 13(1)(b) stands. In Committee it was recognised that the phrase "element of dishonesty" could be interpreted differently and that that could give rise to uncertainty.

The phrase "element of dishonesty" taken with the words

"(whether or not it is such as to give rise to criminal liability)"

seems designed to produce an offence which is wider in scope than the existing criminal offence under section 38 of the Value Added Tax Act 1983 and wider than the offence recommended by the Keith committee which envisaged that the new offence of civil fraud which is created in the Finance Bill would be defined as "an act or omission with dishonest intent".

and that the decriminalising of the offence of fraud should mark a difference in investigatory techniques rather than a difference in the essential nature of the conduct. That provoked the Law Society, amongst others, to say:

"We recommend that, in view of the importance and objectives of this new civil offence, uncertainty over the scope of it should be removed by deleting the present wording of subclause (1)(b) and replacing it by: 'his conduct is dishonest'."

We fully recognise the need to expedite timeous VAT payments. We also recognise that the Government have made the improvements that were carefully worked out by the Keith committee. Those improvements which make a distinction between civil and criminal penalties are largely welcome.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) tabled a similar amendment in Committee which was not selected for debate. The Government seek to amend the clause in response to the discussions that took place in Committee, but I feel that amendment No. 141 is to be preferred because it is clearer and avoids any element of doubt. Amendment No. 141 which seeks to add the words "is dishonest" is different from the Government's proposal which suggests inserting the words "involves dishonesty". That may seem a small distinction, although amendment No. 141 seeks in addition to remove the words in the brackets, but I hope to be able to explain that there is a considerable difference.

The criminal test is whether the act, or omission, was done with the intention of evading tax. To a simple Scots criminal lawyer like myself, the test is an easy one. In Scots law terminology it involves an element of mens rea. If there is a wilful intention to avoid tax, there is a criminal offence. Using the Scots criminal law test, the act or omission is either dishonest or it is not. Before the Committee stage I could not for the life of me understand what an "element of dishonesty" could be. The Minister was asked by the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) whether he would expand on that. I agree that some of these matters are complicated but on 16 May the Minister gave the definition as:

"a dishonest act involving a £1,000 evasion might be part of a £5,000 fraud for which the whole fraud of £5,000 was supported by documentary evidence or a general admission. In those circumstances, it would be reasonable on the civil standard"— the new standard that has been adopted by the Government—

"of probability to accept that the offence was the evasion of £5,000, even though the precise evidence attached the dishonesty only to one part of that amount. Those involved might have left the country, and it might be impossible to gain the evidence from elsewhere."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 16 May 1985; c. 130.]

I have given that matter a great deal of thought, and I do not think that the Government's amendment is good enough. An element of doubt remains if the Bill talks about "involving dishonesty". That is ambiguous. If the Minister's explanation is right and in future the Customs and Excise will be able to catch much larger sums of money, although it can prove only a small part of the amount, and impose a civil penalty on the global amount, however big, that gives an unacceptable power to the commissioners.

That would create a bad precedent. We must bear in mind that we are not dealing with the criminal courts. We are dealing with an administrative branch of the law. The Government already have the additional benefit of the civil test of the burden of proof — on a balance of probabilities—as opposed to the criminal test—beyond reasonable doubt. That should be more than enough to enable the Government to catch those people guilty of this new civil offence.

The changes are too draconian. They give far too much power to the commissioners. The clause will cause a great deal of uncertainty. There will be misinterpretation and problems will be caused.

I support the view taken by the Law Society and many other people in Committee and outside the House that the Government's amendment does not go far enough. I hope that the Minister will consider, even at this late stage, adopting the amendment in my name rather than the one he is proposing to move later on.

Sir William Clark: Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I speak to the following two amendments which you have been kind enough to say may be discussed with this one?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind the hon. Gentleman that with amendment No. 141 we are discussing only Government amendment No. 3.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): We had a long debate on this matter in Committee. The words found to be objectionable were "an element of". The Government are proposing to remove those words and I therefore welcome the Government amendment.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): It is difficult to see how far this debate is a semantic one and how far it is a real one and I appreciate the Government's difficulties. It is fair to say that most of the debate in the Standing Committee was about the words "an element of dishonesty". It was felt that the words "an element" brought a degree of confusion into the proceedings which was regrettable. The Minister said that he would look at it and he has done so and deleted those words. The difficulty, on reflection, and reading what he said in Standing Committee, is that there is some confusion in the mind of the Government as to exactly what they want the nature of this new civil fraud to be. The difficulty arises not just from the words "an element" but from the use of the word "involves".

The question is, does the conduct have to be dishonest or is it necessary only for a part of the conduct to be dishonest, even if the rest of the conduct in the particular circumstances of an offence is all right? That is a distinction which is almost impossible to draw. Further ambiguity is engendered by a misuse of the distinction between the test in criminal and civil law for the burden of proof. In criminal law, in order to prove a particular offence, it has to be shown beyond a reasonable doubt that someone acted with a dishonest intent. In civil law it is merely that on the balance of probabilities fraud or dishonesty is established. If that burden of proof is the problem and if the Government wish to say that the civil test applies and not the criminal test, which seems to follow from the nature of the offence that is being legislated, and they are attempting to distinguish between gradations of dishonesty within this clause, it confuses more than it elucidates.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) asked whether the Government were saying that an evasion of VAT, say, of £5,000 should be caught in its entirety by clause 13, even though there was only dishonest conduct in relation to a fraction of that amount. That would be highly unsatisfactory, because either someone has behaved dishonestly in respect of an evasion of VAT or he has not. If there is any sum of money for which they are liable but they have not behaved dishonestly in relation to it, they should not be caught by clause 13. That is an unjustifiable distinction.

The Minister has very fairly thought about it and it would be wrong, given that we concentrated so much attention on the words "an element of dishonesty", to criticise him. If he wants to make it clear that a lesser burden of proof is being applied, then it could be done in a much less ambiguous way. The danger of leaving in the word "involves" is that it has the same connotation as an "element" because it may involve a certain amount of dishonesty, but one is not sure whether the entirety of the conduct needs to be dishonest. So the amendment does not really deal with the essential point made in Standing Committee. When introducing a new offence, it is right that people should know exactly where they stand. I ask the Minister to think again because there is a general view among lawyers, certainly outside the House, that there is a lack of clarity in clause 13 that could pose problems. It is much better that we deal with them as legislators rather than leave them to be dealt with by the courts.

8.45 pm

Mr. Hayhoe: I am grateful for the manner in which the amendment has been moved and the way in which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), speaking for the Opposition, has responded to it. There are real difficulties here because, as I understand it, not being a lawyer, we are moving into somewhat new ground on which there is much precedent in legislation. We are decriminalising a large number of offences concerning VAT and the whole House has welcomed that. We are replacing those criminal offences by a civil offence and the arguments and problems of changing from the burden of proof—which, as I understand it, for a criminal offence is that it is beyond reasonable doubt — towards that for a civil offence, which is the balance of probabilities, has caused problems for the draftsman and certainly also caused problems for those of us who are looking at this more as laymen.

I responded to points made in Committee about an element of dishonesty, saying that could imply that there was a very considerable amount of conduct in which there was just a tiny element of dishonesty and it would be unfair to roll up the whole thing together. I believe that the words "involves dishonesty" imply that it is running through the whole of these transactions and that the level of proof would be the balance of probability level rather than the beyond a reasonable doubt level. One of the reasons why this formulation of words appealed to me was that it was recommended by the VAT practitioners group. I do not wholly accept the arguments that it was putting forward but it, too, was attempting to find a formulation of words which would reflect what was in Keith's mind. Alas, he did not give us the benefit of a formulation of words to give legislative effect to what he was recommending.

Mr. Blair: This is a problem between a layman's way of looking at things and a lawyer's way of looking at them. The notion of civil fraud is a common law offence and the burden of proof will necessarily apply when it is deemed as a civil offence and not a criminal offence. Can I suggest that if the word "involves" is present simply to make it clear that there is a civil burden of proof that is what is needed? It probably is not needed but, if the Minister wants to make it clear beyond any doubt, it is best to state it expressly rather than leave it as it is at present. This might go not to the burden of proof but to the actual quality of dishonesty, in other words, not proving the dishonesty but the actual quality of the dishonest act. That distinction is probably the correct one to make.

[Mr. Blair]

Mr. Hayhoe: I am in the position in which people sometimes find themselves when they take legal advice and where that advice is not wholly unanimous and there are differences of graduation. I suspect that what is happening to me tonight is that I am receiving from distinguished Opposition lawyers advice which is not entirely in accord with that which I have taken. I can assure the House that, having given the undertaking in Committee, I have tried to discharge it to the best of my ability.

The change proposed in amendment No. 3 will reflect the Government's intention that there should be a demonstration of sufficient dishonesty to satisfy a tribunal on the balance of probabilities that the whole conduct merited a civil penalty and that the Customs and Excise should apply that standard. I hope that the courts will not find any ambiguity in the approach that I am commending to the House. It would be necessary to have another look at this legislation if the results worked out that way in practice, and it is only right that one should do so.

I advise the House not to adopt the form of words proposed by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) in his amendment No. 141. I hope that the House will agree to the change, which I suspect will be welcome even if it does not go as far as some would wish, set out in amendment No. 3.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It is obvious that the Minister will look again at this wording, but I hope that he will not wait until there is a case that obliges him or his successor to do so. I put a purely linguistic and not a legal point to him in that context. I suggest that the word "involves" was chosen in the original drafting because it fits with the words "an element". "Involves an element of" was a whole phrase and, by removing the words "an element of" in discharge of his undertaking to the Committee the Minister has not removed the essential difficulty to which all the argument was directed. I hope that he will take that into account when he looks at this.

Mr. Kirkwood: I accept what the Minister says. We are on difficult ground, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman can assure me that he will keep a careful and close watch and, if the courts get into a fankle about this, he will take quick and urgent action to remedy the distress that it will cause. I fear that there is a real prospect that there will be difficulties. However, if the Minister can give me that assurance, I shall be happy to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am glad to give that assurance. This is difficult ground, and I am grateful to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) for his comments. I should like to consider with my advisers what has been said. I somehow suspect that this is not entirely the end of the matter, but I hope that at least the House will think that I have sought to be helpful and to move in the direction that the Committee wished.

Mr. Kirkwood: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made, No. 3, in page 9, line 33, leave out 'an element of.'

No. 4, in page 9, line 35, leave out '(5)' and insert '(7)'. —[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Mr. Kirkwood: I beg to move amendment No. 142, in page 10, line 20, leave out from 'amount' to 'and' in line 21 and insert 'as appears appropriate'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 143, in page 10, line 20, leave out 'not less than half' and insert 'less than'.

Amendment No. 144, in clause 14, page 12, line 28, leave out 'if' and insert

'in the circumstances outlined in (a) and (b) of this subsection but shall in other circumstances give rise to liability to such a penalty not exceeding the penalty under subsection (1) above as the Commissioners or on appeal by the person concerned a value-added tax tribunal having regard to all the circumstances of the case think fit'.

Amendment No. 145, in clause 15, page 14, line 11, at end insert

'but shall if he does not so satisfy either of them give rise to such penalty not exceeding the amount of the penalty specified in subsection (1) above as the Commissioners or on appeal by the person concerned a value-added tax tribunal having regard to all the circumstances of the case think fit'.

Amendment No. 146, in clause 16, page 15, line 19, at end insert

'but shall if he does not so satisfy either of them be liable to such penalty not exceeding the amount of the penalty specified under subsection (3) above as the Commissioners or on appeal by the person concerned a value-added tax tribunal having regard to all the circumstances of the case think fit'.

Amendment No. 147, in clause 17, page 17, line 27, at end insert

'but shall if he does not so satisfy either of them give rise to such penalty not exceeding the amount of the penalty specified under subsection (1) or (2) above as the Commissioners or on appeal by the person concerned a value-added tax tribunal having regard to all the circumstances of the case think fit'.

Mr. Kirkwood: Clause 15, which deals with VAT criminal penalties, was rehearsed at some length in Committee. The burden of the representations that we received both before the Committee stage and since convinced me, as it did the Association of Certified Accountants, the Law Society, the Institute of Directors and many others, that it was a mistake to take away the power of mitigation that the Bill proposes.

Clause 13 reduces, although it does not take away, the discretion to mitigate the penalty. Therefore, we should have more confidence in the tribunals. I should be happy to leave them to make judgments about individual cases in a better way than we can, as legislators, dealing with a matter in principle. On that basis, the words "as appear appropriate" would allow for much more flexibility. I would be happier if we adopted that approach rather than the approach of the Bill as it stands.

Sir William Clark: Mr. Speaker has selected amendments Nos. 143 to 147 in this group. They are similar to the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). The one fear outside the House is that it looked as if the VAT tribunal powers would be treated differently from those of the special and general commissioners of the Inland Revenue. I know that the Government have gone some way to mitigating the penalties that at one time were fixed. However, I should have thought that there is a case for saying that, now that there is the right of appeal to a tribunal, a tribunal could, in its wisdom and judgment, have the power to mitigate the penalty from zero to the maximum. This is what my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and I are trying to deal with in the amendments.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will look at this. If he is not prepared to accept any of the amendments in this group, will he give an undertaking that he will look at the matter by the next Budget, with the experience that we have had from now until then? If it is found that mitigation from zero to maximum should be allowed and that there should be some change in the appeal procedure, I trust that he will make these changes.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): When we debated these matters in Committee I made it clear that I thought that the Government were mistaken in withdrawing clause 23, which gave the power to the commissioners to mitigate penalties and interest. I thought that the Government took the wrong line. Rather than taking away the right to mitigate altogether, they should have accepted Conservative amendments to extend that power to the tribunals.

At the moment, we have an all-or-nothing solution. One is either subject to no penalty or the maximum penalties. This has never been the case for income tax and many people are clearly worried, as my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) has said, that next year, when the Keith committee's proposals on the enforcement powers of the Inland Revenue are put into legislative form, the power of mitigation will be taken away from it as well. That would be wholly unacceptable and would meet with the united opposition of all the business representative organisations. It would be unacceptable to the taxpayer as well, whether an individual or in the corporate or business sector.

I warn my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Treasury that if the Government are thinking of extending this line of thinking into the Inland Revenue sector they will be in for a great deal of opposition. Many people will feel a great sense of injustice that they will not be able to place themselves in between the two extremes of no penalty or maximum penalty as a result of the Bill. VAT is not a popular tax, particularly with small trades, because it imposes an enormous administrative burden. Whether justified or not, there is a widespread feeling that the Customs and Excise, because of its long history of involvement in smuggling and offences of that kind, has far too heavy a hand in dealing with those who have to administer the tax. Here is another imposition on them.

I regret that the Government have not seen fit to take the middle way of giving power to the commissioners and the tribunal to mitigate penalties. This will make the tax much more unpopular and the Government will forfeit a great deal of good will that needs to be fostered. I hope my right hon. Friend will heed the words that have been spoken not only by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) but by many Conservative Members both upstairs in Committee and on the Floor of the House. I hope the Government will think again about this matter.

9 pm

Mr. Blair: In the Standing Committee, the Opposition tabled a new clause specifically giving such a power of mitigation. It was a pity, when Conservative Members feel so strongly about it now, that they did not support us. That clause introduced a specific power of mitigation and would have tidied up the detritus of clause 23.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Rubbish.

Mr. Blair: The hon. Gentleman says rubbish, but a specific clause was introduced providing a power of partial mitigation and he did not support it.

The amendment by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) deals specifically with clause 13(4). Subsection (4) is not, strictly speaking, a mitigation clause. It allows the commissioners or, on appeal, a VAT tribunal, to reduce the penalty by up to 50 per cent. as a reward for co-operation. It applies only in circumstances of co-operation and is a direct incentive to people to co-operate. The arguments that apply in relation to that special incentive do not necessarily apply to the general case for mitigation. I have read the proceedings of the Standing Committee because I was not present for that part of the discussion. The penalty should not be reduced to nothing in circumstances where someone has merely co-operated with the commissioners. If what was being given was a real power of mitigation under which any circumstance could be taken into account, there would be more reason for allowing that general power.

Amendments were moved in the names of the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) and the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). We had a very full debate upstairs in Committee as to whether or not there should be a power of mitigation. I made clear at that time that there should be a power of mitigation because there are graduations of offences. When legislation of a fairly tough nature is being introduced, it is wrong for no leeway to mitigate to be given to the commissioners or the VAT tribunal, not just when someone is co-operating, but in cases of great hardship. Without repeating them fully, I reiterate the arguments made in the Committee. I hope the Minister will look at the matter after some months of experience of these provisions so that we can see whether or not the injustice some of us fear has come about.

Mr. Hayhoe: The matters being debated in this series of amendments were given a good airing in our proceedings upstairs in Committee. As has just been said, we have had a re-run of the arguments during the short debate on new clause 32. I could re-state the arguments I then deployed, but that would not be helpful. I suspect that most hon. Members in the Chamber heard me say them in the first instance and might not be pleased if I were to repeat them at length.

To make the changes proposed would strike at the heart of the Keith philosophy. My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) was less than fair in his comments, though I accept that, right from the start on one of his earliest interventions in the Committee, he was arguing in favour of a power to lie both with the commissioners and the VAT tribunal to vary the amounts of penalties imposed. The philosophy of Keith was the certainty of fixed penalties. The Government have introduced—and this was not recommended by Keith—the whole concept of a reasonable excuse. I note the comment made in Committee, that to say the taxpayer had to exercise due diligence and have a reasonable excuse might be too stringent a test. Therefore, I propose that "due diligence" should be dropped.

[Mr. Hayhoe]

Having a resonable excuse is a very marked change in favour of the taxpayer compared with the Keith recommendations on which, as the House knows, there were wide consultations in the many months following publication of his report. Equally, there is a reserve power, which I have explained, still resting with the commissioners to exercise if there are grounds of compassion or something similar that would not be covered by "reasonable excuse". The commissioners will have that power to remit on an intermittent basis penalties that might be imposed.

The change that has been made of introducing the reasonable excuse defence to be argued both to the commissioners—who I hope in the main will deal with the matter so that it does not need to go any further—and if necessary to the tribunal, the raising of the trigger points quite significantly compared with those recommended by Keith, the residual mitigation powers which Customs and Excise has and which have been endorsed by the Public Accounts Committee quite recently, and the way in which they are exercised, all add up to a significant change in favour of the rights of the taxpayer and safeguard him against the original proposals made by Keith. In those circumstances, I commend the provisions to the House, and I hope that the House will not seek to introduce the amendment.

I was asked to keep the matter under review. Of course, we shall do so. However, the next Budget is too soon for us to have had much experience. The default surcharge in clause 19 does not come into effect until October 1986. The serious misdeclaration provision in clause 14 does not come into effect until 1988. We shall need a little longer to get some feel and experience of this change, but I gladly undertake that matters will be kept under review. It is important to remember that, even if a Minister did not give such an undertaking, individual Members of the House would keep the matter under review and find ways of raising it if they saw elements of injustice occurring.

I hope that the amendment will not be pressed to a Division. Let us see how we get on with the new regime being introduced in these clauses.

Mr. Kirkwood: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 14

SERIOUS MISDECLARATION OR NEGLECT RESULTING IN UNDERSTATEMENTS OR OVERCLAIMS

Mr. Freeman: I beg to move amendment No. 161, in page 11, line 36, leave out

'£3,000 and 1½ per cent.'

and insert

'£10,000 and 5 per cent.'.

I sense that there is broad support on both sides of the House for the amendment, and I am grateful to the Minister for the courteous and encouraging way in which he has considered our discussions about its terms. The purpose of the amendment is to raise the minimum error threshold before the penalties of clause 14 apply.

It may help the House if I explain briefly what the clause provides at present and what the amendment would substitute for it, because the language in subsection (2)(a)(i) and (ii) is difficult to follow.

As the Bill stands, if the true amount of tax due in a quarter is between nil and £10,000, the error threshold is 30 per cent., that is from nil to £3,000. If the error is greater than that, the automatic penalties provided in clause 14 will come into play, that is the 30 per cent. penalty and the recovery of the tax. If the true amount of tax due is between £10,000 and £200,000, the error threshold is £3,000, and if it is above £200,000 the 1·5 per cent. provision comes into play. Therefore, the error threshold starts at £3,000 and rises to 1·5 per cent. of the true amount of tax due.

Under the amendment, if the true amount of tax due is between nil and £33,333, the error threshold is 30 per cent. of the true amount of tax due. If the tax due is between £33,333 and £200,000, the error threshold is at £10,000, and if the tax due is above £200,000 the 5 per cent. provision comes into effect.

The practical effects of that are that the error thresholds are increased for all companies where the true amount of tax due in any quarter is greater than £10,000. That is equivalent to £40,000 per annum. The amendment would benefit companies where the true amount of tax due is greater than that. The benefit is not confined purely to medium-sized and large companies, but to what many involved in business and industry would regard as small companies. The Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Taxation and many companies throughout the country will welcome the amendment, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am happy to say that the Government accept the amendment, and I join my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) in commending it to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 11, line 42, after 'periods', insert

"beginning after the day appointed under subsection (8) below'.

The purpose of the amendment is to safeguard taxpayers by ensuring that there can be no possibility of retrospection, either directly or through the operation of the totting up test in respect of the civil penalties and serious misdeclaration under clause 14, breaches of regulatory provisions under clause 17, and of interest on tax under clause 18. The amendment implements assurances which I gave to the Committee, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Blair: As I understand it, the amendment will prevent retrospective totting up, and that is its sole effect.

Mr. Hayhoe: That is my understanding. The amendment is in pursuance of my undertaking to the Committee when my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) raised some points.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move amendment No. 137, in page 12, line 20, at end insert

'but if for any period there is an understatement of credit for input tax or an overstatement of output tax, allowance shall be made for that error in determining the tax for that period which would have been so lost.'.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) is unable to be present this evening. As I was going to accept the amendment, I gladly move it and accept it in the same breath.

Mr. Blair: I wish to ensure that I understand the effect of the amendment. Will the Minister confirm that if a trader has understated both the input and output tax—in other words, he is understating the volume of the business—and if he is brought up for one understatement, he will be given credit for the other?

9.15 pm

Mr. Hayhoe: It is the net position that will be dealt with. It seemed reasonable and fair.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 6, in page 12, line 28, after 'section', insert

'nor be taken into account under subsection (2)(b) above'.

No. 7, in page 12, line 29, leave out from 'person' to end of line and insert 'concerned'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 12, line 31, leave out 'that he exercised all due diligence and'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

Government amendments Nos. 10, 11, 14, 17 and 27.

Amendment No. 175, in clause 33, page 34, line 45 at end insert

'save where the insufficiency of funds arises directly from the fact that the person has not received the payment from his customer in respect of which value-added tax is due and has not been paid.'

and Government amendment No. 28.

Mr. Hayhoe: The amendments give effect to the undertakings that I gave in Committee to reflect upon the need for the provision concerning "all due diligence". Upon reflection, and taking account of the arguments put from both sides of the Committee, I am now bringing forward these amendments, which I hope will be welcomed and supported by the whole House.

Mr. Blair: I have no difficulty with the Government amendments, but amendment No. 175 takes us in a slightly different but important direction.

At present, under clause 33, if a trader attempted to provide a reasonable excuse for any conduct that was unlawful under the VAT provisions, the effect of subsection (2) of that clause would be to prevent an insufficiency of funds to pay any tax due being deemed by the commissioners or the VAT tribunal to be a reasonable excuse; in other words, the definition of "reasonable excuse" is drawn in such a way as to exclude the situation in which someone cannot pay because of an insufficiency of funds.

Amendment No. 175 would add, at the end of subsection (2), the words

"save where the insufficiency of funds arises directly from the fact that the person has not received the payment from his customer in respect of which value-added tax is due and has not been paid".

It is important to note that the amendment does not relieve the trader or person concerned of the obligation to pay the VAT. Yesterday, on one of the new clauses, the discussion related to whether, in circumstances where a customer had not paid the VAT to the trader or taxpayer, the taxpayer could then count that as a bad debt. The Government resisted that amendment. I could see why they did so, because it would have relieved the trader altogether of the obligation to pay.

Our amendment does not relieve the person concerned of the obligation to pay; it simply relieves that person, if the commissioners or the VAT tribunal so desire, of the harsh system of automatic penalties and the different rates of interest in circumstances where that non-payment of VAT has genuinely been caused through no fault of the trader. In other words, it gives a power to the Customs and Excise or the VAT tribunal to take into account insufficiency of funds in carefully prescribed circumstances when deciding whether there is a reasonable excuse for non-compliance.

That does not mean that the commissioners or the VAT tribunal would have to take into account insufficiency of funds arising in those circumstances—they would not have to describe that as a reasonable excuse—but it does not exclude from the definition of reasonable excuse the circumstances in which an inability to pay arises directly from the customer not paying the trader and the trader having sought from him VAT in respect of that invoice.

The prescribed circumstances are very tight. The insufficiency of funds must arise directly from non-payment by the customer. We are therefore discussing a fairly limited range of situations and a case in which a trader may issue an invoice for a large amount. By so doing, he is liable for VAT upon it. If the customer refuses or fails to pay, the VAT trader may be in difficulties in meeting the VAT liability because the customer has not honoured the invoice. The insufficiency of funds arises directly from the conjunction of an invoice being issued, a liability to pay, and the customer not meeting that liability.

With great respect, I suggest that such a narrowly drawn discretion as contained in the amendment is in the interests of equity. We know that there are small businesses which can have major cash flow problems as a result of VAT liabilities. We know that, particularly in certain trades, it can be difficult to secure payment of invoices from customers. It seems unfair that those cash problems can result in the serious VAT penalties under these clauses in circumstances in which, through no fault of the trader, the customer refuses to pay the trader.

I repeat that this does not relieve a trader of the obligation to pay VAT; it simply relieves, or gives the commissioners of the VAT tribunal discretion to relieve, the harsh penalties prescribed by these provisions of the Bill in circumstances where the problems arise directly from the failure of a customer to pay.

The Government boast of their record on small businesses. Of all the VAT subjects which we will discuss tonight, I think that none is closer to the heart of small businesses than the difficulties which can arise in the circumstances I have described.

I ask the Minister to consider carefully whether he can accept the amendment. It would allow for fairness in the treatment of businesses and traders, but it would not relieve people of the basic obligation to pay. It is a way of easing the burden of these penalties in circumstances in which, through no fault of the trader, a great financial difficulty can occur.

[Mr. Blair]

I appeal to the Minister, in terms of a fairly tightly drawn clause, to consider whether he can allow the amendment, which I believe would greatly increase the justice of these provisions.

Mr. Tim Smith: This group of Government amendments will be widely welcomed, I think, because the Bill as drafted would have required the taxpayer to meet a double test to establish a defence: first, a reasonable excuse and, secondly, due diligence. I think that that would have caused confusion. Therefore, I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Minister for having introduced what I think will be a valuable simplification.

My hon. Friend may recall that I sent him a redraft of some of these clauses prepared by Mr. St. John Price, a VAT practitioner. Mr. St. John Price felt, as I think many people do, that some provisions of the Bill are still extremely complicated and difficult to follow. Can my hon. Friend tell me what has happened to those proposals?

Mr. Hayhoe: To reply first to my hon. Friend, I have a letter in draft in response to my hon. Friend. Perhaps I should not seek to do more than give him a soupcon of an hors d'oeuvre by saying that it is not as simple as his constituent has led him to believe or, indeed, as I said in Committee, as simple as I dearly wish it could have been. I will be writing to him. With his permission, if other hon. Members wish to have copies of that correspondence, I would be happy to co-operate. I am delighted that the Government amendments removing the due diligence provision have been generally welcomed.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) made various points about amendment No. 175. Clause 33(2) provides that "an insufficiency of funds to pay any tax due is not a reasonable excuse."

It limits the circumstances in which the benefit of this defence may be claimed. The purpose of the amendment is to remove this limitation where the taxpayer can show that an insufficiency of funds results directly from non-payment by his customer and thus to permit more taxpayers to avoid the penalties, in particular the default surcharge.

The hon. Gentleman made out a persuasive case on the basis of the hard cases that he used as a foundation, of which all right hon. and hon. Members are aware, because of our contact with constituents. However, like the hoped-for simplicity of the drafting of these clauses, it is not quite so easy. The Opposition amendment would begin to undermine the basic concept of VAT: that tax becomes due at the time of supply or in the issue of the tax invoice, subject to its being issued reasonably promptly. These matters were referred to yesterday in our debate on new clause 11.

The amendment effectively changes the tax point to the date of payment for the supply, since it would allow non-payment by customers to be the basis of a perpetual claim to the reasonable excuse defence against all sanctions for non-payment of the VAT in question. Under the guise of helping the hard cases, for which there is great sympathy, it could drive a coach and horses through the surcharge arrangements and would open the floodgates to representations about and appeals against surcharge of varying degrees of sincerity. To expect Customs and Excise or, on appeal, the VAT tribunal to distinguish the small minority of cases of genuine difficulty without letting in larger numbers of less deserving cases, thus eroding the revenue benefits of the surcharge, would be almost impossible.

We have already established the unfairness to the complying trader of allowing the non-complying trader effectively to have an interest-free loan from the taxpayer by withholding and hanging on to the tax. It is not just the revenue which would be at a disadvantage. His local and honest neighbour who is trading properly and paying his taxes would be equally at a disadvantage.

Although I accept the honourable intentions behind the amendment, it would be a move towards providing a total VAT bad debt relief by the back door. These matters were considered in the Committee debate to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury replied. We have made a significant move on bad debt relief by linking it to the provisions of the Insolvency Bill, but we have not gone as far as many hon. Members wish in providing the complete VAT bad debt relief that this amendment would provide.

Furthermore, it would be a vehicle for abuse. It would make it possible for one taxpayer to supply an associate, perhaps even companies in common ownership, who does not pay for the supplies but claims the input tax. The input tax can be reclaimed on the basis of the invoice by companies who do not need to have made the payment. That is the other side of the coin to which I referred in our debates on clause 11 yesterday. The possibility of fraud and abuse would be opened up if it were possible for the input tax to be claimed back. Inter-associate debts could be run up with impunity, no output VAT would be accounted for under the Opposition's dispensation, but the input tax would be paid by the Customs and Excise, to the detriment of the Revenue.

I accept that the intention of the hon. Member for Sedgefield is to meet the hard cases that we all know about, but I hope that I have persuaded him that his amendment would go a long way beyond that. We may return to the general matters at a later date but not, I suspect, tonight.

9.30 pm

Mr. Blair: By leave of the House, I express my gratitude to the Minister of State, who made a good and persuasive case, though I wonder whether the results of our amendment would be as bad as he makes out.

The debate has shown the need for flexibility in the system. That need runs through the mitigation arguments and this debate.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 9, in page 12, line 35, leave out from 'person' to 'furnished' in line 36 and insert 'concerned'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 15

FAILURES TO NOTIFY AND UNAUTHORISED ISSUE OF INVOICES

Amendment made: No. 10, in page 14, line 10, leave out

'that he exercised all due diligence and'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 16

BREACHES OF WALKING POSSESSION AGREEMENTS

Amendment made: No. 11, in page 15, line 18, leave out

'that he exercised due diligence and'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 17

BREACHES OF REGULATORY PROVISIONS

Amendments made: No. 12, in page 15, line 30, after '(10)', insert 'and section 21(6)'.

No. 13, in page 16, line 12, at end insert—

'(aa) a previous failure to comply with any such requirement shall be disregarded if it occurred before the passing of this Act.'.

No. 14, in page 17, line 23, leave out

'that he exercised all due diligence and'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 18

INTEREST ON TAX ETC. RECOVERED OR RECOVERABLE BY ASSESSMENT

Amendment made: No. 15, in page 20, line 11, at end add

'and any reference in this section to a prescribed accounting period is a reference to a period which begins on or after the day so appointed'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 19

THE DEFAULT SURCHARGE

Amendments made: No. 16, in page 20, line 37, leave out from 'If' to 'an' in line 39 and insert

'a surcharge liability notice is served by reason of default in respect of two prescribed accounting periods and the second of those periods ends at or before the expiry of'.

No. 17, in page 21, line 34, leave out from beginning to end of line 41 and insert—

'(a) the return or, as the case may be, the tax shown on the return was despatched at such a time and in such a manner that it was reasonable to expect that it would be received by the Commissioners within the appropriate time limits, or

(b) there is a reasonable excuse for the return or tax not having been so despatched'.

No. 18, in page 21, line 42, leave out from 'and' to end of line 43 and insert

'for the purposes of the preceding provisions of this section he shall be treated as not having been in default in respect of the prescribed accounting period in question (and, accordingly, any surcharge liability notice the service of which depended upon that default shall be deemed not to have been served)'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 20

REPAYMENT SUPPLEMENT IN RESPECT OF CERTAIN DELAYED PAYMENTS

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 150, in page 22 leave out lines 35 and 36 and insert—

'(c) repayment is not made.'.

Clause 20 provides that where a delay is involved in the repayment of VAT to a registered trader, a repayment supplement shall be paid in addition to the sum owed. There is a de minimis provision to cut out entitlement to the supplement where there is only a short delay. The period chosen is 30 days. When the 30-day period has elapsed, the registered trader becomes entitled to his supplement.

There is a deficiency in the clause that would be remedied by my amendment. The clause provides that the commissioners should not repay VAT and pay the supplement, but should merely issue a written instruction for the repayment. That will normally be sufficient, but there have been strikes involving Customs and Excise employees and if they are repeated in future an order for repayment may be made, but no cheque might be issued to the taxpayer.

If that happened, the taxpayer would suffer the loss of the interest that he would otherwise have been able to gain on the money repaid to him. It would be unfair if that extra cost were imposed on taxpayers and I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary will accept the amendment or at least think about the matter and return to it next year.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) moved his amendment with characteristic lucidity and brevity. He discussed the matter in Committee so I am aware of and understand his concern. We have thought long and hard about his arguments in Committee, but on reflection we are still not able to meet the point for practical reasons.

The Customs and Excise deal with about 50,000 claims a week, most of which are dealt with within seven days. My hon. Friend will be among the first to admit that the system works smoothly and that delays do not usually occur. My hon. Friend mentioned postal strikes and the computer strike six years ago.

The system is clear cut. The Customs and Excise is able to say with precision when the period has expired because that is when the instruction is given. My hon. Friend will appreciate that sometimes it will not be able to check. During a postal delay it will have to depend upon the records of the recipient or the registered trader. It will be in his hands.

My hon. Friend might argue that if there is inconvenience it should be borne by the Administration rather than by the taxpayer. However, I hope that he and the House will bear in mind that the repayment supplement is generous. We are talking about a 5 per cent. supplement. It is not even calculated on a per annum basis. It is difficult to estimate the cost of my hon. Friend's amendment, but it might cost as much as £1 million a year.

I recognise my hon. Friend's anxiety, but I hope that he and the House will be impressed by the practical limitations.

We are moving into new territory. The Keith committee did not recommend an amendment such as that proposed by my hon. Friend, but we shall keep the matter under review. If hardship is caused, we shall examine the matter again.

My hon. Friend has done the House a service by underlining the problem. I hope that he will feel that justice has been done and will leave the matter where it is.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 19, in page 22, line 44, leave out '£10' and insert '£100'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Clause 21

ASSESSMENT OF AMOUNTS DUE BY WAY OF PENALTY, INTEREST OR SURCHARGE

Amendment made: No. 20, in page 24, line 18, leave out from 'be' to end of line 19 and insert

'for which entitlement to a payment under section 14(5) of the principal Act was overstated'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 22

ASSESSMENTS: TIME LIMITS AND SUPPLEMENTARY ASSESSMENTS

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 26, line 9, leave out from 'if' to end of line 10 and insert 'tax has'.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may discuss Government amendment No. 22.

Mr. Hayhoe: The amendment honours assurances that I gave in Committee during discussions on amendment No. 118 to my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton).

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 22, in page 26, line 24, leave out paragraph (b) and insert—

'(b) if the circumstances are as set out in subsection (4) above, the modification of subsection (1) above contained in that subsection shall not apply but any assessment which (from the point of view of time limits) could have been made immediately after the death may be made at any time within three years after it.'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 24

AMENDMENTS OF SECTION 40 OF THE PRINCIPAL ACT

Amendment made: No. 23, in page 27, line 22, leave out

'(disregarding any mitigation by the Commissioners)'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 29

ENFORCEMENT OF CERTAIN DECISIONS OF TRIBUNAL

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move amendment No. 153, in page 31, line 29, at end insert

'(5) Any reference in this section to a decision of a value added tax tribunal includes a reference to an order (however described) made by a tribunal for giving effect to a decision.'.

This is a technical amendment concerning the administration of the VAT tribunals and the way in which they promulgate brief orders of their decisions which I understand will be to the benefit of all concerned. I hope that the House will support it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 31

INSOLVENCY

Amendment made: No. 24, in page 32, line 8, leave out 'made' and insert 'in force.'—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 32

REFUND OF TAX IN CASES OF BAD DEBTS

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 33, line 17, leave out 'in Great Britain'.

Clause 32 deals with relief for VAT in case of bad debts, and subsection (3) defines insolvency for the purposes of that VAT relief. There are two alternative headings of the definition in paragraphs (a) and (b). An attentive reader—or, in the case of Northern Ireland, even an unattentive reader—would notice that, whereas definition (a) of liquidation relates to the United Kingdom and the Isle of Man, definition (b) relates only to Great Britain. That throws up the question whether the relief from VAT in case of a bad debt that is provided by subsection (3)(b) is not to be available in the case of a company in Northern Ireland and a claim for the repayment of VAT arising out of transactions with that company.

My hon. Friends and I would have been doing less than our duty had we not drawn attention to an apparent inequity. Indeed, a number of constituents have written to us expressing their anxiety that this relief is apparently to be denied in the Province.

Seeing it to be so blatant, however, and following the general proposition that there is usually some explanation for everything, I communicated with the Financial Secretary to the Treasury and relied upon the rules of the ex-FST club, only to receive, to my delight, a lengthy and helpful reply from the Minister of State. If I understand it correctly, the position roughly is that the circumstances defined in paragraph (b)—which is confined to Great Britain—arise under the provisions of the Insolvency Bill, which has not yet received Royal Assent. Well and good so far! However, the relevant provisions of the Insolvency Bill do not apply to Northern Ireland. Consequently, until an Order in Council is made which applies those provisions to Northern Ireland, there is nothing upon which the relief provided by this paragraph can bite for a company in Northern Ireland.

However, I am not entirely content to leave it with the right hon. Gentleman's concluding assurance:

"In the meanwhile . . . VAT bad debt relief is still available in Northern Ireland where a company enters into a compulsory or creditors' voluntary liquidation."

It is quite clear that there are circumstances in which relief will be provided in other parts of the United Kingdom which will not be available in Northern Ireland until the corresponding Northern Ireland legislation is made.

I have two complaints on that score. The first is one with which the House in its midnight hours has become very familiar—the complaint of my hon. Friends and myself that for no sufficient reason the law is made in the Province not by Act of Parliament but by Order in Council. That is a delightful example of the difficulties and injustices that we get into when we legislate by different methods for different parts of the United Kingdom.

Those difficulties and injustices would not be so great if the different methods of legislation were simultaneously applied in both parts of the kingdom. But in this case it is quite clear that there is to be a time lapse before the legislation comes into effect. I understand that it will come into effect in Great Britain early next year, but we do not yet have a date on which the legislation, for which proposals for a draft Order in Council have not yet been made, will come into effect in Northern Ireland. There is, therefore, a gap of injustice between those concerned in Northern Ireland and those relieved in the rest of the United Kingdom.

9.45 pm

The Treasury is the last Department of State that I would hold guilty of the current absurdity of legislation in Northern Ireland by Order in Council. To find the culprits in that respect, one must look to other Departments of State. But I have a friendly and helpful hint to offer to the Treasury. It is that, in its endless pursuit of savings of public expenditure, it would find a rich field if it proceeded to eliminate the duplication of effort, staff and work—not only in this House but elsewhere in the public service—caused by the two concurrent forms of legislation for Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

That is a good tip for the Minister of State, for which I hope he and his Department will be duly grateful—although, when I offered it to an earlier Minister at the Treasury, at a less advanced stage of political affairs in Northern Ireland, though gratefully received, it was by no means acted upon.

There is something, however, that the Minister of State could do which would be of practical help in existing circumstances, and I am sorry that the proposition I have to make is not one that I had time to put him in advance of the debate. I shall therefore understand if he responds to my suggestion simply by undertaking to examine it. That is the most in the circumstances that I could expect.

It is admitted that there will be a gap of time between the availability of this relief in Northern Ireland and its availability in the rest of the United Kingdom. My suggestion is that the Government could undertake that, by concession, the same relief will be afforded in Northern Ireland during that interval as will be available in Great Britain and will, in due course, be available statutorily in Northern Ireland.

I hope that I am not asking something which is too libidinous from the Customs and Excise by suggesting that there should be an extra-statutory concession in this respect. After all, we have the Government's assurance that legislation in these precise terms is intended. It seems only reasonable, that being so and there being an inequitable gap between the application in two parts of the kingdom, that the inequity should be removed by extra-statutory action. I hope that the Minister will undertake to consider benevolently the suggestion that I have made.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): As my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) rightly said, this is a clear and even dramatic example of the disadvantage suffered by Northern Ireland under the system which is more accurately called colonial rule than direct rule.

I shall give an example because it is important that the Treasury should understand the whole iniquity of that which we suffer. That is the example of the measure that was processed through the House to remedy the defects in Orlit houses. On the day it was announced, I sought an assurance from the Minister for Housing and Construction that Northern Ireland would receive the benefits simultaneously with the rest of the United Kingdom. The Minister expressed the hope that there would be—he was in favour of—simultaneous application, but, lo and behold, when the rats got at it, we were told that that was not possible and that we should need lengthy discussions on the same topic dealing with the same problem. It was nearly two years before the Order in Council dealing with the same problem came before the House.

Only last week Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Opposition showed clearly that they were at least willing to consider the possibility of radical change to that unacceptable system. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Down has properly shown that, when the Insolvency Bill receives Royal Assent, Northern Ireland will not automatically benefit. We shall have the same charade once again. We shall be told that the sacred Stormont statute book must be thumbed over until the powers that be satisfy themselves that no dot or comma has been accidentally omitted. After a period of nonsensical consultations—they are nonsensical, considering that all citizens of the United Kingdom have an opportunity to comment on legislation before the House—and possibly 18 months to two years after the Insolvency Bill receives Royal Assent, we shall be privileged to debate in the middle of the night a parallel, ditto measure in the form of a Northern Ireland Order in Council to deal with the same problem.

Therefore, I reinforce the plea made by my right hon. Friend that Treasury Ministers give thought to providing some flexibility and relief in what will be a temporary period of 18 months to two years. People in Northern Ireland will find it difficult to understand why the law will not confer benefits upon them and why the Finance Bill will be applied in a different form in two separate parts of the same United Kingdom.

Mr. Hayhoe: The right hon. Members for South Down (Mr. Powell) and for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) have correctly identified the problem as the provisions of the Insolvency Bill rather than those of the Finance Bill. I can only confirm that that is so and that the reason for the Finance Bill being drafted as it is is the present provisions of the Insolvency Bill, which is going through the House.

I reinforce what I said in the letter to the right hon. Member for South Down. As soon as legislation is brought in to extend the Insolvency Bill's provisions to Northern Ireland, the Government will extend those bad debt relief provisions concurrently. The Insolvency Bill provisions will be extended to Northern Ireland by statutory instrument. I note what has been said about the criticisms of those procedures. I can give the undertaking that, once that extension is made and once the Insolvency Bill point has been dealt with, Customs and Excise will extend the relief by concession until an amendment can be made in the next Finance Bill. There is no administrative problem in giving VAT relief to creditors in Northern Ireland as soon as practicable.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman has not fully appreciated the nature of the concession for which I was asking. I appreciate that before the Finance Bill is amended the relief will be granted as soon as the Northern Ireland law is brought into congruence with the Insolvency Bill, as it still is. What I was asking for was something more—that, in the period between the coming into force of this legislation and the coming into force of the Northern Ireland Order in Council, there should be an extra-statutory concession to fill that gap.

Mr. Hayhoe: If the right hon. Gentleman had contained himself for a moment, he would have found that

[Mr. Hayhoe]

I was just about to address myself to the very courteous request that he put to me. I was going to preface my comments by saying that the information available to me is that only 12 receiverships occurred in the Province of Northern Ireland during 1984, out of 1,600 in the whole of the United Kingdom. The number of receiverships is therefore small. Four of the 12 went into liquidation. Because of this, there was an almost immediate entitlement to relief. The area in which the temporary concession is being requested is very small.

I gather that there is some problem with the issue of certificates. This means that I must take up the suggestion of the right hon. Member for South Down that I should undertake to examine his request sympathetically. I gladly undertake to do that.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his response. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 26, in page 33, line 31, at end insert

'or to a person deriving title from, through or under that person'. —[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 33

INTERPRETATION AND CONSTRUCTION OF CHAPTER II

Amendments made: No. 27, in page 34, line 44, after 'conduct', insert '(a)'.

No. 28, in page 34, line 45, at end insert

'and

(b) where reliance is placed on any other person to perform any task, neither the fact of that reliance nor any dilatoriness or inaccuracy on the part of the person relied upon is a reasonable excuse.'

No. 29, in page 35, line 4, at end insert—

'(3A) In any case where—

(a) an amount is due from the Commissioners to any person under section 14(5) of the principal Act, and

(b) that person is liable to pay a sum assessed by way of penalty, interest or surcharge, the amount referred to in paragraph (a) above shall be set against the sum referred to in paragraph (b) above and, accordingly, to the extent of the set-off, the obligations of the Commissioners and the person concerned shall be discharged.'. — [Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 39

BUILDING SOCIETIES

Amendment made: No. 30, in page 39, line 2, leave out 'relating to interest paid or credited'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Schedule 10

DEEP DISCOUNT SECURITIES

10 pm

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move amendment No. 59, in page 124, line 38, leave out subparagraph (3).

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 60 to 66.

Mr. Stewart: This measure fills a gap in the schedule which could have allowed the aim of the coupon-stripping legislation to be subverted by the conversion of securities issued as part of a coupon-stripping operation.

When we discussed the schedule in Standing Committee I assured the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) that we would consider possible ways around the legislation. We have concluded that the existing provisions on conversion of securities are not entirely satisfactory. This group of amendments is designed to close a potential loophole.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I am glad that, because of our questioning in Committee, the Government have identified a complicated manoeuvre which could have led to tax avoidance. As usual, the Opposition are glad when such possible abuses are prevented by Government legislation.

Does the Economic Secretary have any idea how much revenue would have been lost had tax planners been able to indulge in such manoeuvres and avoid the tax that should have been paid? I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for explaining the possible abuses that could have arisen and the ways in which they have been prevented by the amendments.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It is not possible to quantify the amount of potential revenue involved, as no activities of this type have taken place. The calculations would be complicated, so it is difficult to assess the extent to which the procedures have been used.

I shall briefly explain how the system would work. To exploit the defects in the Bill as drafted, a promoter of a coupon-stripping scheme would engage in something like the following sequence of operations. First, he would issue deep discount securities for cash. Then, at a later date, the cash would be invested in securities where the coupons were to be stripped. Later, but before the end of the first income period of the deep discount securities, some of the securities in which the coupon-stripping company had invested would be sold, so as to take the percentage of relevant securities that it owned below the 75 per cent. limit. The coupon-stripping company would then convert its deep discount securities into new securities and shortly after would re-acquire the relevant securities that it had previously sold. The process would be repeated.

This type of arrangement could enable the provisions of the Bill as drafted to be avoided, because paragraph !(3) at present applies only to the tests that operate on the position of the coupon-stripping company at the time when it issues the deep discount securities.

The purpose of the amendment is to stop this type of device by ensuring that the first test of a coupon-stripping operation in paragraph 1(4), which looks at what happens over the first income period, is applied in a modified way when securities are converted during their first income period.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 60, in page 125, line 9, leave out

'sub-paragraph (1), (2) or (3) above does not apply'

and insert

'neither of the preceding sub-paragraphs applies'.

No. 61, in page 125, line 13, at end insert—

'(4A) This sub-paragraph applies to deep discount securities issued by a company where either—

(a) they are issued on a conversion to which section 82 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 applies of old securities, or

(b) they are issued by a company in exchange for old ecurities in circumstances in which section 85(3) of that Act applies or are treated as so issued by virtue of

section 86(1) of that Act,
and in this sub-paragraph "old securities" means deep discount securities to which sub-paragraph (1), (2) or (4) above or this sub-paragraph applies, except that securities to which sub-paragraph (4) above applies are not old securities unless sub-paragraph (4) (b) has been fulfilled in their case by the time the conversion or exchange concerned takes place.'

No. 62, in page 125, line 15, leave out 'one' and insert 'any'.

No. 63, in page 125, line 19, at end insert ' "income period" has the meaning given by paragraph 1(7) of Schedule 9 to that Act.'.

No. 64, in page 125, line 20, leave out
'subsection (4) of that section'
and insert
'section 36(4) of that Act'.

No. 65, in page 126, line 32, at end insert—

'(4A) Paragraph 8(3) of that Schedule shall not apply in the case of a chargeable security which is converted or exchanged.'.

No. 66, in page 127, line 6, leave out '(3)' and insert '(4A)'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Clause 47

LIMITED PARTNERS: RESTRICTION OF RELIEFS

Mr. Peter Rees: I beg to move amendment No. 31, in page 47, line 22, leave out from 'restriction' to end of line 37 and insert

'in case of limited partners and others of reliefs in respect of losses, interest and charges and of allowances for expenditure) shall have effect where the chargeable period—

(a) in which the loss in question is sustained or incurred, or the interest or charges in question paid, or

(b) for which the allowance in question falls to be made,

begins after 19th March 1985.

(2) That Schedule shall also have effect where that period begins on or before that date and ends after it if the person sustaining or incurring the loss or paying the interest or charges, or to whom the allowance falls to be made, begins after that date to carry on as a limited partner the trade—

(a) in which, or in connection with which, the loss is sustained or incurred or the interest or charges paid, or

(b) in taxing which, or by reason of participation in which, the allowance falls to be made, and it is immaterial whether or not he was carrying on the trade otherwise than as a limited partner on or before that date.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): It will be convenient also to take Government amendments Nos. 67 to 73.

Mr. Rees: The purpose of the amendment is to allow the taxpayer to elect for the indexation of allowances to be based on the value of an asset at 31 March 1982 where the taxpayer making the disposal did not hold the asset at that time and each disposal of the asset since that time has been subject to a particular provision specifying that neither a gain nor a loss should arise. I am sure that the good sense of that will commend itself to the House and I hope that on that basis the House will accept the amendment.

Mr. Blair: I should like the Chief Secretary's assurance that we have understood the effect of the interlocking amendments. As I understand it, they tighten the anti-avoidance provisions in relation to limited partnerships by ensuring that they cover losses created by capital allowances as well as losses created by income. On that basis, the Opposition are happy to support the amendments. I wanted to ensure that we had understood the amendments correctly.

Mr. Peter Rees: I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. The provision is designed to include capital allowances as well as charges on income and losses.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 11

LIMITED PARTNERS: RESTRICTION OF RELIEFS

Amendments made: No. 67, in page 127, line 35, leave out from '(3)' to end of line 38 and insert:
below—

(a) in respect of a loss sustained by him in a trade, or of interest paid by him in connection with the carrying on of a trade, in a relevant year of assessment, or

(b) as an allowance falling to be made to him for a relevant year of assessment either in taxing a trade or by way of discharge or repayment of tax to which he is entitled by reason of his participation in a trade.'

No. 68, in page 128, line 16, leave out from '(3)' to end of line 19 and insert
'above—

(a) in respect of a loss sustained by him in the trade, or of interest paid by him in connection with carrying it on, in any relevant year of assessment, or

(b) as an allowance falling to be made to him for any relevant year of assessment either in taxing the trade or by way of discharge or repayment of tax to which he is entitled by reason of his participation in the trade;'.

No. 69, in page 128, line 23, leave out
', the expenditure incurred or the interest paid' and insert 'or the interest paid, or for which the allowance falls to be made'.

No. 70, in page 128, line 26, at end insert—

'(5) To the extent that an allowance is taken into account in computing profits or gains or losses in the year of loss by virtue of section 169(1) of the Taxes Act it shall, for the purposes of section 47 of this Act and this paragraph, be treated as falling to be made in the year of loss (and not the year of assessment for which the year of loss is the basis year).'

No. 71, in page 128, line 30, leave out from '(3)' to second 'in' in line 32 and insert
'below—

(a) in respect of a loss incurred by a company in a trade, or of charges paid by a company in connection with the carrying on of a trade, in a relevant accounting period, or

(b) as an allowance falling to be made to a company for a relevant accounting period either in taxing a trade or by way of discharge or repayment of tax to which it is entitled by reason of its participation in a trade;

and'.

No. 72, in page 129, line 4, leave out from '(3)' to end of line 7 and insert
'above—

(a) in respect of a loss incurred by the partner company in the trade, or of charges paid by it in connection with carrying it on, in any relevant accounting period, or

(b) as an allowance falling to be made to the partner company for any relevant accounting period either in taxing the trade or by way of discharge or repayment of tax to which it is entitled by reason of its participation in the trade;'.

No. 73, in page 129, line 12, leave out
'or expenditure is incurred or the charges paid' and insert 'is incurred or the charges paid, or for which the allowance falls to be made'.—[Mr. Moore.]

Clause 54

TIME WHEN CAPITAL EXPENDITURE IS INCURRED

Mr. Moore: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 51, line 38, leave out '(3) and' and insert '(2A) to'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It will be convenient also to take Government amendments Nos. 33 and 34.

Mr. Moore: During our deliberations in Committee we had a full and useful debate about the clause. There was agreement that it dealt satisfactorily with the majority of capital expenditure contracts even if the agreement did not extend to the exact size of the majority. I undertook further to consider points that worried hon. Members and interested parties outside the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) also mentioned the point. The amendments represent refinements of the basic rules in the clause and are the result of that further deliberation. Amendments No. 32 and 33 are directed at a kind of construction contract which provides for payment to be made throughout the contract as predetermined stages or milestones are reached. Often, payment for a stage becomes due when an engineer or architect has certified that the work has been completed satisfactorily. Another common feature of that type of work is that the asset becomes the property of the taxpayer as it is built and before any certificate is completed — before an unconditional obligation to pay for that part of the work arises.

In those circumstances, when the event which brings about that unconditional obligation to pay comes about early in the new year—we have specified one month—it seems to us entirely reasonable to ensure that the capital allowances treatment conforms with the balance sheet treatment and that is what amendments Nos. 32 and 33 seek to do.

On amendment No. 34, we said in Committee that if we had evidence that the present period of three months allowed in clause 54(3) was not right, we should consider the matter again and return to it on Report.

Since then, we have discussed the matter with the Institute of Taxation and the CBI, and several reasons have been put to us as to why we should support the case that some extension is warranted.

The point has been made that credit periods are often expressed in days rather than months, and in periods of up to 100 days. A 100-day credit period would fall outside the present three calendar month period. It is not unknown for a credit period to begin to run from the end of the month in which the invoice is delivered. Where a three-month credit is measured in this way it, too, would be outside clause 54 as it stands. While acknowledging that the three-month period in clause 54 should deal with the vast majority of cases, several bodies have said that four months would clear the bulk of the residue so that any additional compliance costs as a result of this part of the clause should become truly insignificant. We think that there is a case for a small extension of the credit period and we are proposing an extension of one month. This is the basis of this series of interlocking amendments.

Mr. Blair: Amendments Nos. 32 and 33 deal with a different situation from amendment No. 34. As I understand it, they deal with the situation where plant, machinery or buildings are being made for the taxpayer and payments are made in stages. The amendment deals with a situation where the work might be completed in one accounting year but the liability to pay crystallises within the first month of the next year. That is particularly so in circumstances where an architect's or engineer's certificate is issued and that is the crystallising event. It often happens in commercial contracts, particularly building contracts. If the certificate is signed in the first month of the new accounting year, that enables the taxpayer to claim relief in the old year. In other words, it is a framework for the time when expenditure is incurred.

The other Government amendment is No. 34.

Mr. Randall: I should like to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) whether the Minister's explanation was adequate. I listened carefully to the Minister, and although he described the problem very thoroughly, he did not say how the amendment overcame the problems involving certificates of completion. Will my hon. Friend be asking the Minister to explain how these amendments do the job because we had a detailed discussion on this in Committee?

Mr. Blair: I am delighted to give way to the Financial Secretary if he wishes to give an explanation.

Mr. Moore: The amendment seeks only to give a modicum of flexibility at a key point where we have the particular problem of the unconditionality relationship. It gives a modicum of flexibility which might be quite important at the year end. That is the essence of what it does.

Mr. Blair: To try to flesh out what the Financial Secretary has said for the benefit of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall), the time when capital expenditure is incurred is essential in deciding when a claim for capital allowances can arise. The question is, at what point is that capital expenditure incurred? There can be situations where it is easy to say that the capital expenditure is incurred because the obligation to pay has become unconditional, but there may be circumstances in which it is more difficult to say that the obligation to pay has become unconditional, for example, where there is a series of stage payments and a certificate is required to be issued by an architect or engineer saying that the work is up to a particular standard. This amendment gives a little bit of leeway. It is difficult to pluck a figure out of the air, but the amendment has taken a one-month date and is saying that in the circumstances, where the certificate is issued within one month of the new accounting period, a taxpayer can still make the claim in respect of the old accounting period. That flexibility has been introduced.

We debated amendment No. 34 at some length in Committee from two different angles — first, the circumstances where the credit period allowed by the Government, which was a three-month period, may be unnaturally short and, secondly, the circumstances where the normal payment time might be less than three months and there could be some prospect of avoidance there. The Under-Secretary has extended the period so that we are dealing now with a period of four months rather than the original period of three months. That means that when credit is given up to a four-month period it is still, when the obligation to pay becomes unconditional, crucial to determine when the capital allowance can be claimed.

The difficulties that I raised in relation to this in Committee still remain. We are assuming that the credit period may be unnaturally extended, say beyond the four-month period, to allow avoidance. There may be circumstances where the normal credit period might be less than four months and, by allowing a four-month period, there would be avoidance.

I appreciate that the Financial Secretary has decided, on consideration, that such avoidance is a small possibility, but I should be grateful if he would respond to this point. I repeat what I said in Committee. We are trying to ensure that the credit period given is in accordance with normal commercial usage. Those words are used in a different part of the clause and I am still not entirely convinced that they could not have done this in a better way. I appreciate that these are difficult matters to judge.

The Minister has obviously taken account of the representations that have been made to give some sort of leeway in introducing the amendments. I hope that it will not be thought churlish if I contrast the ease with which perfectly sensible amendments may be introduced and representations from several parts of industry can be listened to when we are discussing such things as capital allowance with the less than listening Government who dealt with some of the matters about which we were talking yesterday. I am thinking in particular of what my hon. Friend for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) said about work-place nurseries.

I appreciate that the Government have to pay attention to the representations that have been made, but one sometimes wonders whether the Government do not pay more attention to representations from certain quarters than they do to representations from other quarters. If the alacrity with which the difficulties relating to capital allowances for companies have been dealt with was transferred across the broad spectrum of taxation problems, we might have a much more efficient and equitable taxation system.

Mr. Randall: I am still not happy with the answer that the Financial Secretary gave. I am sure that he has attempted to do this in the best possible way. The answer to the tripartite discussion that we had is that the Government have introduced a modicum of flexibility. We are talking about completion dates for construction contracts, payments and so on. However, we should rise above that to see what this clause means in quantitive terms, for example, to the construction industry in terms of capital allowances.

What consultations has the Minister had with the industry, and what has it said about the modicum of flexibility? I have not looked up the word modicum in the dictionary, but it does not convey the idea of a huge change in capital allowances for the construction industry. I see it as a rather small change. Perhaps the Minister could give us some feel for the order of magnitude of the relief given to the construction industry through the capital allowances.

Mr. Moore: I was using "modicum" as the description of one month in relation to a year. I apologise if the word lacked a certain precision. The extent to which this is a complex sector was discussed in Committee, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said. We were trying to put into statutory form a complex new attempt to interpret a set of commitments to pay by purchasers at a point at which they became absolutely unconditional obligations. That was an entirely new concept and the basic purpose was to try to put on the statute book normal accountancy practice. As the hon. Member will remember from our debates upstairs, normal accountancy practice was a rather difficult thing to pursue, locate and establish. There seemed to be many different principles and it was an attempt to fit correctly into the pattern and practice of the majority of British industry.

10.15 pm

In Committee one of my hon. Friends and one of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends raised the matter of milestone contracts and the problems of the construction industry. To that extent, my officials continued, as I said they would, the whole process of attempting to make sure that our legislation got the issue right. Because of the nature of accountancy practice in putting these obligations unconditionally on to the accounting books of companies, my officials found that they differed somewhat from our attempt to get the unconditional obligation to pay. In an important part of British industry, we tried to find a modicum in terms of a month to allow flexibility. I cannot pretend that the industry is totally satisfied with that.

In the judgment of the Inland Revenue and the Government, that brings to bear a fair balance of judgment, and, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield said, it gives protection to the Revenue as well as helping the accounting systems of our major construction companies.

I would not suggest that the hon. Member for Sedgefield was being churlish, because he would find great difficulty in ever being churlish. In the debates in Standing Committee, we were trying to put into statutory form for the first time the normal accountancy practices, and it did not seem unwise to take account of the advice of industry about that. As he said, there was a dispute — both sides were displayed in Committee — about whether it was to be three or four months.

In Standing Committee, the hon. Gentleman rightly identified one of the problems of the Government, which was to try to ensure that one could find a solution—I accept his argument that it is a matter of judgment—that does not create a possibility or encourage the problems of avoidance. I understand the points he is making and I think there are two reasons why any worries are likely to be misplaced. Perhaps we did not elaborate sufficiently in Committee. Most buyers and sellers operate at arm's length, with one wanting to pay the lowest price possible —a long credit period would be likely to affect the price—and the other party to the transaction trying to obtain his money as soon as possible. We think it improbable that present practices in the market place would be much affected or would change because of clause 54, as amended.

I went on to describe upstairs the workings of the anti-avoidance feature. I listened very carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said. Obviously, we have come to a judgment on the three points I made earlier after further discussion with people outside. If, having established this, we judge that the clause is in any way being abused, we will come in very quickly to seek to tidy it up. We are trying to judge the right length of time. I will be happy to come back and inform the hon. Member if we think it merits further scrutiny.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made:

No. 33, in page 51, line 42, at end insert—

'(2A) If, under or by virtue of any agreement,—

(a) as a result of the issue of a certificate or some other event, an obligation to pay an amount of capital expenditure on the provision of an asset becomes unconditional, and

[Mr. Moore]

> (b) at a time before that obligation becomes unconditional, the asset becomes the property of or is otherwise under the contract attributed to the person having that obligation,
>
> then, in a case where the obligation referred to in paragraph (a) above becomes unconditional within the period of one month beginning at the end of a chargeable period or its basis period but the time referred to in paragraph (b) above falls at or before the end of that chargeable period or its basis period, subsection (2) above shall apply as if the obligation became unconditional immediately before the expiry of that period.'.

No. 34, in page 52, line 4, leave out 'three' and insert 'four'. —[Mr. Moore.]

Clause 55

ELECTION FOR CERTAIN MACHINERY OR PLANT TO BE TREATED AS SHORT-LIFE ASSETS

Mr. Nell Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 155, in page 53, line 4, leave out '1986' and insert '1984'.

This amendment is designed to bring forward the date on which the new capital allowance treatment for short-life assets comes into force from 1 April 1986. The Government have accepted that short-life assets require a special regime, and I applaud the measure they have brought forward. It will allow the taxpayer to elect within two years of the purchase of the asset for the asset to be treated as short life and he would therefore be entitled to receive a balance allowance or suffer a balancing charge if he disposed of his acquisition.

The amendment would apply this treatment to all assets from the time that the 100 per cent. first-year allowances for machinery and plant were withdrawn rather than waiting until only the 25 per cent. reducing balance annual allowances were available. It has to be remembered that depreciation starts when the asset is purchased.

The second effect of the amendment is that it would help ease the dip in capital allowances during the transitional period from the old 100 per cent. first-year allowance system. The bottom of the dip is in 1986-87. If the commencement of the short-life treatment is brought forward from 1 April 1986 to 1 April 1984, some balancing allowances will occur in 1986-87 and reduce the dip, making it less deep. Even if the balancing allowance occurs before 1986-87, it will improve the company's cash flow and help it cope with the dip that much better.

The amendment is an ameliorative measure and I hope that it will appeal to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Blair: The amendment makes me suspicious, but I am not entirely sure why. I want to make sure that I have understood exactly what is being proposed.

Clause 55 gives a certain exceptional treatment to short-life assets and in many ways the amendment results from what happened last year and the problems arising from the 1984 Budget taking away capital allowances.

The improvement in capital allowances for short-life assets applies at present to expenditure incurred after 1 April 1986, and that is when first-year allowances will be phased out. The amendment would bring forward the date to April 1984, and that would be the start of the phasing-out period and not its conclusion.

In a perfect world it would mean that the exemption of short-life assets from the provisions of last year's Budget would be given from the moment the first-year allowances started to be phased out rather than there being somewhat of a hiatus between April 1984 and April 1986. If the election for certain machinery to be treated as short-life assets and the preferential treatment given to them can only be given after 1 April 1986, there is the period between April 1984 and April 1986 when the first-year allowances are being phased out and the treatment of short-life assets will not be as good as it will after 1 April 1986.

I always approach amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) with an extremely open mind. I always assume that they will fairly distribute the burden between the taxpayer and the Revenue. But my hon. Friends behind me who have greater experience than I in these matters tell me to be more cautious. I should like to ask the Financial Secretary—it may be that the hon. Member for Tatton will deal with it when he comes to press or to withdraw his amendent — whether the difficulties of administration with this type of amendment would not be considerable. There would be every opportunity going back to 1 April 1984 for elections to be made in circumstances where perhaps there was a very much greater burden on the Revenue than might otherwise have been thought.

Mr. Tim Smith: I cannot see that the amendment will be of much value. In the period from 1 April 1984 to 31 March 1985 a taxpayer could get an allowance of 75 per cent. on the asset which he acquired. Therefore, of what value will the amendment be?

Mr. Blair: Between now and 1986 the amount that could be claimed will not be 75 per cent. but less than that —50 per cent. this year. If the date were put back to April 1984, a taxpayer could take full advantage of the relief under clause 55 back to April 1984. Therefore, the amendment would bring taxpayers an advantage.

The difficulty with the amendment is that it appears to be open to potential abuse, but the Financial Secretary will no doubt give us the answer to these conundrums.

Mr. Randall: I am a little suspicious, because we have already had a similar amendment from the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). He is a charming man, but I am suspicious of him on financial matters. I do not trust him — I mean that in the kindest sense. I am not suggesting that he is dishonest, but I do not understand his motives.

Dr. Marek: It is precisely because we understand the hon. Gentleman's motives that we are suspicious. Conservative Members represent the rich and the idle rich. We know whom they represent and what their motives are.

Mr. Randall: I am a gentle person, and I am not prepared to go as far as my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek).

We are discussing bringing forward the date when short-life assets can be paid. The hon. Member for Tatton suggested that that would apply to all assets where the 100 per cent. capital allowances have been withdrawn. He talked about the improvement in companies' cash flows, and clearly the amendment would achieve that. One can see why companies would like to claim their allowances earlier because of the obvious consequences in that respect.

I feel that there is something behind the amendment which the hon. Gentleman did not fully describe. Will the Minister explain fully the consequences of the amendment to business in terms of money from the Exchequer? Would the amendment be particularly beneficial? Finally, what scope exists for abuse?

Mr. Moore: I shall respond quickly to the question of cost. It is always the Treasury's unfortunate task to put cost on to the record. The cost would not begin until 1987-88, when it would be £10 million. In 1988-89 it would be £50 million, in 1989-90 £70 million, and thereafter there would be a saving on present costings.

Although I shall not go into the underlying strategy of the capital allowance changes — we may have an opportunity for that later—it may be useful to remind the House that from April 1986 the capital allowance system for machinery and plant will be based on a pool of expenditure, attracting an annual allowance of 25 per cent. on a reducing balance basis. That will enable most business equipment to be written off over a period, but on average it will more than fairly reflect its useful life. We recognise that, for those assets which depreciate much more quickly than the average, something more is needed, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the new de-pooling arrangements which we now know as clause 55. According to advice from my Revenue officials, we do not see much problem in terms of additional administration. Despite the suspicions of Opposition Members, we do not see the problems of potential for abuse — as opposed to the cost, which is quite a different question — or excessive administrative difficulties.

Mr. Blair: Where does the cost come from?

10.30 pm

Mr. Moore: I think the hon. Gentleman will appreciate the point when I go through the arithmetic. It is clear that there is a modest advantage entailed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) talked about the dip—the point raised by the CBI. I refer to it in the context of the CBI's reference, as opposed to endorsing the concept of a dip. As my hon. Friend will know, there will always be difficulty in any period of transition where major change is enacted. The Government were very conscious of that in 1984, when framing the capital allowance proposals to give assistance specifically during that transitional period. Therefore, the Government advanced, first by one year, the pattern of reduction in corporation tax rate. Clearly, the reduction in rate will benefit the company sector. Those are factors which have to be taken to the other side of the ledger. Equally, we are making those changes at a time of greatly improving corporate profitability and liquidity, which is an important factor in relation to the proposal.

The option to de-pool assets is to be an integral part —this is the point that the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) was making—of the new capital allowance system and not part of the old one, which does not come to its end until 31 March 1986. In the period from March 1984 to 1985, expenditure on business machinery and plant attracted a first-year allowance of 75 per cent., and in the period April 1985 to March 1986 it attracts a first-year allowance of 50 per cent. It is only from April next year that, for businesses generally, first-year allowances disappear altogether, and the new system, including the refinement for short-lived assets, is fully in place. As opposed to what my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said, I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton will appreciate the details of the impact on company investment during the transitional period.

In 1984-85, with a 75 per cent. first-year allowance, the company's investment is written down by 82 per cent. in just two years, almost to residual value. In 1985-86, the second transitional year, with a 50 per cent. first-year allowance, within three years nearly three-quarters of the initial cost will have been written off for tax. Against that background I do not see any case for bringing forward the starting date for just one element in the new system. The new system is an integral system. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton, having probed the matter, will not press his amendment.

Sir William Clark: If there is any suspicion relating to my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), that suspicion relates also to me, as I signed the amendment.

The Minister referred to the cost to the Exchequer. Will he agree that it is only a cash flow loss and nothing whatever to do with loss of revenue, and that my hon. Friend is only trying to give a cash flow advantage?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is right. That was the whole nature of the debate, in which so many of us have been involved, on capital allowances. It is a debate relating to cash flow. The amendment, in the names of my hon. Friends the Members for Tatton and Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) seeks to assist what they see as the particular problem of British industry. In the Government's judgment, we have covered the problems in the transitional arrangements.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: As my hon. Friend has vindicated my character and allayed the suspicions of Opposition Members, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made:

No. 35, in page 54, line 23, at end insert—

'(5A) If, at a time before the notional trade would otherwise be permanently discontinued for the purposes of section 44, the short-life asset begins to be used otherwise than for a qualifying purpose, within the meaning of section 64 of the Finance Act 1980 (leased assets used for certain purposes) and the occasion of its beginning to be so used falls within the requisite period, within the meaning of that section, then at that time—

(a) the notional trade shall be treated as permanently discontinued but no balancing allowance or charge shall be made to or on the trader by reason thereof, and

(b) the amount which, apart from this subsection, would be the trader's qualifying expenditure for the chargeable period in which, or in the basis period for which, the asset began to be so used shall for the purposes of section 44 (as it has effect in accordance with section 65 of the Finance Act 1980) be added to the trader's qualifying expenditure for that chargeable period in respect of the separate trade referred to in subsection (2) of the said section 65.'.

No. 36, in page 54, line 24, leave out from 'if' to 'the' in line 25 and insert

'at a time before the notional trade is permenantly discontinued for the purposes of section 44.'.

No. 37, in page 54, line 43, leave out 'and this subsection'.—[Mr. John Moore.]

Clause 57

ENTITLEMENT TO ALLOWANCES FOR MACHINERY AND PLANT WHICH ARE FIXTURES

Mr. Moore: I beg to move amendment No. 38, in page 56, line 42, at end insert—

'(8) Nothing in subsection (1) above affects the entitlement of any person to an allowance by virtue of section 85 of the Capital Allowances Act 1968 (allowances in respect of contributions of a capital nature) and, accordingly, in paragraph 15(6) of Schedule 8 to the Finance Act 1971 (modification of the operation of section 85 in relation to allowances for machinery and plant) after the words "the said Chapter I", where they last occur, there shall be inserted "or Schedule 15 to the Finance Act 1985".'.

This deals with a matter discussed in Committee in consideration of amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). We have looked closely at the problem identified by that discussion, and the amendment is the result.

As it stands, clause 57 allows only the person to whom fixtures are treated by schedule 15 as belonging to receive capital allowances on those fixtures. However, it has been put to us that this could upset long-established methods of commercial funding where, for example, one company contributes to the capital expenditure incurred by another on machinery or plant which is a fixture, and in which both have a commercial interest. The amendment will allow these arrangements to continue to be made unaffected by the clause and its schedules.

While commending it to the House, I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton and the hon. Member for Sedgefield for their diligence in ensuring that we had the benefit of their advice.

Mr. Blair: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for having taken account of our representations. I believe that this deals with the problems of contributor companies.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 15

CAPITAL ALLOWANCES FOR FIXTURES

Amendment made:

No. 74, in page 141, line 30, leave out 'debtor' and insert 'person having that right'—[Mr. Moore.]

Mr. Moore: I beg to move amendment No. 75, in page 147, line 46, at end insert

'and

(c) the occasion of the fixture ceasing to belong to the former owner is not its permanent severance from the relevant land (whether on disposal, demolition, destruction or otherwise)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 76 to 78.

Mr. Moore: These four amendments substantially alter the rules which require disposal value to be brought into account when a fixture is treated as no longer belonging to someone for capital allowance purposes.

The difficulties at which the amendments are aimed arise because the value of fixtures turns very much on the value of land to which they are attached. At the extreme, the fixtures in a building may be very valuable, but they are not worth much to someone whose lease has only one day to run. The rules which we had originally intended are contained in paragraph 9 of schedule 15. Paragraph 9 provides a general set of rules which require the adoption of a notional sale price based on an apportionment of some arbitrary assumptions about the open market value of the interest in the land to which the fixtures are attached.

Originally, this approach was regarded as necessary so that on the basis of that open market valuation at least some capital allowances could be recovered from the old owner and the fixtures at the same time as the new owner began to receive allowances.

It has been widely suggested by the British Property Federation, the CBI, all the accountancy bodies and the Institute of Taxation that the rules should give greater recognition to the actual consideration — the hon. Member for Sedgefield referred to this—if any, of the fixtures which passes between the parties concerned, assuming that they are acting on an arm's length basis. It is that which the amendments do.

The amendments in practice will considerably reduce the extent to which open market value calculations have to be made and correspondingly will increase the extent to which the actual sale proceeds which pass between the old and new owners of a fixture can be brought into the old owner's capital allowances computation.

We believe that, even though it is longer than the present set of rules, this alternative approach to dispose of value can be widely welcomed by those concerned with this difficult subject, whether directly or as professional advisers, since a great deal of work on valuations and apportionments will be avoided altogether.

Mr. Randall: I have a brief question. I was interested to hear the Minister's explanation in which he suggests that we de-couple certain fixtures from assets like land and other assets which should not be taken into account in deciding values when computing the capital allowances. I am wondering whether, in carrying out the computations, this de-coupling exercise might be susceptible to abuse. Land is a fairly cut and dried issue, but there must be other examples where it would be necessary for the Inland Revenue to de-couple the assets in such a way that the boundary becomes blurred and a judgment therefore more difficult to make. Can the Financial Secretary say whether he thinks that in some of the other examples where this exercise will need to take place there might be the opportunity for abuse?

Mr. Moore: I shall examine very carefully the hon. Gentleman's point. We are very conscious of the problem of avoidance. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) raised in Committee a similar point and we gave assurances upon it. I am happy to give assurances on this point. However, I shall look at the matter again and will write to the hon. Gentleman if I find that there is any need to consider the matter further.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 76, in page 148, line 3, leave out 'this paragraph' and insert 'sub-paragraphs (1A) to (3A) below'.

No. 77, in page 148, line 4, leave out from beginning to 'the' and insert—

'(1A) Subject to sub-paragraph (3A) below, if the occasion of the fixture ceasing to belong to the former owner is the sale of the qualifying interest, the price referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above is that portion of the sale price of the qualifying interest which falls (or, if the purchaser were entitled to an allowance, would fall) to be treated for material purposes as expenditure incurred by the purchaser on the provision of the fixture.

(1B) If the fixture ceases to belong to the former owner by virtue of sub-paragraph (5) of paragraph 7 above, the price referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above is so much of the capital sum referred to in sub-paragraph (1)(c) of paragraph 5 above as falls to be treated for material purposes as expenditure by the lessee on the provision of fixture.

(2) If neither sub-paragraph (1A) nor sub-paragraph (1B) above applies.'.

No. 78, in page 148, leave out lines 14 to 22 and insert—

'(3A) If the sale referred to in sub-paragraph (1A) above is at a price lower than that which the qualifying interest would have fetched if sold in the open market, that sub-paragraph shall not apply unless the purchaser's expenditure on the acquisition of the fixture can be taken into account as mentioned in section 44(6)(b)(i) of the Finance Act 1971.

(3B) If the occasion of the fixture ceasing to belong to the former owner is the expiry of the qualifying interest, then, except in so far as the former owner receives any capital sum, by way of compensation or otherwise, by reference to the fixture, the disposal value of the fixture which fails to be brought into account under section 44 of the Finance Act 1971 shall be nil.

(3C) In any case where—

(a) the disposal value of a fixture falls to be brought into account in accordance with section 44 of the Finance Act 1971 on the permanent discontinuance of the trade in circumstances where that value falls to be determined under paragraph (e) of subsection (6) of that section; and

(b) before the occurrence of the later event referred to in that paragraph, the fixture is not permanently severed from the relevant land, that paragraph shall apply as if the reference therein to paragraph (a) and paragraph (b) of that subsection were omitted; but if the event which follows the discontinuance of the trade is the sale of the qualifying interest, the disposal value of the fixture to be brought into account under that section shall be that portion of the sale price referred to in sub-paragraph (1A) above.

(3D) If the disposal value of the fixture falls to be brought into account in accordance with section 44 of the Finance Act 1971 on its beginning to be used wholly or partly for purposes which are other than those of the trade, paragraph (f) of subsection (6) of that section shall apply as if the reference to the price which the machinery or plant would have fetched if sold on the open market were a reference to that portion of the price referred to in sub-paragraph (2) above.

(3E) If, on the occasion of the fixture being treated, by virtue of paragraph 7 above, as ceasing to belong to the former owner, another person incurs expenditure on the provision of the fixture, there shall be disregarded for material purposes so much (if any) of that expenditure as exceeds the disposal value which the former owner is required to bring into account in accordance with section 44 of the Finance Act 1971.'.—[Mr. Moore.]

Clause 60

AGRICULTURAL LAND AND BUILDINGS

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I beg to move amendment No. 39, in page 57, line 23, leave out '1986' and insert '1989'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 40, in page 57, line 27, leave out '1987' and insert '1990'.

No. 41, in page 57, line 42, at end add

'(5) For the purposes of this section as it applies for income tax purposes the date "6th April 1989" shall be substituted for the date "1st April 1986" in subsection (1) hereof and the date "6th April 1990" shall be substituted for the date "1st April 1987" in subsection (1)(b) hereof.'.

Mr. Powell: This amendment, together with amendments Nos. 40 and 41, has the effect of modifying by deferring the severe impact upon the agricultural industry of the elimination of the initial allowance and the reduction of the annual write-off from 10 to 4 per cent. per annum. The amendments relate to the Bill as a United Kingdom Bill. Most of the right hon. and hon. Members who have put their names to these amendments represent Northern Ireland constituencies. That is not surprising, since the impact and the arguments in relation to the change are probably the most severe in relation to the general run of the farming industry in Northern Ireland. Nevertheless, we are happy that the broad acres of Cheshire have been associated by the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) with the drumlins and mountains of Ulster.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: And bogs.

Mr. Powell: Bogs could well, as the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) suggests, be added to the landscape for the sake of completeness.

The reduction of these allowances was made in a specific context. It was made in connection with corporation tax relief. Consequently, for most farm businesses that are not liable to corporation tax there have been the disadvantages, unaccompanied by the counter-balancing advantages. In the case of the writing down figure in particular, the reduction from 10 to 4 per cent. per annum is severe in its impact upon most forms of agricultural capital. There are certain forms of agricultural capital where a 25-year period of write-off might be reasonable, but for most agricultural buildings a period much shorter than 25 years before they are required to be renewed and replaced is now reasonable. Buildings that are associated with use for animals or buildings where the processes of corrosion, as in the handling of slurry, are relevant are particularly short in life. Consequently the write-off over 25 years instead of 10 years is serious in its impact.

I know that it can be argued that there is always at the end of the life of an asset a balancing allowance which can be made if the value has been unexhausted by the annual write-off. However, that does not affect the financial position of the farm or undertaking during the life of the asset. It remains a disadvantage that an asset that is replaced after 10 years has been depreciated over 25 years.

The supporters of the amendments appreciate that the new system of initial and write-off allowances hangs together. Therefore, we ask only for a deferment of the impact so that those who will be severely affected will have the opportunity to rearrange the finances of their businesses to meet the new conditions under which they will have to operate.

The problem comes home particularly to the small farmer who will be affected by the income tax rather than the corporation tax aspects of the new provisions. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will further illustrate to the Government why a deferment of the impact for three years, as proposed by the amendments, would be just and welcome.

10.45 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I endorse the closing comments of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). The amendments are designed to ameliorate the position of the small farmer and the family farmer who is not incorporated.

When we discussed in Committee a number of other amendments affecting agriculture, I was the butt of some ridicule and ribaldry from Labour Members for defending an interest that was already heavily subsidised by the taxpayer. As the House knows, I hold no brief for the common agricultural policy and all the anomalies and absurdities that characterise it.

[Mr. Neil Hamilton]

The income of a small farmer is relatively low, although he has a large capital asset, the value of which has been built up largely because of the CAP. The amendments seek to ameliorate the position of farmers who survive on low incomes, who will be greatly affected by the speed at which we move from the old system of allowances to the new one.

Most farmers in my constituency are dairy farmers and they have been adversely affected by changes in the CAP. Their incomes have been depressed and their businesses weakened. I am no friend of the surpluses inherent in the CAP and I want us to move to a more rational system, but the transitional period must be a reasonable one. The amendments seek to help the small family farmer for a transitional period.

The amendments would also give an impetus to conservation of the countryside. When farmers' incomes are reduced, they are less likely to spend money on farm buildings and other visible assets. As a result, the countryside may be adversely affected. Several farmers in my constituency have spent money on buildings so that they merge attractively into the countryside. All hon. Members would applaud that aim. It is a question of improving cash flow so that such schemes can be continued.

The 4 per cent. writing down allowance does not represent a realistic rate of depreciation for many modern farmers. That is unfortunate. It is extraordinary that, under the new system, the balance of tax relief is moved in favour of investment in machinery and against buildings, the construction of which creates more employment. The machinery write-off in the first year will be 25 per cent. instead of 100 per cent., but for farm buildings the write-off in the first year will be 4 per cent. instead of 30 per cent. Machinery allowances are reduced by a factor of four, but for buildings the factor is over seven.

I agree with what has been said about the unincorporated business. There is a counter-balancing advantage for incorporated businesses in the reduction in corporation tax. I applaud the Government's strategy, but I hope that we can do something for the income tax payer rather than the corporation tax payer. The amendments suggest changes to help farmers.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) referred to small farmers. Very few large farmers exist in Northern Ireland. By reducing allowances, the Government are simply trying to return to the position which prevailed before the high inflation rate under which we have suffered in the last 10 to 15 years.

It is laudable for any Government to take such steps. However, the Government are treating all farm and industrial buildings as if they were the same. I declare an interest since I own a small farm. I have a farming background and I know how to dig a drain. That is how I earned my living for 15 years.

The Government are treating buildings which are different as if they were the same. They do not seem to recognise that farm buildings are different from industrial buildings in many respects. Industrial buildings have a long life; even if they cannot be used for their original purpose they are so adaptable that they can be used for many other purposes. Most farm buildings have a relatively low output and many are used for only part of the year. Cattlehouses, for instance, are used only in the winter months. During those months the metal work deteriorates more quickly than it does in other buildings. That is a fact of life. If barley is dried in a building it will deteriorate even more quickly.

The life span of farm buildings varies according to the use to which they are put. For instance, a store is a simple and cheap building which will usually last a long time, but a silage pit is a building which has to be roofed over in the wetter parts of the United Kingdom and it is costly although it is used for only a short time each year. Pig and poultry buildings are intensively used. We must give closer consideration to the matter.

Many farm buildings, especially those erected for pigs and poultry, are highly specialised and cannot be used for any other purpose. Big changes have taken place in farming in the last 10 to 15 years—so much so that once profitable enterprises have vanished from the scene, especially in Ulster. It is not apparent to those who are not farmers that severe working conditions apply on farms during the winter months. That is why buildings are vital, for the comfort not only of farm animals but of those who look after them.

A highly specialised work force has grown up in erecting farm buildings, with many people employed permanently on that work. In recent years, however, farming has suffered a number of blows which have reduced the amount of money available for the erection of farm buildings. The industry has lost the initial allowance, the writing down allowances are being reduced and there are lower farm grants. It is clear from what was said in the House on Monday that those grants will be greatly reduced in the future. The cash flow problems of farmers will increase considerably in the near future, and I regret that the Government seem to be adding daily to their problems.

In Northern Ireland—I cannot speak for the rest of the United Kingdom—most industry receives industrial development grants for machinery. Farming does not. Farm buildings have always had a short writing down period. Conditions have not changed so much in recent years as to enable the Government to depart from the long-established practice in that respect. I hope that the Government will look again at this issue, will take on board the representations that are being made tonight and will act to relieve farmers of the burdens that are currently being heaped upon them.

Mr. James Nicholson (Newry and Armagh): I support what hon. Members have said on this subject. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross), I have an argicultural interest and am well aware of the problems that are being caused to the industry in Northern Ireland.

The proposed changes will greatly add to the difficulties of those engaged in agriculture. The proposal to extend the 10-year write-off period to 25 years will mean many agricultural buildings becoming obsolete and having to be replaced by more modern ones even before the old ones have been written off. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) outlined the position correctly when he referred to the various types of agricultural building, and I will not go over the ground that he covered.

The present system has been in operation for over 40 years and has proved adequate. We are asking for farmers to be given a reasonable period in which to adjust to the changes. Cash flow is vital to any business, including farming. In the long term and the short term, cash flow plays an important part, and I urge the Minister to consider the types of people who will be most affected by the changes.

In Northern Ireland, the small family farmer will be the hardest hit. The young farmer trying to get started at the bottom of the ladder will be hard hit as well. The proposals will be most damaging to those people. They will not be able to claim relief through the reductions in corporation tax. Few, if any, small farmers will be able to alleviate their problems if there is no offsetting.

11 pm

How many farmers are incorporated? Such farmers are few and far between in Northern Ireland. Farm businesses have already suffered from the changes in plant and machinery allowances which were introduced last year. I am informed—I may be corrected on this—that the changes will cost agriculture more than £400 million in the five-year transitional period. We must consider also what will happen in the transitional period for building allowances. Judging by present ceilings, the change could cost agriculture another £400 million.

Unfortunately, the changes can lead only to a severe decrease in investment in agriculture. Because the small farm system in Northern Ireland means that it is necessary to apply a more intensive system of agriculture than in other parts of the United Kingdom, this policy will be to our detriment. We live in a time when technology can transform any sector. This feature is most pronounced in the intensive sector of horticulture. Existing buildings can become obsolete and outdated within a short period. Will the Government award any recognition to this point, as it will concern us in the future?

Agriculture is facing a difficult time and it is unwise to add an extra burden. I ask the Financial Secretary to reflect on the changes last November in the farm capital scheme when the amount available was reduced by £40 million. My hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East referred to this week's announcement on the scheme. We can expect another large slice to be taken from the farm capital scheme. That is another reason why the Financial Secretary should afford the amendment consideration and support. Such a proposal, if passed, would have far-reaching consequences for United Kingdom agriculture, and more particularly for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Randall: I have great reservations about the amendment. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) is essentially asking for special arrangements to be made for agriculture because of the reduction in allowances associated with the corporation tax changes. I do not regard tin sheds, slurry sheds, barns, and so on as short-life assets. I cannot understand why it is necessary to give agriculture yet another boost in this way while other industries are deprived.

I should like the high tech industries to be given even more help. I know that the Government are making special arrangements to assist those industries. This is as a result of the 1984 changes arising from the Chancellor's statement on these matters. The deferment to which the right hon. Member for South Down referred is bound to mean that less money will be available for other industries. It would be of interest if the Minister can tell the House how much that will cost.

We are aware that all businesses—farming, industry and financial institutions—want to improve their cash flow, but the amendment amounts to giving agriculture special assistance. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), who supported the amendment, is asking for yet another subsidy. It is not a lump sum handout or anything like that; it is a revenue subsidy. I understand the thrust of the argument, but I cannot support the amendment.

Dr. Marek: I am not sure that I go along completely with my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). I hope that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) might elucidate a little. My experience is that small farmers in many areas need help. They do not all conform to the image commonly held of the farmer in East Anglia growing a great deal of cereals, driving a Jaguar and having two or three Range Rovers in a shed.

I have been to Northern Ireland. It is similar to Wales. I do not know what the pattern of farming in Ulster is or what the acreage is. I imagine that it is not large and that many farmers farm small acreages and just manage to make a living. I also believe that the land is not especially good. If I am wrong no doubt hon. Members will tell me. That is true of many parts of Wales.

Small farmers need help. If the amendment seeks to help them I support it. There is, however, a caveat. I do not know whether the amendment will also help the large unincorporated farmer. If it does, the amendment is not tuned finely enough. That is the problem. I do not know what effect the amendment will have. No doubt the Minister will enlighten us about that.

My sympathies are with the small farmer. More needs to be done for him, but I am not sure that the amendment is the right way to go about it.

Mr. Blair: Like all my hon. Friends, I am sympathetic to small farmers. The Labour party will long be remembered for the position that it took on the dairy quotas that the Government introduced which seriously hit many small farmers.

This amendment and the clause apply to farmers in general. It does not distinguish between large and small farmers. We must decide whether we should single out agriculture for yet another subsidy, because whether or not one calls it a subsidy that is what the provision amounts to. Those who vote for the amendment will have decided to give agriculture special treatment. There is no way of getting out of that.

One of the features of our debate this evening has been the degree to which certain hon. Members opposite have been totally against subsidies in general but wholly in favour of subsidies in particular. The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) spoke about business within his constituency and the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) talked about particular interests. They appear to adopt a view of the economy which is wholly inconsistent with the view that they adopt as monetarists in other areas. If only the same concern was shown for building up our industry, in particular our manufacturing industry, that is shown towards the special interests which they represent we would all be much better off. The truth of the matter is that when allowances were done away with last year there was a substantial withdrawal of the incentive to invest in industry. We are still dealing with those problems this year.

[Mr. Blair]

Opposition Members are unable to support these amendments, although we are not unsympathetic to the problems raised by hon. Members. Capital allowances should be looked at as they relate to industry in its entirety and not to individual sectors which may have the particular sympathy of Conservative Members.

Mr. Moore: I shall turn my attention to the specific amendments of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). The principal purpose of his amendments is to defer by three years the proposed reduction in the rate of agricultural building allowance. I am very conscious of the contributions which he and his hon. Friends have made about particular problems in the agricultural industry in the areas they represent. Having said that, it is essential that I put that request for a deferral into the context of the overall background of the Government's proposals last year. I should mention as an aside that the detailed proposals were announced in March 1984 and do not go into effect until April 1986.

As the House will know, the Government last year embarked on a major reform of business taxation. Our aim is to move to a system which is much more neutral as between different types of investment so that the pre-tax return on capital investment rather than the post-tax return becomes the basis of commercial decision making. Coupled with this is a determination to achieve lower tax rates on business profits since high rates are themselves a disincentive to investment and therefore to worthwhile economic progress.

We reduce the small companies rate of corporation tax to 30 per cent. with immediate effect. In addition, the main rate of corporation tax is oeing reduced by one-third over the period from 1984 to 1986. And for income tax, which is of principal concern to the unincorporated sector, there are a number of significant benefits flowing from both last year's Finance Bill and this year's.

These include real increases in income tax thresholds which continue the progress made in reducing levels of personal tax since this Government took office in 1979; the abolition of both the investment income surcharge and the national insurance surcharge; the capital taxation changes; the proposed reform of the capital gains tax retirement relief; and the national insurance contribution changes such as the reduction in class 2 contributions and the giving of relief on one-half of the class 4 contributions. Those have to be put in context because those last two changes in class 2 and class 4 are worth £155 million to the unincorporated sector in a full year.

The changes to the main allowances for machinery and plant and for industrial buildings were made last year. At the same time, we announced our intention to make changes this year to other allowances, including the agricultural buildings allowance. When all these changes are in place, the capital allowance system will generally be much more streamlined than before 1984; most assets qualifying for relief will attract allowances either at 25 per cent. on a reducing balance basis if they are machinery or plant, or at 4 per cent. on a straight line basis if they are buildings.

The proposed changes to the agricultural buildings allowance in this year's Finance Bill have to be seen therefore as a part of this pattern of reform. The rate of allowance for expenditure which qualifies for relief will become 4 per cent. straight line so that agricultural buildings will be treated in the same way as industrial buildings from 1 April next year, thus bringing to an end the present distortion between them in the tax system. I stress the word distortion because, before this change, industrial buildings were on a slightly better system than agricultural buildings. Both will now be on a 25 year or a 4 per cent. straight line. Industrial buildings move from six years to 25 and agricultural buildings from approximately eight years to 25.

Many buildings qualifying for the agricultural buildings allowance have long life spans so that for them relief for construction costs over a 25-year period—which is what an annual allowance of 4 per cent. straight line means — will represent a reasonable rate of relief for tax. However, I recognise, as right hon. and hon. Members have said, that this is not the whole story.

11.15 pm

Some specialist agricultural buildings, such as some kinds of farrowing houses used in pig breeding, are regarded in entirety as machinery or plant rather than "buildings" so that the entire cost qualifies at machinery and plant rates of allowance — 25 per cent. on a reducing balance basis. This writes off their cost for tax to a residual 10 per cent. over eight years. In other buildings, such as milking parlours and glasshouses, a significant part of the cost of the building may be attributed to fixtures which are also treated as machinery or plant. In either case, the building or part of it could also benefit from the new rules for short-life assets which are being introduced by clause 55, as the right hon. Member for South Down appreciates.

It has been put to us that some modern purpose-built agricultural buildings do not qualify as machinery or plant and have working lives that are very much shorter than the average. For these buildings, it is said, an annual allowance of 4 per cent. on a straight line basis is unfair; and the unfairness — this is an important point — is compounded by the absence of rules which would at least permit balancing allowances to be made when the building is sold or scrapped.

We recognise the strength of this argument. It is indeed an unusual feature of the agricultural buildings allowance that as the rules now stand, and unlike the industrial buildings allowance, balancing adjustments on the sale or destruction of an agricultural building are not possible. This has always been the case but the matter naturally assumes greater importance against the background of a longer writing-off period for tax.

Accordingly we have already set in hand a detailed review of the present agricultural buildings allowance rules so that we can consider the most appropriate ways in which the code might be restructured. How to introduce a system of balancing adjustments will be central to that review.

I know that the right hon. Member for South Down, his colleagues and my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) will be pleased when I say that it is our intention to include proposals for restructuring the allowance, to include balancing adjustments in next year's Finance Bill, with a starting date of 1 April 1986 to coincide with the date on which the annual allowance becomes 4 per cent. I shall consider carefully the particular points that have been made in the debate.

The effect of these three amendments would be to put back the starting date for the new rate of allowance by three years either for all taxpayers — incorporated and unincorporated alike — or, alternatively, possibly only for the unincorporated. It is not absolutely clear from the way in which the amendments are drafted whether they are intended to stand as a whole or whether they are alternatives.

A deferral of the new rates of agricultural buildings allowance for all taxpayers, that is companies, partnerships and individuals alike, would clearly be welcomed by those likely to benefit. However, such a deferral would be difficult both to explain and to justify to taxpayers whose capital investment is in other types of buildings such as industrial structures and hotels, for which initial allowances will have been phased out by 1 April 1986 and which will thereafter attract only the same annual allowance — 4 per cent. — as is proposed for agricultural buildings. Equally the changes to the allowances for plant and machinery, which we are making over a three-year period, will be completed next April.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As my hon. Friend has made a significant concession for next year for shorter life agricultural buildings, does he plan any comparable concession for short-life buildings in any other industries, particularly bearing in mind that agricultural buildings are the only ones that do not bear any rate liability?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend misunderstood. I was drawing attention to the absence under the present agricultural buildings allowance system of a set of balancing charges, in contradistinction to the existing balancing charges on industrial buildings.

What I was saying was that the agricultural building allowances being put on all fours merited clear consideration in advance of the review, and it seemed to me to be right that that be included in the changes taking place next year. They will not be treated advantageously in relation to industrial buildings. It would give them the same opportunity, because obviously the relevance of the change from eight to 25 years is significant in the need for such buildings to have such balancing charges.

If, on the other hand, what is intended in the alternative is a deferral for income taxpayers only — and this was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton — it is difficult to see how the exclusion of company taxpayers from such a deferral can be justified. The case for a general reform of the capital allowances which we explained in detail to the House last year — in essence making the commercial assessment of business investment more important than the tax assessment — is as valid for the unincorporated sector as it is for the incorporated. While it is true that rates of income tax are not being reduced in the same way as rates of corporation tax, we have taken a significant number of important steps to help the self-employed, some of which I have already mentioned.

Farmers carrying on their businesses as individuals or in partnership would benefit, as would the private landowner who invests capital in buildings on agricultural or forestry land. But companies carry on similar activities and also claim the agricultural buildings allowance and would have every right to feel unfairly treated.

We have looked at the matter most carefully in the light of the comments and other representations which we have received since our intentions were announced last year. We think it right, however, to proceed as planned and, in this year's Finance Bill, bring the rate of this allowance into line with the other buildings allowance with effect from 1 April next year. At the same time, we also think it right to proceed with a thorough examination of the structure of the agricultural buildings allowance so that changes which bring the rules of the present allowance also more into line with the other buildings allowances and, in particular, provide for balancing adjustments, may be introduced in next year's Bill. On that basis I urge the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw his amendment. I hope he understands the points I have made.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: It was certainly necessary that the impact of these changes upon the agricultural industry, and particularly upon some parts of it, should have been openly debated during the debate on this Finance Bill, especially as that did not happen at the Committee stage. I recognise that the form of the amendments, framed to raise the whole question, was not in itself wholly satisfactory, partly because it went for a deferment rather than for any other remedy, and also because it was unable to distinguish between one section of the industry and another. For instance, it does not distinguish between the incorporated and the non-company sector of the industry.

The result has been that it has drawn from the Government not only a recognition of the problems which the industry undergoes in making the transition from one approach to another, to capital allowances and capital taxation, but also the important statement that the Minister has made about the review of balancing charges in the context of agricultural buildings. That has been more than sufficient to justify the debate. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 61

ALLOWANCES FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURE ON SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Amendment made: No. 42, in page 58, line 8, leave out 'a building' and insert 'or of machinery or plant which forms part of a building or other structure'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Clause 65

MODIFICATION OF INDEXATION ALLOWANCE

Amendment made: No. 43, in page 62, line 10, leave out from 'Act' to 'on' and insert—

(a) shall not have effect with respect to disposals of gilt-edged securities as defined in Schedule 2 to the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 or qualifying corporate bonds as defined in section 64 of the Finance Act 1984; and

(b) shall have effect with respect to disposals of other securities.'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move amendment No. 131, in page 62, line 19, leave out 'and'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient also to take Government amendments Nos. 132 and 133.

Dr. McDonald: I intend to speak mainly to the amendments which have been grouped with amendment No. 131. The amendments were tabled on 4 July—only last Thursday — and that in itself is extremely interesting.

Dr. Marek: The Minister has chosen a rather sly way of getting out of defending his amendments. Amendment No. 131 is rather trivial, but No. 133 is a substantive amendment. I had expected the hon. Gentleman to tell us about its effect before we discussed it.

Dr. McDonald: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is why I wanted to make it clear that I intended to discuss the whole of the Chairman's selection. The amendments were tabled quite recently, and that is interesting, because they make significant changes in the capital gains tax regime.

Companies were able to pool their shares—indeed, they still are—and under the pooling arrangements all purchases of shares in other companies were pooled to produce an average acquisition cost. If, for example, we talk about Fred Bloggs Investments Ltd. and assume that 1,000 ICI shares were bought at £1 each in 1967 and another 1,000 at £10 each in 1984, the acquisition cost under the pooling arrangements could be averaged out at £5·50.

This group of amendments allows companies to have a choice. Companies will be able to revoke the pooling election — formerly, companies preferred that, even though it might have meant that they paid more tax, because it simplified book keeping arrangements. The reason why they might want to revoke the pooling election, despite the administrative convenience and so on, is that they can go for a last in, first out arrangement under later amendments, in which case they will be able to sell off the most expensive shares first.

This group of amendments seems enormously to advantage companies in terms of capital gains tax, and they have been tabled rather late in the day. We know from the Red Book that the Government expected to get £720 million from capital gains tax this year. If these changes are advantageous to companies in the way in which I have described, that amount could well be reduced, and we want to know how much these changes will cost and why the Government have introduced them at this late stage.

I repeat that the amendments were tabled on 4 July. Why were we not given an opportunity to discuss them in Committee, when we would have had tine to consider them in great detail, instead of having to discuss what seem to be quite significant changes at half-past 11 at night?

It will be interesting to hear the Minister's answers to all these questions.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I am happy to respond to the hon. Lady. The only reason why I did not deal with the amendments at greater length was that she had told me beforehand that she wanted to raise a number of questions and it seemed more sensible to explain the amendments in more detail after she had spoken.

The substance of the changes recently announced come in a later group of amendments, Government amendments 165 to 168, which I am not dealing with now but which my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary will deal with in a moment.

Government amendments Nos. 131 to 135 deal with the technical side of the implementation. They involve additional parts of the schedule, which deal with two aspects of the reforms, and they were not included in the Bill so that discussions could take place with the representative bodies of those concerned. The first part of the two provisions relates to the rule for parallel pooling, which was introduced for companies in 1983 to facilitate the application of computer programmes to large portfolios. The way in which the companies now hold their portfolios under those arrangements are not in a form to which the new arrangements could be applied.

11.30 pm

As the hon. Lady knows, the system of parallel pooling involves two pools—one with the actual cost, and the other with the index cost. The comparison between the two will enable the indexed gain to be calculated. The new system, which could be called consecutive pooling, will have a pool of pre-1982 holdings and one of post-1982 holdings. They will be updated for each transaction. Two provisions are being introduced to meet that.

The first provision will allow those who have elected for parallel pooling to revoke that election, and we understand that most companies would wish to do that. For those who do not, a statutory instrument will be issued detailing how the parallel pools can be converted into the correct form. We shall have further discussions of the details with those concerned.

The second provision relates to the application of the new indexation provisions to underwriters' premiums trust funds. Hitherto, because indexation has not applied to the first 12 months of any asset holding, indexation relief has not been due on the premiums trust fund. Under the special statutory provisions the securities in those trust funds are treated as disposed of and reacquired at the end of each calendar year accounting period. Now that the indexation provisions apply to the first year of ownership, the amendment secures that with the necessary modifications, indexation relief could be given in calculating the gains arising on the assets in those trust funds.

The provisions are purely technical, and I commend them to the House.

Dr. McDonald: The Economic Secretary referred to discussions with the representative bodies of those concerned. He should tell the House exactly who he means by that. I notice that he has still not answered the question about costs.

Mr. Stewart: There is no cost involved in the implementation of the arrangements. Those concerned are mostly insurance companies and large companies which hold pools of investment shares. Further discussion is needed because the arrangements for the new consecutive pooling involve changes in computer arrangements. As soon as that has been sorted out with the companies, the provisions can be published in a statutory instrument.

Dr. McDonald: The Economic Secretary has still not named the bodies with whom discussions took place, and we want those names. Secondly, is he saying that the changes have no revenue impact? I remind the House that the amendments must ultimately be linked with amendments Nos. 165 to 168. Therefore, what is the revenue impact of the changes together with the later amendments?

Mr. Stewart: I have already explained that discussions took place with insurance companies and most of the life offices associations. The cost of the changes does not arise on these technical arrangements. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary, who will deal with Government amendments Nos. 165 to 168, which are the substantive ones, will answer questions about the substantive changes. These are technical, not substantive provisions.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 132, in page 62, line 22, at end insert—

'(d) Part V has effect with respect to securities in respect of which elections have been or could be made under Schedule 6 to the Finance Act 1983; and

(e) Part VI contains consequential provisions relating to assets forming part of a premiums trust fund'. — [Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 156, in page 62, line 31, at end insert—

'(4A) In applying subsection (4) above if the asset is disposed of by a company B to whom it was transferred directly or indirectly by another company A, within section 273 Taxes Act 1970, then if A held the asset at 31st March 1982 B shall be entitled to be treated as if it B had held the asset at 31st March 1982.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it well be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 130.

Sir William Clark: The House will recollect that where a person disposes of shares after April 1985, indexation will start from April 1982 under the new indexation rules. The amendment relates to indexation only and has nothing to do with the eventual capital gain on the share or asset.

Sometimes assets are transferred within a group of companies and the purpose of the amendment is to allow the asset, wherever it is in the group, to enjoy indexation. The amendment is simpler than Government amendment No. 130 and it is unusual for a Back Bench Member to move an amendment and to have the Government tagging on behind. However, I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury for taking the point. The Government's amendment is more complicated but it deals with the problem more comprehensively, which I welcome.

Mr. Peter Rees: My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) has identified a problem and he and my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) have sought to meet it by means of the amendment. Government amendment No. 130 identifies the problem and goes slightly wider in tackling it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South has referred to transfers within a group of companies, but there are other no-gain, no-loss transfers where the same problems arise. These include company reconstructions or amalgamations and transfers between husband and wife. There are such arcane matters as transfers by the marketing board that deals with hops. The House will be moved when it hears that the problem can arise for a local constituency association after a redrawing of boundaries.

I pay tribute to my hon Friends the Members for Croydon, South and for Tatton for having identified the problem in their amendment but I hope that they and the House will feel, on reflection, that it is better that it should be dealt with comprehensively, which is the purpose and intention of the Government amendment.

Dr. McDonald: The Chief Secretary has rightly said that Government amendment No. 130 goes wider than amendment No. 156. The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) has suggested that the amendment has nothing to do with indexation but I shall describe the effect of the amendment as I understand it. If a group of companies can switch assets around within the group it will not pay capital gains tax. However, when the last company in the group sells the asset outside the group, the acquisition cost will be the cost to the first company in the group. If the amendment were accepted, the last company in the group would be able to claim the indexation allowance against the cost to the first company which bought the shares or asset. We see no reason for agreeing to such an amendment.

The Chief Secretary will remember that when we discussed the abolition of stamp duty on voluntary dispositions in Committee we emphasised how the Government have been busily dismantling capital transfer tax. Indeed, that had been done to such an extent that the Institute of Fiscal Studies — which, as hon. Members know, is an independent research group — produced an article in August last year entitled "CTT Adieu", and that would be even more true of this year's Finance Bill. When we were discussing that, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) pointed out that one way of avoiding what remains of the CTT charge is to make lifetime gifts, and that the Government have made this easier by the introduction of the CGT holdover relief.

If a rich man gives some shares to his son in 1985, the object being to reduce his eventual CTT liability, and they make a CGT holdover election, no charge to CGT will arise, but the son will be deemed to have acquired the shares at the price originally paid by the father. The effect of amendment No. 130, in terms of that example, is to allow the son, when he sells the shares, to claim indexation allowances calculated from the time when the father paid the shares, or from 1982, if that was later.

Given that example, which seems to follow from the Government tabling amendment No. 130, how much will it cost and how many people will benefit from that kind of change? We have figures of the number of capital gains tax payers with whom the Inland Revenue deals. I am here referring to individuals and not, of course, to companies. How many rich individuals are likely to benefit from that kind of change, and how much will it cost? What possible justification have the Government for introducing such an amendment? Why is it that at this stage in the Finance Bill the Government appear to be introducing a series of amendments to capital gains tax which, if taken together — we cannot, of course, discus them in total — seem to lighten the burden of capital gains tax still further?

Sir William Clark: The Chief Secretary is right in saying that the Government's amendment is far wider and far more equitable than the one tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and myself. In view of that, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 130, in page 63, line 4, at end insert—

[Sir William Clark]

'(6A) Subsection (6B) below applies to a disposal of an asset which is not a no gain/no loss disposal, if—

(a) the person making the disposal acquired the asset after 31st March 1982; and

(b) the disposal by which he acquired the asset and any previous disposal of the asset after 31st March 1982 was a no gain/no loss disposal; and for the purposes of this subsection a no gain/no loss disposal is one on which, by virtue of section 267 or section 273 of the Taxes Act, section 44 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, section 148 of the Finance Act 1982 or section 7(4) of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1983, neither a gain nor a loss accrues to the person making the disposal.

(6B) Where this subsection applies to a disposal—

(a) the person making the disposal shall be treated for the purpose referred to in subsection (4) above as having held the asset on 31st March 1982; and

(b) for the purpose of determining any gain or loss on the disposal, the consideration which, apart from this subsection, that person would be treated as having given for the asset shall be taken to be reduced by deducting therefrom any indexation allowance brought into account by virtue of Part I of Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1982 on any disposal falling within subsection (6A)(b) above.'.

No. 44, in page 63, line 7, leave out from 'include' to 'relevant' in line 8.—Mr. Peter Rees.]

Schedule 17

INDEXATION

Amendment proposed: No. 164, in page 152, line 11, leave out 'following that'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

Government amendments Nos. 165 to 167.

No. 169, in page 159, line 11, leave out from 'a' to 'of' in line 13 and insert

'new holding, within the meaning of Part III of this Schedule rather than with securities forming part of a 1982 holding, within the meaning of Part II'.

and Government Amendment No. 168.

Dr. McDonald: I am glad to have the opportunity to speak to amendment No. 164. I noticed that the Chief Secretary carefully avoided answering any of the questions which were raised on the last group of amendments, so some of the same questions have to be pressed on this group of amendments. This group—I refer particularly to Government amendments Nos. 164 to 168—were tabled even later than the ones that we have already debated. They were tabled on Monday, 8 July—very late indeed—and they constitute a change in the Finance Bill as originally published. The amendments alter the arrangements that were made for the basis of indexation of capital gains tax. It shows that the Government changed their minds at a very late stage between publication of the original Bill and these amendments. Instead of basing the indexation of a group of shares or assets on the principle of first in, first out, the Government have substituted the principle of last in, first out, thus reducing the liability to capital gains tax.

11.45 pm

For example, under the original Finance Bill, shares were to be identified on a first in, first out, basis. The amendments change the rules to a last in, first out basis. Almost always this will benefit the taxpayer. If, to use again the example of Mr. Jones, he bought 1,000 ICI shares in 1975 at £5 each—£5,000—and 1,000 ICI shares in 1983 at £10 each—£10,000—and if he sold 1,000 ICI shares in 1985 at £12 each he gained £12,000. On the first in, first out basis he gains £12,000 less £5,000. The basis for tax liability is £7,000. On the last in, first out basis he gains £12,000, less £10,000. The basis for tax liability is therefore £2,000.

We want to know why the Government changed their mind. At the last moment did they decide to cave in to their City friends and change the basis? How much will this cost? How can the Government justify such a cost when they were unable last night to find the quite small amount of money that would be necessary to alter the tax regime that they now wish to impose upon the workplace nurseries?

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury is on record as saying that he is opposed to capital taxation. He has been unable to abolish it. Instead, the process of reducing it goes on year after year. This is another example, which was introduced at a very late stage. Both he and his right hon. Friends chip away at capital taxation until it is hardly worth collecting. Instead of death for capital taxation by a thousand cuts it is death by a thousand reliefs. I am sure that the Chief Secretary is pleased about that. The Opposition are not at all pleased about it.

We do not think that there should be this imbalance, which we have commented upon time and time again, between the burden of taxation on capital and the burden of taxation on taxpayers, especially those whose incomes are particularly low. The burden of taxation on those with below average incomes has increased during the last six years, while the burden of capital taxation has decreased. Capital gains tax has dropped to less than 1 per cent. of total revenue. One concession after another has been made. This set of concessions has been made at an extremely late stage. The result will be that only the rich will benefit. We want the Chief Secretary to tell us how many people are involved, how much it will cost and what justification can possibly be produced for caving in to the City.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) accuses the Government of having caved in to their rich friends. I tabled an amendment on this matter and the hon. Lady may be right to say that the Government amendments, which I regard as being as satisfactory as mine, were tabled late in the day. The difficulty is that capital gains tax is so complicated that it takes time to work out the problems involved.

We are seeking to help not a few rich individuals, but the insurance companies, life offices, investment trusts and trade union pension funds in the City that all have large core holdings. If we had left the situation as it was, there would have been an aggregation of costs and profits and, under the FIFO method, £200,000 of capital gains tax could be paid when no overall capital gain had been made. Therefore, the funds of pension funds would have been diminished.

In addition, once an investment company had bought a holding it would never wish to deal in the share, because there would be a financial distortion. Surely it is good for the country that the change has been made. Eating up in tax the benefits going to trade union pension funds and others would have been a great folly. The country is not the net loser. The losers would have been the beneficiaries of funds; they are not a few rich individuals, but hundreds of thousands of people who get the benefit of expert advice.

The Government should be congratulated on seeing the wisdom of the argument, not criticised for changing what would have been a damaging provision.

Mr. Peter Rees: We have been congratulated by one side of the House and condemned by the other. It would be wearisome if I deployed at length the Government's views on capital taxation, but the hollowness of the case of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) was demonstrated when she talked of death by a thousand reliefs; I have never heard of anyone dying from an excess of reliefs.

We are people of warm hearts who are endeavouring to do justice in a complex matter. The hon. Member for Thurrock does not recognise that, with the impact of inflation over the years, capital gains tax has become, to a considerable extent, a capital levy. It has not been creaming off real profits. All too often, it has been cutting into the core holdings of institutions.

I emphasise that the change does not benefit what the hon. Member for Thurrock chooses to call the rich friends of the Tory party. It covers the institutions, through which many of our fellow countrymen who could never be described as rich save for themselves, their families and their old age.

The change was pressed on us between the Committee and Report stages. I do not apologise for the fact that we had to table the amendments rather late. They include complex provisions and it was necessary to work out the details and get them right. The justification for our proposals was clearly deployed by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark).

The Bill originally included the first in, first out rule, which was the general identification rule from 1965 to 1982. We thought that as people were familiar with the admittedly slightly complex rule, it was worth perpetuating it in the new situation created by the indexation provisions in the Bill. However, it was represented very strongly to us at the end of the Committee debate that this would create a distortion in the operations not just of private individuals but of institutions. It would provide, so to speak, a clog on the market. People would be disinclined to have their stocks and shares turned over in the way that market circumstances would normally have dictated. We thought it right, therefore, to eliminate that distortion by introducing the last in, first out rule.

The hon. Member for Thurrock asked me perfectly properly how many people will be affected. I cannot tell her. [Interruption.] We all know the bonhomie of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). The hon. Gentleman might reflect on the utter impossibility of knowing the composition of the portfolios of the institutions of the country, let alone of individuals. If he and the hon. Member for Thurrock reflected for a moment, they would recognise the utter impossibility of my giving the numbers likely to be affected.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What about last year's bond washing.

Mr. Peter Rees: I think that I would be out of order if I were to debate bond washing. The hon. Gentleman, who intervenes regularly from a sedentary position, might recognise that this year the Government have devoted considerable legislative time—with, I had hoped, the approval of the Opposition—to bringing bond washing with the charge to tax. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman might recongise that fact, but maybe he has his own motives for contributing in his own particular way.

The hon. Member for Thurrock, again properly, asked me what the cost would be. Once more, it is impossible for me to say, but it is likely to be negligible. It is likely that there will be more disposals although, because of the indexation provisions and the application of the last in, first out rule, the charge on each disposal is likely to be less. However, as there will probably be a larger number of transactions, the ultimate overall quantum of capital gains tax should be about the same. I have to admit quite candidly that that it is absolute assumption. It is, I hope, an informed guess.

I apologise for not having dealt with that point in the last case. Again, it would have been impossible for me to put forward a figure because the basic data are not available—that is, the number of transactions which have been on the no gain, no loss basis which would have preceded the ultimate transaction, subject to capital gains tax. Much as I would have liked to give the figure, it would not have been realistic for me to do so.

In this case, as I said—and I am sure that the hon. Lady will understand how I have approached the problem—there is likely to be a greater turnover of the securities, but, admittedly, at a lesser charge to capital gains tax, to corporation tax or chargeable gains. None the less, I hope that the actual amount of revenue collected by Government would not be seriously affected. I therefore hope that the House will feel able to accept the amendments.

If I may deal briefly with amendment 164, which is of a slightly different quality, this is a technical amendment to bring the treatment of shares and other securities into line for the purposes of applying the 10-day rule. Due to slight drafting defects, some were on an 11-day basis and some on a 10-day basis, and the amendment is to harmonise them on a 10-day basis.

I hope that all the amendments will, therefore, find favour with the House.

Dr. McDonald: I should like to explain why the Opposition wish to call a vote on this amendment. The Chief Secretary says that these general identification rules have not been changed since 1965, yet inexplicably changes in the identification rules were introduced after the Bill was published on 8 July. The Chief Secretary has not told the House why that was done at such a late stage, from whom the representations came or how many individuals will be affected by the changes. The Inland Revenue, of course, knows how many individuals it deals with who have directly to pay capital gains tax. I take the Chief Secretary's point about the number of individuals who might indirectly be affected by the proposals.

Somewhat misleadingly, the Minister talked about institutions, but pension funds should be exempted. He said that the costs were negligible, but he does not know the cost of the changes.

The Government expect to gain £720 million from capital gains tax this year. The Opposition will watch closely to see how much the Government gain. Because of the lack of answers, the lateness of the changes and our belief that rich people are likely to benefit more than the many whom we represent, we intend to vote against the amendment.

[Dr. McDonald]

12 midnight

Mr. Tim Smith: I was surprised that the Government should introduce the amendment at such a late stage, but it is important to get the new arrangements for capital gains tax on to a sensible footing. The amendments fall into the same category as one which we discussed yesterday. Although a relief is being introduced, the revenue consequences might be neutral or even beneficial.

It has become clear that the market might become clogged up. Capital gains tax is only payable when an individual makes a disposal. On the basis of last in, first out, rather than first in, first out, there will be no inhibition, so the revenue effects will not be as dramatic as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) suggests.

The hon. Lady said that pension funds were exempt from capital gains tax. That is true, but the insurance companies were, understandably, particularly worried.

The revenue from the bond washing provisions is to be £300 million in a full year and insurance will have to stump up a large proportion of that.

The hon. Lady will know that the insurance companies will lose as a result of the change which the House approved yesterday — the abolition of the short-term capital gains tax on gilts—because they will no longer be able to set off their losses against their equity gains. It is right that the Government should examine, even at this late stage, the strong representations by insurance companies. I do not think that the effect will be as damaging as the hon. Lady suggests, so I support the changes.

Dr. Marek: We should vote against the amendment, because we have not had time to study the proposals. The insurance companies should have made their representations earlier so that the proposals could be discussed properly in Committee. It is important to vote on the issue.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 114, Noes 23.

Division No. 270] [12.02 am

AYES

Alexander, Richard
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Nicholas (N Dorset)
Baldry, Tony
Batiste, Spencer
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bright, Graham
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Browne, John
Butcher, John
Butler, Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, John (N Luton)
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clegg, Sir Walter
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dorrell, Stephen
Dover, Den
du Cann, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Durant, Tony
Edwards, Rt Hon N. (P'broke)
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Forman, Nigel
Forth, Eric
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Goodlad, Alastair
Gow, Ian
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Havers, Rt Hon Sir Michael
Hawksley, Warren
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Henderson, Barry
Hirst, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Rt Hon D. (G'ldford)
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Lang, Ian
Lawson, Rt Hon Nigel
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lord, Michael
McCurley, Mrs Anna
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
Major, John
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Moore, John
Murphy, Christopher
Nicholson, J.
Osborn, Sir John
Pattie, Geoffrey
Percival, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Powell, Rt Hon J. E. (S Down)
Proctor, K. Harvey
Rees, Rt Hon Peter (Dover)
Roberts, Wyn (Conwy)
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speller, Tony
Spencer, Derek
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stevens, Martin (Fulham)
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stewart, Ian (N Hertf'dshire)
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Tracey, Richard
Viggers, Peter
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Waldegrave, Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Cecil (Belfast N)
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Warren, Kenneth
Wheeler, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wilkinson, John
Wood, Timothy
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Tim Sainsbury and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

NOES

Barron, Kevin
Beith, A. J.
Bermingham, Gerald
Blair, Anthony
Bruce, Malcolm
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cook, Frank (Stockton North)
Cowans, Harry
Davis, Terry (B'ham, H'ge H'l)
Dixon, Donald
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Kirkwood, Archy
Litherland, Robert
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McWilliam, John
Maxton, John
Parry, Robert
Penhaligon, David
Prescott, John
Randall, Stuart
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours
and Dr. John Marek.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 79, in page 152, leave out line 17 and insert—

'(2) The following provisions of that section shall be omitted—

(a) in subsection (1), the words "and section 89 below" and "section 89 below"; and

(b) subsection (5A).'.

No. 80, in page 152, line 25, leave out from beginning to 'and' in line 26.

No. 81, in page 152, line 30, leave out 'In'.

No. 82, in page 152, line 31, leave out from beginning to end of line 4 on page 153 and insert 'shall be omitted'. —[Mr. Peter Rees.]

12.15 am

Mr. Peter Rees: I beg to move amendment No. 134, in page 153, line 29, leave out 'sub-paragraph (2)' and insert 'sub-paragraphs (2) and (3)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 135 and 136.

Mr. Rees: The purpose of the amendments is to allow taxpayers a fresh opportunity to elect to pool quoted securities acquired before 6 April 1965 where they have not already done so. This should simplify the capital gains tax still further. I know that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) is interested in the questions of cost. The measure is unlikely to have any significance on tax liability. In most cases, the effect will be to spread the gains from pre-1965 securities over a greater number of disposals.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 135, in page 153, line 43, at end insert—

'(3) If a person so elects, quoted securities, as defined in paragraph 8 of Schedule 5 to the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 (assets held on 6th April 1965) which are covered by the election—

(a) shall be treated as an accretion to an existing 1982 holding or, as the case may be, as constituting a new 1982 holding; and

(b) shall be excluded from paragraph 2 of that Schedule (restriction of gain or loss by reference to actual cost);

and the relevant allowable expenditure (as defined in relation to a disposal to which section 86 of the Finance Act 1982 applies) which is attributable to that 1982 holding shall be adjusted or determined accordingly.

(4) Paragraphs 4 to 8 of the said Schedule 5 (except paragraph 4(1) shall apply in relation to an election under sub-paragraph (3) above as they apply in relation to an election under paragraph 4 of that Schedule, but with the substitution for any reference to 19th March 1968 of a reference to 31st March 1985 in the case of holdings or disposals by companies and 5th April 1985 in any other case.'.

No. 136, in page 154, line 3, leave out 'where paragraph 6(2) above applies' and insert

'if it comes into being by virtue of paragraph 6 above'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Mr. Peter Rees: I beg to move amendment No. 83, in page 155, line 3, leave out '6th April 1985' and insert 'the 1985 date'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 84 to 89.

Mr. Rees: These amendments make a number of technical drafting changes to the Bill. There is no change of substance.

Dr. McDonald: These amendments are rather more than technical changes. As we are aware, someone can buy a share option—the right to buy shares at a fixed price at some time in the future. The amendments provide an indexation allowance in addition. That will, of course, benefit financial dealers or rich individual investors. It benefits those who can adopt a highly speculative approach to buying shares. The Chief Secretary said that the cost is negligible. We are not convinced of that. He might like to reconsider that point and tell us what the cost will be and confirm that the provision will benefit the few people whom I have described.

Mr. Peter Rees: I cannot speculate about the wealth of the taxpayer whom the amendments might benefit. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) is correct when she says that they will enable expenditure upon acquiring a share to be indexed from the date upon which it is incurred, but that is the tenor of the provisions. I am afraid that that is as far as I can take the matter. I cannot calculate how much is involved because one has to make too many assumptions. The best evidence that I have is that it will be negligible.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 84, in page 155, line 12, leave out '6th April 1985' and insert 'the 1985 date'.

No. 85, in page 156, line 20, leave out 'and shall at that time' and insert

'or, if it is earlier, when any of the qualifying expenditure is incurred and shall at the time it comes into being'.

No. 86, in page 158, line 8, at end insert—

'(3) Notwithstanding anything in sub-paragraphs (1) and (2) above, the provisions of this Part of this Schedule do not apply to shares in respect of which relief under Part I of Schedule 5 to the Finance Act 1983 (relief for investment in corporate trades) has been given and not withdrawn.'.

No. 165, in page 158, line 17, leave out 'securities acquired' and insert

'disposals of securities on or'.

No. 166, in page 158, line 21, leave out '19(2)' and insert '19(3)'.

No. 87, in page 158, line 26, after first 'and' insert 'subsequently'.

No. 88, in page 158, line 32, leave out from 'then' to second 'the' in line 33 and insert

'subject to sub-paragraphs (1A) and (1B) below'.

No. 89, in page 158, line 36, at end insert—

'(1A) If, in a case falling within sub-paragraph (1) above, the number of securities acquired exceeds the number disposed of,—

(a) the excess shall be regarded as forming part of an existing new holding or, as the case may be, as constituting a new holding; and

(b) if the securities acquired were acquired at different times (within the ten days referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above) the securities disposed of shall be identified with securities acquired at an earlier time rather than with securities acquired at a later time.

(1B) If, in a case falling within sub-paragraph (1) above, the number of securities disposed of exceeds the number acquired, the excess shall be not identified in accordance with that sub-paragraph.'.

No. 167, in page 159, leave out lines 2 to 9 and insert 'forming part of a new holding, within the meaning of Part III of this Schedule, rather than with other securities'.

No. 168, in page 159, line 12, leave out from 'with' to end of line 13 and insert

'other securities and, subject to that, shall be identified with securities acquired at a later time rather than with securities acquired at an earlier time'.

No. 133, in page 159, line 13 at end insert—

'PART V

PARALLEL POOLING

20.—(1) Where an election has been made under Schedule 6 to the Finance Act 1983 (parallel pooling) that election may be revoked, by notice in writing to the inspector not later than 31st March 1987 or within such further time as the Board may allow.

(2) At the end of paragraph 2(2)(b) of the said Schedule 6 (elections to be irrevocable) there shall be added the words "except in accordance with Part V of Schedule 17 to the Finance Act 1985".

(3) All such adjustments shall be made, whether by way of discharge or repayment of tax, or the making of assessments or otherwise, as are required in consequence of a revocation under sub-paragraph (1) above.

21.—(1) An election under Schedule 6 of the Finance Act 1983 shall not have effect with respect to any disposal on or after 1st April 1985.

(2) The Treasury may by regulations make such provisions as are referred to in sub-paragraph (3) below in relation to qualifying securities, within the meaning of the said Schedule 6,—

(a) in respect of which an election under that Schedule has been made and not revoked under paragraph 20 above; and

(b) which, immediately before 1st April 1985, were regarded as indistinguishable parts of a single asset by virtue of paragraph 3 of that Schedule.

[Mr. Peter Rees]

(3) The provisions referred to in sub-paragraph (2) above are such as appear to the Treasury to be appropriate to enable section 65 of this Act and the preceding provisions of this Schedule to take full effect in relation to the securities concerned.

(4) Regulations under this paragraph shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Commons House of Parliament.

PART VI

UNDERWRITERS' PREMIUMS TRUST FUNDS

22. This Part of this Schedule has effect with respect to premiums trust funds, within the meaning of Schedule 16 to the Finance Act 1973 (underwriters), and any reference in paragraph 23 below to a fund is a reference to such a premiums trust fund.

23. — (1) Subject to the following provisions of this paragraph, the enactments relating to indexation shall apply with any necessary modifications in relation to assets forming part of a fund as they apply in relation to other assets.

(2) In this paragraph "the enactments relating to indexation" means—

(a) sections 86 to 88 of and Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1982; and

(b) section 65 of this Act and Parts I to III of this Schedule.

(3) For the purposes of the application of the enactments relating to indexation in accordance with sub-paragraph (1) above, it shall be assumed—

(a) that assets forming part of a fund are disposed of and immediately reacquired on the last day of each accounting period; and

(b) that the indexation allowance computed for that accounting period is allocated to the corresponding underwriting year in the same proportion as the gains or losses referred to in paragraph 6(2) of the said Schedule 16'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Clause 66

RELIEF FOR DISPOSALS BY INDIVIDUALS ON RETIREMENT FROM FAMILY BUSINESS

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): I beg to move amendment No. 45, in page 63, line 31, at end insert—

"(2) Where an individual who is a partner with his spouse in a business has retired on ill health grounds below the age of 60, and his spouse is thereby compelled to withdraw from the business, such part of the spouse's gains on the withdrawal shall qualify for relief as appears to the Board to be just and reasonable.".

I express my gratitude to Mr. Speaker for selecting the amendment. He has a great and deserved reputation for solicitude for the position of Back Benchers and in selecting this amendment he has demonstrated that qualify yet again.

Any examination of Mr. Speaker's provisional selection of amendments indicates that a total of 120 amendments is to be discussed tonight. No fewer than 100 are Government amendments. Taking into account the amendments proposed by the official Opposition, that indicates very clearly that the result of our present arrangements for dealing with the Finance Bill each year inevitably tends to mean that the point of view of the Back Bencher is being increasingly crowded out. Remembering the undertakings given and the suggestions made in 1967, when our arrangements were changed and Standing Order No. 42 was altered, in particular the suggestion that a more careful examination of the Finance Bill would be possible, it has to be admitted that, in practice, the result has been thoroughly disappointing.

In recent years there has been a tendency to allow the general membership of the House of Commons, if anything, a lesser opportunity to discuss the Finance Bill in detail. It is nearly half past midnight and this is no time to examine statistics in any detail. Taking the first 10 years after the arrangements were changed and examining the number of days available for Report, there were in fact 11 Finance Bills. On six occasions three days were allowed, on two occasions four days, on another occasion two days and on two occasions only one day. The average number of days allowed was three. Since then the average has dropped dramatically to between one and two days.

I repeat that the net result is that the private Member is becoming increasing disfranchised when it comes to an opportunity to test an idea, to propose an amendment or a change, unless it attracts very widespread support. Remembering how unsatisfactory is the general shape of our Committee stage—because opinion is becoming, in my view, absurdly polarised between the parties——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will come to the amendment.

Sir Edward du Cann: I shall come to the amendment immediately, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am merely saying that it is time that our arrangements for the examination of the Finance Bill were looked into.

There is a new principle in the Bill, in clause 66, which is very much to be welcomed. This allows retirement relief from capital gains tax to be claimed when an individual has to give up his business on grounds of ill health. That is a great step forward, but the arrangements as presently proposed involve a problem, which relates to a problem common in small businesses such as a farm or a shop where a husband and wife jointly own a property and run the business in partnership. If the business has to be sold owing to the ill health of the husband, his part of the gains would qualify for retirement relief, but there would be no relief for the wife's share.

I am advised by the National Farmers Union that it has already seen three cases of husband and wife partnerships, which are common in farming, where one spouse is having to give up on ill health grounds, and it is not practicable to continue the business as before. The matter came to my particular attention because I had a constituency case in a farm just outside Taunton, where a constituent found himself in real difficulties. His wife had had a severe stroke, and the medical report is that she will be unable to take any part in the business in future.

The amendment suggests a discretion to the Inland Revenue in such circumstances to allow reasonable relief to the other spouse. I cannot say whether the form of the amendment will be acceptable to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary. To return to my first point, it is a pity that one has not had the chance in Committee to test that, so that there would be an opportunity, if the wording of the amendment is not suitable, to promote something better on Report. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will be able to say what his feeling is about the real problem that I have described. If he is unable to accept my wording, I hope that he will be able to suggest that next year my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be able to introduce such an improvement to clause 66 that will help what is a real difficulty for a number of individuals.

Dr. McDonald: The Opposition are not unsympathetic to the purpose of the amendment. However, if the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) is willing to give the Inland Revenue such discretion, and if the Government are willing to accept it in the case of illness that the right hon. Gentleman so well described, could not the Inland Revenue be given the same kind of discretion to give tax relief on work-place nurseries for lone parents or low-paid workers?

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) has clearly identified a problem that I am sure commands sympathy from both sides of the House. It will reassure right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who spoke earlier and said that that was the only time that the particular problems of agriculture had become the subject of debate either in Committee or on Report. Here is a second occasion, although my right hon. Friend would say that the amendment is not confined to agriculture.

We view the problem with sympathy, but the amendment is not satisfactory. The unsatisfactory nature of it could not have been demonstrated more clearly than it was by the speech of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald). I do not know whether that was her intention, but she demonstrated the inadvisability of giving the Inland Revenue a discretion which, to be fair to it, it would not want to exercise.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept what I have to say in the spirit in which it is offered. We should like to keep this problem under review.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend will accept that the precise form of his amendment would not meet the full circumstances of the case. He has, however, identified a problem which we should like to keep under review and I hope that we may come back to it, if not next year at least on some later occasion when we have better evidence about the scope of the problem and how best it should be tackled. I hope he feels that justice has been done to the case which he so ably advaced and he will not feel obliged to press his amendment to a Division.

Sir Edward du Cann: In the light of that very clear undertaking from my right hon. and learned Friend that he will be good enough to keep the matter under review, and that a remedy will be sought and introduced, I am happy to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 18

RETIREMENT RELIEF ETC.

12.30 am

Mr. Peter Rees: I beg to move amendment No. 91, in page 160, line 46, leave out 'date of the disposal' and insert

'end of the year of assessment in which the disposal occurred'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this we may discuss Government amendments Nos. 92, 93 and 95.

Mr. Rees: These amendments are designed to standardise the time limits for the making of claims to reliefs under schedule 18. Various other elections are provided for under that schedule. Both the claim and the elections will now require to be made within two years of the end of the year of assessment in which the event to which the claim or election relates took place. This will simplify administration and I hope it will be welcomed in all parts of the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 92, in page 162, line 36, leave out 'disposal concerned' and insert

'end of the year of assessment in which the disposal occurred'.

No. 93, in page 166, line 38, leave out from 'than' to third 'the' in line 39 and insert

'two years after the end of the year of assessment in which the individual or the trustees received the capital distribution'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Mr. Peter Rees: I beg to move amendment No. 94, in page 169, line 16, at end insert—

'(4) References in this paragraph to relief given under this Schedule include references to relief given under section 34 of the Finance Act 1965 or section 124 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979; and—

(a) in relation to relief given under either of those sections paragraph (b) of sub-paragraph (1) above shall have effect as if, for the words from "which was" onwards, there were substituted "made by the individual"; and

(b) in the application of sub-paragraph (3) above where the earlier disposal was a disposal in respect of which relief was given under either of those sections, the reference in paragraph (a) to the qualifying period appropriate to the disposal is a reference,—

(i) if the disposal took place on or before 11th April 1978, to the period of ten years ending with the disposal; and

(ii) in any other case, to the qualifying period within the meaning of the section in question.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We shall take with this Government amendment No. 96.

Mr. Peter Rees: This amendment takes care of a transitional point which I say candidly we did not have time to prepare and put in for debate in Committee. Schedule 17 contains special rules for applying a ceiling to the amount of retirement relief available on a later disposal when some relief has already been given on an earlier one. The broad intention is to ensure that no individual can get more than the maximum relief, which is up to £100,000 throughout his life.

Amendment 96 is to ensure that a husband or wife who has been working in partnership or in a company and has received shares by way of gift or by inheritance, will get the full relief to which the donor spouse would have been entitled. That relief will be limited to £100,000. I hope that these two amendments will commend themselves to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 95, in page 169, line 34, leave out from '(e)' to 'the' in line 35 and insert

'not later than two years after the end of the year of assessment in which the material disposal occurred'.

No. 96, in page 170, line 15, at end insert—

'(5) In sub-paragraph (4)(a) above, the reference to relief given under this Schedule includes a reference to relief given under section 34 of the Finance Act 1965 or section 124 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Clause 68

ASSETS DISPOSED OF IN A SERIES OF TRANSACTIONS

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I beg to move amendment No. 46, in page 71, line 35, leave out from 'them' to end of line 36.

[Mr. Michael Stern]

The purpose of this amendment is to remove from the draft legislation words which are at best unnecessary and at worst confusing. The substance of the amendment was discussed in Committee and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Peter Rees: I fully agree with my hon. Friend. The amendment was ventilated in Committee and I agree with his analysis. The words are unnecessary and could lead to uncertainty. I am happy to recommend to the House that the amendment should be accepted.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 71

TREATMENT OF DEEMED SUMS AND RELIEFS

Amendment made: No. 47, in page 75, line 8, leave out second 'as'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Clause 72

EXCEPTIONS FROM PROCEDING PROVISIONS

Amendments made: No. 48, in page 76, line 26, after 'period,' insert—

'(ee) the transferor is not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during the chargeable period in which the transfer occurs and, if he became entitled in the period to any interest on the securities transferred, it would not be liable to income tax by virtue of section 99 of the Taxes Act (securities free of income tax for residents abroad),

(eee) the securities transferred are FOTRA securities, the transferor is not domiciled in the United Kingdom at any time in the chargeable period in which the transfer occurs, and he is either not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during that period or a non-resident United Kingdom trader in that period,'.

No. 49, in page 76, line 40, after '(e)' insert ', (ee), (eee)'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

No. 50, in page 77, line 22, at end insert—

'(6) For the purposes of this section "FOTRA securities" means securities issued with the condition mentioned in section 22(1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1931 (securities free of tax for residents abroad) as modified by virtue of section 60(1) of the Finance Act 1940.'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Clause 73

DEEMED INTEREST

Amendment made: No. 126, in page 77, line 25, leave out

'28th February 1985 and 27th February 1986'

and insert 'certain dates'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Schedule 20

DEEMED INTEREST ON CERTAIN SECURITIES

Amendments made: No. 97, in page 175, line 3, at end insert—

'(2A) For the purposes of this Schedule a person is to be treated as not entitled to securities if he is not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during the year and, if he became entitled in the year to any interest on the securities, it would not be liable to income tax by virtue of section 99 of the Taxes Act (securities free of income tax for residents abroad).

(2B) For the purposes of this Schedule a person who is not domiciled in the United Kingdom at any time in the year, and is either not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during the year or a non-resident United Kingdom trader in the year, is to be treated as not entitled to securities which are FOTRA securities.'

No. 98, in page 175, line 36, at end insert—

'(10) For the purposes of this paragraph "FOTRA securities" mean securities issued with the condition mentioned in section 22(1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1931 (securities free of tax for residents abroad) as modified by virtue of section 60(1) of the Finance Act 1940.'.

No. 127, in page 175, line 40, leave out 'him' and insert 'the person'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Schedule 21

SECURITIES: FURTHER PROVISIONS

Amendments made: No. 99, in page 178, line 5, at end insert—

'(10) Where, in Scotland, two or more persons carry on a trade or business in partnership, any partnership dealings shall be treated as dealings by the partners and not by the firm as such and the partners as being entitled to securities held by the firm.'.

No. 124, in page 178, line 21, after 'months', insert '(a long period)'.

No. 21, in page 178, line 39, leave out sub-paragraph (7) and (8) and insert—

'(7) In the case of a period which is an interest period by virtue only of sub-paragraph (4) above or paragraph 18F(3) below—

(a) the interest applicable to securities for the period is the interest payable on them on the interest payment day with which the long or straddling period concerned ends, and

(b) section 70(8) of this Act shall have effect as if the references to the period were to the long or straddling period concerned.'

No. 100, in page 179, line 27, after '12', insert ', 12A'.

No. 101, in page 181, line 4, at end insert—

'8A.—(1) Sub-paragraph (2) below applies where—

(a) a trustee of a settlementis treated as receiving annual profits or gains under section 71(2) of this Act, or

(b) a trustee of a settlement who is resident or domiciled outside the United Kingdom throughout any chargeable period in which an interest period (or part of it) falls would, at the end of the interest period, have been treated under section 71(2) of this Act as receiving annual profits or gains or annual profits or gains of a greater amount if he had been resident or domiciled in the United Kingdom during a part of each such chargeable period.

(2) Chapters II to IV of Part XVI of the Taxes Act (settlements) shall have effect as if the amount which the trustee is or would be treated as receiving were income (withing Chapter II) or income arising under the settlement (within Chapter III or IV).

(3) Sub-paragraph (4) below applies where income of a trustee of a settlement who is resident or domiciled outside the United Kingdom throughout any chargeable period in which an interest period (or part of it) falls consists of interest which falls due at the end of the interest period and which would have been treated under section 71(5) of this Act as reduced by an allowance or an allowance of a greater amount if he had been resident or domiciled in the United Kingdom during a part of each such chargeable period.

(4) For the purposes of Chapters II of Part XVI of the Taxes Act, the interest shall be treated as being reduced by the amount of the allowance or by the additional amount (as the case may be).

(5) In this paragraph—

(a) "settlement" means settlement within the meaning of Chapter II, III or IV of Part XVI of the Taxes Act (as the case may be), and

(b) references to a trustee of a settlement are, where there is no trustee of the settlement, to any person entitled to securities comprised in the settlement.'

No. 102, in page 183, line 45, at end insert—

'Conversions

12A.—(1) Where there is a conversion of securities the person who was entitled to them immediately before the conversion shall be treated for the purposes of this Chapter as transferring them on the day of the conversion (if there is no actual transfer).

(2) The transfer shall be treated as made with accrued interest if the person was entitled to receive in respect of the securities interest payable on—

(a) the day of the conversion, if that is an interest payment day, or

(b) the next (or first) interest payment day to fall after the day of the conversion, in any other case, and they shall be treated as transferred without accrued interest if he was not so entitled.

(3) For the purposes of this Chapter the interest period in which the conversion is made shall be treated as ending on the day on which it would have ended had the conversion not been made.

(4) In this paragraph "conversion" means conversion within the meaning of section 82 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979.'.

No. 128, in page 186, line 33, at end insert—

'Underwriters

18A. In paragraphs 18B to 18H below "approved association of underwriters", "business" and "premiums trust fund" have the meanings given by paragraph 16(1) of Schedule 10 to the Taxes Act.

18B. An underwriting member of Lloyd's or of an approved association of underwriters shall be treated for the purposes of this Chapter as absolutely entitled as against the trustees to the securities forming part of his premiums trust fund, his special reserve fund (if any) and any other trust fund required or authorised by the rules of Lloyd's or the association in question, or required by the underwriting agent through whom his business or any part of it is carried on, to be kept in connection with the business.

18C.—(1) In relation to securities forming part of a premiums trust fund, any reference in Schedule 20 to this Act to a date in the first column in sub-paragraph (3) below shall be read as a reference to that opposite it in the second.

(2) Where securities are transferred by or to the trustees of a premiums trust fund, this Chapter (other than Schedule 20) shall be read in relation to the trustees as if any reference to a date in the first column in sub-paragraph (3) below were a reference to that opposite it in the second, but without being so read in relation to the transferee or transferor (unless in turn constituting trustees of such a fund).

(3) The dates are—

28th February 1982	1st January 1982
27th February 1985	31st December 1984
28th February 1985	1st January 1985
27th February 1986	31st December 1985
28th February 1986	1st January 1986.

18D.—(1) The securities forming part of a premiums trust fund at the beginning of 1st January 1986 or 1st January of any subsequent year shall be treated for the purposes of this Chapter as transferred on 1st January concerned to the trustees of the fund.

(2) In relation to such a transfer, the settlement day is the day preceding that of the transfer (notwithstanding paragraph 4 above).

(3) The securities shall be treated as transferred with accrued interest if the trustees are entitled to receive in respect of them interest payable on—

(a) the day of the transfer, if that is an interest payment day, or

(b) the next (or first) interest payment day to fall after that day, in any other case, and they shall be treated as transferred without accrued interest if they are not so entitled.

(4) This paragraph does not apply as regards securities if the day preceding 1st January concerned is an interest payment day in relation to them.

18E.—(1) The securities forming part of a premiums trust fund at the end of 31st December 1986 or 31st December of any subsequent year shall be treated for the purposes of this Chapter as transferred on 31st December concerned by the trustees of the fund.

(2) In relation to such a transfer, the settlement day is the day of the transfer (notwithstanding paragraph 4 above).

(3) The securities shall be treated as transferred with accrued interest if the trustees were entitled to receive in respect of them interest payable on the next (or first) interest payment day to fall after the day of the transfer, and they shall be treated as transferred without accrued interest if they were not so entitled.

(4) This paragraph does not apply as regards securities if 31st December concerned is an interest payment day in relation to them.

18F.—(1) Where securities are transferred by or to the trustees of a premium trust fund, this paragraph shall have effect in relation to the trustees, though not in relation to the transferee or transferor (unless in turn constituting trustees of such a fund).

(2) In this paragraph "straddling period" means a period which would (by virtue of paragraph 3(3) and (4) above and apart from this paragraph) be in relation to the securities an interest period beginning on or before and ending after 31st December 1986 or 31st December of any subsequent year.

(3) For the purposes of this Chapter a straddling period is not an interest period, but the following shall apply to it—

(a) the period beginning with the day on which the straddling period begins and ending with 31st December concerned is an interest period, and

(b) the period beginning with the day following 31st December concerned and ending with the day with which the straddling period ends is an interest period.

18G.—(1) Paragraph 11 above does not apply where the individual concerned is an underwriting member of Lloyd's or of an approved association of underwriters and the securities concerned form part of a premiums trust fund, a special reserve fund or any other trust fund required or authorised by the rules of Lloyd's or the association in question, or required by the underwriting agent through whom the individual's business or any part of it is carried on, to be kept in connection with the business.

(2) In such a case the deceased's personal representatives shall be treated for the purposes of this Chapter as the transferor or transferee in relation to transfers of securities as to which the deceased was the transferor or transferee (as the case may be) in the interest period in which he died.

18H.—(1) This paragraph applies where an underwriting member of Lloyd's or of an approved association of underwriters is entitled to securities forming part of a premiums trust fund or to different securities forming part of different premiums trust funds.

(2) Where there is one such fund, he shall be treated for the purposes of Schedule 20 to this Act as holding the securities forming part of it as one person and as holding as another person any other securities to which he is entitled.

(3) Where there is more than one such fund, he shall be treated for those purposes as holding the securities forming part of different funds as different persons and as holding as yet another person any other securities (not forming part of such a fund) to which he is entitled.

(4) In relation to the securities forming part of such a fund, four of the references in Schedule 20 to this Act to a person (where they would otherwise be to the member) shall be read as references to the underwriting agent through whom the business to which the fund relates is carried on; and the four references are the reference in paragraph 2(1), the first two in paragraph 6(1) and the first in paragraph 6(2).

(5) Where an underwriting member of Lloyd's or of an approved association of underwriters is entitled to securities forming part of a premiums trust fund, and different securities are attributable to his participation in different syndicates, the securities attributable to different syndicates shall be treated for the purposes of this paragraph as forming part of different premiums trust funds.

18I. In paragraph 7(3)(a) of Schedule 10 to the Taxes Act (special reserve funds) "income" includes annual profits or gains chargeable to tax by virtue of section 71(2) of this Act or paragraph 2(4) of Schedule 20 to this Act or paragraph 13(3) above.'.

No. 103, in page 189, line 38, at end insert—

'23A. — (1) In this paragraph "conversion" means conversion within the meaning of section 82 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, and "exchange" means an exchange which by virtue of Chapter II of Part IV of that Act (reorganisation etc.) does not involve a disposal.

(2) Where on a conversion or exchange of securities a person is treated as entitled to a sum under section 70(2)(a) of this Act,

[Mr. Peter Rees]

an amount equal to the accrued amount (determined under that section) shall, for capital gains tax purposes, be treated as follows —

(a) to the extent that it does not exceed the amount of any consideration which the person receives (or is deemed to receive) or becomes entitled to receive on the conversion or exchange (other than his new holding), it shall be treated as reducing that consideration, and

(b) to the extent that it does exceed that amount, it shall be treated as consideration which the person gives on the conversion or exchange.

(3) Where on a conversion or exchange of securities a person is treated as entitled to relief under section 70(3)(a) of this Act, an amount equal to the rebate amount (determined under that section) shall, for capital gains tax purposes, be treated as consideration which the person receives on the conversion or exchange.'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Clause 78

GIFTS INTER VIVOS

Amendment made: No. 51, in page 83, line 8, leave out 'below to contain a certificate'

and insert

'or (2) below to be certified'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Clause 80

DEATH: VARYING DISPOSITIONS, AND APPROPRIATIONS

Amendments made: No. 52, in page 84, line 10, at end insert—

'(4A) Where on an intestacy property is appropriated by a personal representative in or towards satisfaction of any interest of a surviving husband or wife in the intestate's estate, stamp duty under the heading mentioned in subsection (1) above shall not be chargeable on an instrument giving effect to the appropriation.

(4B) The reference in subsection (4A) above to an interest in the intestate's estate—

(a) includes a reference to the capital value of a life interest which the surviving husband or wife has under the Intestates' Estates Act 1952 elected to have redeemed, and

(b) in Scotland, includes a reference to prior rights (within the meaning of the Succession (Scotland) Act 1964) but, without prejudice to subsection (4C) below, not to such rights as are mentioned in that subsection.

(4C) Where in Scotland, on an intestacy or otherwise, property is appropriated by a personal representative in or towards satisfaction of the right of a husband to jus relicti, of a wife to jus relictae or of issue to legitim, stamp duty under the heading mentioned in subsection (1) above shall not be chargeable on an instrument giving effect to the appropriation.'.

No. 53, in page 84, line 13, leave out 'or (4)' and insert ', (4), (4A) or (4C)'.

No. 54, in page 84, line 19, leave out 'This' and insert 'Subject to subsection (8) below, this'.

No. 55, in page 84, line 21, at end insert—

'(8) Subsections (4A) to (4C) above and, so far as it relates to subsection (4A) or (4C), subsection (5) above apply to instruments executed on or after 1st August 1985.'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Clause 89

ABOLITION OF DEVELOPMENT LAND TAX AND TAX ON DEVELOPMENT GAINS

Mr. Terry Davis: I beg to move amendment No. 157, in page 90, line 1, leave out clause 89.

This is the clause which abolishes development land tax, and we discussed it in some detail in Committee of the whole House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Absolutely.

Mr. Davis: The right hon. Gentleman says, "Absolutely". Since he has been watching the proceedings with interest and no doubt has been considering events outside the House, he will know that the purpose of the clause has been widened as a result of the ingenious schemes pursued by tax lawyers since our debate in Committee of the whole House. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman sees the clause as so important that he has decided to attend the debate.

The clause abolishes development land tax, at a cost of £50 million — [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I recognise that that is popular among Government supporters, but the Opposition take a different view. The purpose of the amendment is to debate loopholes which have emerged as a result of the sloppy drafting of the Bill since our debate in Committee of the whole House.

The Government's intention, as announced in the Budget by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and repeated in our debate in Committee of the whole House, is to abolish development land tax with effect from the date of the Budget announcement. Subsequently, it has become clear that it is possible that development land tax has been abolished with effect before the date of the Budget, and it has happened in two ways.

It has become clear that it is possible for developers to use an existing deemed disposal in such a way that they can change the basis of the development land tax charge and avoid the charge which they would otherwise have incurred.

I give an example, which I take from an interesting article in The Law Society's Gazette of 8 May. The author points out that a developer who had planning permission to build 100 houses and whose development was due to last four years could have become liable to development land tax at the beginning of, say, March as a result of giving notice of the beginning of his project. If, after the Budget statement, he changed his mind and decided to build a smaller number of houses—say, 10 instead of 100 houses—to leave the other 90 houses until a later date and therefore to a later decision, and served a notice of variation of the project so that he was only taxed on a project for 10 houses, in the future he could change his mind again and decide to build more houses—90, 89 or 91—and this decision and the development of the land would not be taxed.

There is the possibility of applying the decision in the case of Furniss v. Dawson about a pre-ordained series of transactions being taken as a single composite transaction where steps had been inserted which had no commercial purpose other than that of avoiding tax. However, it is clear that when this project began it was not pre-ordained that the other steps would follow, and it could be held that the variation of the project and the subsequent project could not be treated as a series of transactions or that that series of transactions could be ignored by the Revenue. It would be possible for a developer to avoid tax, especially if he could argue that there was some other commercial purpose for the variation and for the new project. As the author of the article pointed out, there could well be no problem in finding such reasons. The changes would mean that developers would not be liable for development land tax, which the Government intend them to pay.

I am aware that other clauses seek to prevent tax avoidance, but as the author of the article points out, in practice the clauses are not operated. That is one way in which a developer could avoid the stated intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on development land tax, which was that if a developer had already incurred liability on the date of the Budget statement, the tax would be payable.

A second way for a developer to avoid his tax liability would be to rescind a contract for the sale for development. With a contract which disposes of land the developer becomes liable for tax, but that liability can be extinguished by rescinding the contract before completion, and therefore vitiating the pre-19 March disposal. Again, the Opposition believe that people whom the Chancellor intends should pay tax, could avoid it.

We are drawing those two loopholes to the attention of the Economic Secretary. I am glad that he will reply to the debate because, in a previous debate on Report, I drew his attention to a loophole which the Government were blocking, but only after waiting 11 months. I also drew his attention to a second loophole involving the same tax, and asked him whether the Government intended to block it before they lost money, but he could not answer that question.

This time I hope that the hon. Gentleman will answer because next year the Treasury will not be able to block these loopholes. The developers will have got away with it, and the law will have applied as it is now. If, as the article suggests, those loopholes exist, the Treasury Ministers and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are obliged to ensure that the Budget statement of 19 March is put into effect by blocking these loopholes tonight.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) raises a question which derives from an article in The Law Society's Gazette of 8 May, in which Mr. Clifford Joseph, a barrister, suggested that development land tax on existing disposals or projects could be mitigated through arrangements involving rescission of existing contracts or variation of projects. However, he then said that purely contrived schemes could be challenged by the Inland Revenue on the strength of the House of Lords decision in the Furniss v. Dawson case.

I have asked the Inland Revenue to study the implications, but I understand that no cases have come to its attention, in which post-Budget rescissions have been made of pre-Budget contracts. I note the hon. Gentleman's comments, and shall certainly ensure that his points are followed up.

Mr. Davis: What will happen if the hon. Gentleman finds such a case? Why not block the loophole before the Bill is enacted? How will the Inland Revenue know whether the contracts have been rescinded or varied? Perhaps it is given notice. The developers who intend to use the loophole may well be waiting until the Bill is enacted, or at least has completed its Report and Third Reading. By then it will be too late for the Government to block the loopholes. Why have they not taken action? They have had two months since The Law Society's Gazette drew it to everybody's attention. What are they waiting for? On Monday they managed to table amendments to change the basis of capital gains tax. Why are they not prepared to stop developers avoiding development land tax? They have had two months, not two days.

12.45 am

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that the matter was drawn to public attention some time ago. Had there been evidence of a serious risk of circumvention of the proposals, it would have been possible to frame means of dealing with that in the Bill. The matter has been drawn to the attention of the Revenue and I have asked that it should respond. It has advised me that no such cases of rescission have come to its notice. That is as far as I can reassure the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Davis: How significant is that explanation? Does the Minister expect any examples of rescission — all examples of rescission and all rescissions and variations —to come to the notice of the Revenue? Is he saying that, if there are rescissions or variations the Inland Revenue is informed, or do we rely on pot luck?

Mr. Stewart: Notice is not automatic, but the Revenue keeps in touch with these matters. Of course, there cannot be rescission unless there is existence in the first place.

Mr. Davis: I am not satisfied with that explanation. The Treasury has had long enough to look into these matters. I do not intend to delay the proceedings this evening by calling a Division, but I put it on record that the Government are happy to wait until a loophole has been exploited before they say or do anything about it, if they do. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 24

CAPITAL TRANSFER TAX: CONDITIONAL EXEMPTION

Amendments made: No. 104, in page 196, line 2[illegible] leave out 'beneficially entitled' and insert 'entitled (either beneficially or otherwise)'.

No. 105, in page 197, leave out lines 26 to 30 and insert —

'(2) Where there has been a conditionally exempt transfer of any property (or part), tax shall be charged under this section in respect of that property (or part) on the first occurrence after the transfer of an event which under this section is a chargeable event with respect to that property (or part).'

No. 106, in page 198, line 37, after 'event', insert 'with respect to the property (or part) concerned'.

No. 107, in page 199, line 20, leave out 'part only of one of the associated properties' and insert 'one of the associated properties or part of it'.

No. 108, in line 24, leave out 'part only of one of the associated properties' and insert 'one of the associated properties or part of it'.

No. 109, in line 29, after 'the', insert 'property or'.

No. 110, in line 31, after 'that', insert 'property or'.

No. 111, in line 37, leave out from 'Act,' to end of line 38 and insert 'at the end there shall be added "or, where the property has been disposed of as mentioned in section 32A(5) above, before any event which apart from section 32A(5) would have been such a chargeable event."'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

New Schedule

'GROUP RELIEF

PART I

GENERAL MODIFICATIONS

Interpretation

1. In this Part of this Schedule—

(a) a "company owned by a consortium" means either such a trading company as is referred to in paragraph (a) or paragraph (b) of subsection (2) of section 258 of the Taxes Act or such a holding company as is referred to in paragraph (c) of that subsection (companies owned directly or indirectly by consortia);

(b) a "consortium claim" means a claim for group relief made by virtue of subsection (2) of section 258 of the Taxes Act;

(c) a "group claim" means a claim for group relief made by virtue of subsection (1) of that section;

(d) a "group/consortium company" means a company which is both a member of a group of companies and a company owned by a consortium;

(e) "relevant accounting period" means an accounting period beginning on or after 1st August 1985; and

(f) other expressions have the same meaning as in section 258 and the following sections of Chapter I of Part XI of the Taxes Act.

Claims for losses etc. of a group/consortium company

2.—(1) For the purpose of a consortium claim in respect of the loss or other amount of any relevant accounting period of a group/consortium company, that loss or other amount shall be treated as reduced (or, as the case may be, extinguished) by first deducing therefrom the potential relief attributable to group claims.

(2) Subject to sub-paragraph (3) below, in relation to the loss or other amount of a relevant accounting period of a group/consortium company, the potential relief attributable to group claims is the aggregate amount of group relief that would be claimed if every company which, as a member of the same group of companies as the group/consortium company, could make a group claim in respect of that loss or other amount made such a claim for an amount which, when set against the claimant company's total profits for its corresponding accounting period, would equal those profits.

(3) Where for any accounting period another member of the group of companies of which the group/consortium company is a member has a loss or other amount available for relief and one or more group claims is or are in fact made in respect of that loss or other amount, account shall be taken of the relief so claimed before determining (in relation to the loss or other amount of the group/consortium company) the potential relief attributable to group claims under sub-paragraph (2) above.

Claims for relief by a group/consortium company

3.—(1) In any case where—

(a) a consortium claim is made by a group/consortium company in respect of a loss or other amount of an accounting period of a member of the consortium, and

(b) the corresponding accounting period of the group/consortium company is a relevant accounting period.

the total profits of that accounting period of the group/consortium company, against a fraction of which that loss or other amount may be set off (in accordance with section 259(8)(b) of the Taxes Act), shall be treated as reduced (or, as the case may be, extinguished) by deducting therefrom the potential relief available to the group/consortium company by way of group claims.

(2) Subject to sub-paragraph (3) below, in relation to a relevant accounting period of a group/consortium company, the potential relief available to the company by way of group claims is the maximum amount of group relief that could be claimed by the company for that accounting period on group claims relating to the losses or other amounts available for relief of other members of the group of companies of which the group/consortium company is a member.

(3) Where another member of the group of companies of which the group/consortium company is a member in fact makes one or more group claims in respect of losses or other amounts of other members of the group, account shall be taken of the relief already claimed by that company in determining the potential relief available to the group/consortium company by way of group claims under sub-paragraph (2) above.

Trading losses to be set against profits before group relief

4.—(1) Where a company owned by a consortium—

(a) has in any relevant accounting period incurred such a loss as is referred to in section 259(1) of the Taxes Act, and

(b) has profits (of whatever description) of that accounting period against which that loss could be set off under subsection (2) of section 177 of that Act, the amount of that loss which is available to any member of the consortium on a consortium claim shall be determined on the assumption that the company owned by the consortium has made a claim under that subsection requiring the loss to be so set off.

(2) Where the company referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above is a group/consortium company, the amount of the loss shall be determined under that sub-paragraph before any reduction is made under paragraph 2 above.

Extension of scope of consortium relief

5.—(1) This paragraph applies where—

(a) a company (in this paragraph referred to as "the link company") which is a member of a consortium is also a member of a group of companies; and

(b) the link company could (disregarding any deficiency of profits) make a consortium claim in respect of the loss or other amount eligible for relief of a relevant accounting period of a company owned by the consortium.

(2) Subject to sub-paragraph (3) and (4) below, a company (in this paragraph referred to as a "group member") which is a member of the group referred to in sub-paragraph (1)(a) above but is not itself a member of the consortium may make any consortium claim which could be made by the link company; and the fraction which is appropriate under section 259(8) of the Taxes Act where a group member is the claimant company shall be the same as that which would be appropriate if the link company were the claimant company.

(3) A group member may not, by virtue of sub-paragraph (2) above, make a consortium claim in respect of the loss or other amount of any relevant accounting period of a company owned by the consortium unless the claimant company was a member of the group concerned throughout the whole of the accounting period or, as the case may be, each accounting period of the link company which, if that company were making the claim, would be a corresponding accounting period in relation to the relevant accounting period concerned.

(4) The maximum amount of relief which, in the aggregate, may be claimed by group members and the link company by consortium claims relating to the loss or other amount of any relevant accounting period of a company owned by the consortium shall not exceed the relief which could have been claimed by the link company (disregarding any deficiency of profits) if this paragraph had not been enacted.

6.—(1) This paragraph applies where—

(a) a company (in this paragraph referred to as "the link company") which is a member of a consortium is also a member of a group of companies; and

(b) a company which is a member of that group of companies but is not itself a member of the consortium has for any relevant accounting period a loss or other amount available for relief; and, in relation to the link company, any reference in this paragraph to a group member is a reference to a company falling within paragraph (b) above.

(2) Subject to the following provisions of this paragraph, a company owned by the consortium may make any consortium claim in respect of the loss or other amount referred to in sub-paragraph (1)(b) above which it could make if the group member were a member of the consortium at all times when the link company was such a member, but not at any other time.

(3) The fraction which is appropriate under section 259(8) of the Taxes Act in relation to a consortium claim made by virtue of sub-paragraph (2) above shall be the same as that which would be appropriate if the link company were the surrendering company, except that the accounting period in respect of which the Member's share in the consortium is to be ascertained shall be that of the group member which is in fact the surrendering company.

(4) A company owned by the consortium may not, by virtue of sub-paragraph (2) above, make a consortium claim in respect of the loss or other amount of any relevant accounting period of a group member unless, throughout the whole of that accounting period, the group member was a member of the group of companies referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above.

(5) for any accounting period of a company owned by the consortium (in this sub-paragraph referred to as "the claimant company's accounting period"), the maximum amount of relief which, in the aggregate, may be claimed by that company by consortium claims relating to the losses or other amounts of accounting periods of the link company and group members shall not exceed that fraction of the total profits of the claimant company's accounting period which would be brought into account under section 259(8)(b) of the Taxes Act on a consortium claim in respect of which—

(a) the link company was the surrendering company; and

(b) the link company's accounting period was the same as the claimant company's accounting period.

Restriction on consortium claims where companies join or leave consortium

7.—(1) In any case where—

(a) a consortium claim is made in respect of the loss or other amount of a relevant accounting period of a company owned by a consortium (in this paragraph that claim is referred to as "the primary claim", that company is referred to as "the principal surrendering company" and that accounting period is referred to as "the principal accounting period"), and

(b) the company making the primary claim or, if that claim is made by virtue of paragraph 5 above, the company which is the link company for the purposes of that paragraph was not a member of the consortium throughout the whole of the principal accounting period, and

(c) on or after the date on which the primary claim is made, a consortium claim is made which falls within sub-paragraph (2) below,

no relief shall be allowed on the primary claim, or, as the case may be, any relief which was so allowed shall be withdrawn.

(2) A consortium claim is to be taken into account under sub-paragraph (1)(c) above if—

(a) it is in respect of the loss or other amount of an accounting period of a surrendering company (being a company owned by the consortium referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above); and

(b) it is made by the company making the primary claim or, if that claim or the claim mentioned in this sub-paragraph is made by virtue of paragraph 5 above, by any other member of the group referred to in sub-paragraph (1) (a) of that paragraph; and

(c) at any time during the principal accounting period the surrendering company is a member of the same group of companies as the principal surrendering company; and

(d) the accounting period to which the claim relates falls, in whole or in part, within the principal accounting period.

(3) Where any relief which has been allowed is withdrawn by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above, all such adjustments shall be made, whether by way of assessment or otherwise, as may be necessary in consequence of that withdrawal.

8.—(1) In any cases where—

(a) a company owned by a consortium makes a consortium claim (in this paragraph referred to as "the primary claim") in respect of the loss or other amount of a relevant accounting period of a member of the consortium or, if the primary claim is made by virtue of paragraph 6 above, of a company which, in relation to that member of the consortium, is a group member, within the meaning of that paragraph, and

(b) the member of the consortium concerned (whether as the surrendering company or the link company, within the meaning of paragraph 6 above) was not a member of the consortium throughout the whole of the relevant accounting period referred to in paragraph (a) above, and

(c) on or after the date on which the primary claim is made, a consortium claim is made which falls within sub-paragraph (2) below,

no relief shall be allowed on the primary claim or, as the case may be, any relief which was so allowed shall be withdrawn.

(2) A consortium claim is to be taken into account under sub-paragraph (1) (c) above if—

(a) it is made by a company owned by the consortium referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above; and

(b) the company making the claim is a member of the same group of companies as the company making the primary claim; and

(c) the claim relates to the loss or other amount of an accounting period of the consortium member referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above or of a company which, in relation to that consortium member, is a group member, within the meaning of paragraph 6 above; and

(d) the accounting period referred to in paragraph (b) above falls, in whole or in whole or in part, in the relevant accounting period referred to in sub-paragraph (1)(a) above.

(3) Where any relief which has been allowed is withdrawn by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above, all such adjustments shall be made, whether by way of assessment or otherwise, as may be necessary in consequence of that withdrawal.

PART II

AMENDMENTS OF SECTION 263 OF TAXES ACT

9.—(1) At the beginning of subsection (3) there shall be inserted the words "Subject to subsections (3A) and (3B) below".

(2) In that subsection for the words from "are made" to "relate to" there shall be substituted the words "relating to".

(3) In that subsection after the words "surrender company", in the first place where they occur, there shall be inserted "are made by two or more claimant companies which themselves are members of a group of companies".

10. After subsection 83) there shall be inserted the following subsections:—

"(3A) If companies which are members of different groups make claims falling within subsection (3) above, that subsection shall apply separately in relation to the companies in each group.

(3B) For the purposes of subsection (3) above, there shall be left out of account a claim made by a company if—

(a) the claimant company joins or leaves a group of companies at the same time as the surrendering company; and

(b) both before and after that time either the claimant company is a 75 per cent. subsidiary of the surrendering company or the surrendering company is a 75 per cent. subsidiary of the claimant company or both companies are 75 per cent. subsidiaries of another company."

11.—(1) In subsection (4) for the words "If claims for group relief" there shall be substitued "Subject to subsection (4A) below, if claims as respects two or more surrendering companies which themselves are members of a group of companies".

(2) In that subsection the words "as respects more than one surrendering company" shall be omitted.

12. After subsection (4) there shall be inserted the following subsections:—

"(4A) If claims falling within subsection (4) above are made as respects surrendering companies which are members of different groups, that subsection shall apply separately in relation to claims as respects the surrendering companies in each group.

(4B) For the purposes of subsection (4) above, there shall be left out of account a claim made as respects a surrendering company if—

(a) the surrendering company joins or leaves the group of companies concerned at the same time as the claimant company; and

(b) both before and after that time either the surrendering company is a 75 per cent. subsidiary of the claimant company or the claimant company is a 75 per cent. subsidiary of the surrendering company or both companies are 75 per cent. subsidiaries of another company."

[Mr. Davis]

13. For subsection (5) there shall be substituted the following subsection:—

"(5) References in subsection (3) to (4A) above to claims for group relief do not include references to consortium claims, that is to say, claims made by virtue of section 258(2) above.".'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Schedule

Supplementary Provisions as to Withdrawal of Tax Credits

Recovery of tax credits incorrectly paid

1.—(1) Where the provisions of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] of this Act apply so as to withdraw the entitlement of a company to claim to have a tax credit in respect of a qualifying distribution set against the income tax chargeable on its income and to have the excess of the credit over that income tax paid to it and the company (in this paragraph referred to as "the recipient company") has either had that excess paid to it, or has received an additional amount in accordance with arrangements made under Regulation 2(1) of the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (General) (Dividend) Regulations 1973, it shall be liable to a fine for the violation of the provisions of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] of this Act equal to twice the amount of the excess or additional amount as the case may be and such fine (in this section referred to as "the recoverable amount") shall be payable to the Board and be treated as having become payable at the date when the excess or additional amount was paid to the recipient company and may be recovered in accordance with sub-paragraphs (2) to (5) below.

(2) The recoverable amount may be assessed and recovered as if it were unpaid tax and section 30 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 (recovery of overpayment of tax, etc) shall apply accordingly.

(3) Any amount which may be assessed and recovered as if it were unpaid tax by virtue of this paragraph shall carry interest at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum from the date when it was payable in accordance with this paragraph until the date it is paid and it is hereby declared that this paragraph applies to a recoverable amount which is paid without the making of an assessment (but is paid after it is due) and that, where the recoverable amount is charged by any assessment (whether or not any part of it has been paid when the assessment is made), this paragraph applies in relation to interest running before, as well as after, the making of the assessment.

(4) Where the recoverable amount is not paid by the recipient company within six months from the date on which it became payable—

(a) the recoverable amount may at any time within six years from the date on which it became payable be assessed and recovered as if it were unpaid tax due from any person who is or was at any time prior to the expiration of the said six year period connected with the recipient company, or would have been connected on the assumption that all the facts and circumstances relating to the recipient company at the time the excess or additional amount as the case may be was paid continued to apply for six years thereafter, and section 30 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 shall apply accordingly, and

(b) as respects its accounting periods beginning with that in which the excess or additional amount referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above was paid and ending with that following that in which the recoverable amount is paid in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph, the company which made the qualifying distribution in respect of which the recipient company received the excess or additional amount shall not be entitled to set any advance corporation tax paid by it against its liability to corporation tax for such periods in accordance with section 85 of the Finance Act 1972 (payments of advance corporation tax to be set against company's liability to corporation tax on its income) nor to surrender the benefit of the whole or any part of any amount of advance corporation tax to a subsidiary in accordance with section 92 of that Act (setting of company's surplus advance corporation tax against subsidiary's liability) in such periods.

(5) Where a recoverable amount is assessed and recovered from a person connected with the recipient company in accordance with sub-paragraph (4)(a) above, that person shall be liable for the interest payable in accordance with sub-paragraph (3) above and, until the interest is so paid, sub-paragraph (4)(b) above shall apply as if the words "the interest due in accordance wih sub-paragraph (3) above is paid" were substituted for the words "the recoverable amount is paid in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph".

(6) Interest payable under this paragraph shall be paid without any deduction of income tax and shall not be allowed as a deduction in computing any income, profits or losses for any tax purposes.

(7) Where under the law in force in a territory outside the United Kingdom interest is payable subject to a deduction in respect of taxation and such deduction applies to an amount of interest paid in accordance with sub-paragraph (3) above, the reference to the rate of 9 per cent. per annum in that sub-paragraph shall be deemed to be a reference to such rate of interest as after such deduction shall be equal to the rate of 9 per cent, per annum.

Claims to payment of tax credits following remedial legislation in unitary states

2.—(1) This paragraph has effect where a company to which section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] applies has a qualifying presence in a province, state or other part of a territory outside the United Kingdom which has been prescribed as a unitary state for the purposes of that section and, at the time when a qualifying distribution is made to that company by a company which is resident in the United Kingdom, that state has enacted legislation the effect of which is that, as from a future date which shall not be later than 31st December 1986, it will cease to be a unitary state within the meaning of the definition in paragraph 5(1) below, notwithstanding that it remains prescribed as such for the purposes of that section.

(2) In the circumstances described in sub-paragraph (1) above the company in receipt of the qualifying distribution shall be entitled on or after the effective date to claim to have the tax credit to which it is entitled in respect of the distribution set against its liability to income tax and to have the excess (if any) of the credit over that liability paid to it; but, if payment of the excess or of the additional amount referred to in Regulation 2(1) of the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (General) (Dividend) Regulations 1973 is made before the effective date, the provisions of paragraph 1 above shall apply in relation to that payment regardless of the enactment of the legislation referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above.

(3) For the purposes of this paragraph the efective date shall be deemed to be the date (Not to be later than 31st December 1986) on which the legislation referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above actually becomes effective in the province, state or other part of the territory outside the United Kingdom which has been prescribeed as a unitary state for the purposes of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits], irrespective of the date, if any, specified in that legislation.

Avoidance of provision withdrawing tax credits

3.—(1) in any case where arrangements are made, whether before or after section [Withdrawl of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] comes into force, as a result of which interest is paid or a discount is allowed by or through a person who is resident in the United Kingdom, or carries on business in the United Kingdom through a branch or agency, and it is reasonable to suppose that, if such payment or allowance had not been made, a qualifying distribution would have been made by the person by or through whom the payment or allowance is made, or by another company resident in the United Kingdom, to a company which has, or is an associated company of a company which has, a qualifying presence in a unitary state at the time when the payment or allowance is made, then—

(a) no person who receives that payment or allowance shall be entitled to relief from income tax or corporation tax thereon by virtue of arrangements having effect under section 497(1) of the Taxes Act, and

(b) the payment or allowance shall not be allowed as a deduction in computing any income profits or losses for any tax purposes.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of sub-paragraph (1) above, where a payment or allowance is not of itself a payment or allowance to which sub-paragraph (1) above applies, but is made in conjunction with other payments of whatever nature and taken together with those payments has substantially similar effect to a distribution, then, for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1) above, it shall be treated as a payment or allowance within that sub-paragraph.

(3) Any company which has received such a payment of interest as is referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above, from which income tax has not been deducted by the person making the payment, and has a qualifying presence in a unitary state at the time of the payment, shall be treated for the purposes of paragraph 1 above as a company from which the entitlement to claim payment of the excess of a tax credit over the income tax chargeable on its income has been withdrawn by section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] (1) and which has had paid to it such an excess in an amount equal to the income tax which should have been deducted from the payment of interest.

Power to inspect documents of non-resident companies

4.—(1) Where it appears to the Board that the provisions of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] and this Schedule may apply to a company resident outside the United Kingdom (in this paragraph referred to as a "foreign parent"), the Board may, by notice in writing given to the foreign parent or any associated company of that foreign parent, require that company within such time (not being less than thirty days) as may be specified in the notice to make available for inspection any books, accounts, or other documents or records whatsoever of that company where in the opinion of the Board it is proper that they should inspect such documents for the purposes of ascertaining whether the said provisions apply to the foreign parent or such associated company notwithstanding that in the opinion of the person to whom the notice is given those provisions do not apply to that company or any associated company of that company.

(2) In the Table to section 98 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 (penalties) at the end of the first column there shall be added—

"Paragraph 4 of Schedule [Supplementary provisions as to withdrawal of tax credits] to the Finance Act 1985".

Meaning of "unitary state", etc

5.—(1) In this Schedule and section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] of this Act—

"group" and "member of a group" shall be construed in accordance with section 272(1) of the Taxes Act (definition of groups of companies) with the omission of the restriction in paragraph (a) of that subsection and the substitution of the words "51 per cent." for the words "75 per cent." wherever they occur,

"qualifying distribution" has the same meaning as in Part V of the Finance Act 1972 (taxation of companies and company distributions),

"unitary state" means a province, state or other part of a territory outside the United Kingdom with the government of which the arrangements referred to in subsection (1) of section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] have been made which, in taxing the income or profits of companies from sources within that province, state or other part, takes into account, or is entitled to take into account, income, receipts, deductions, outgoings or assets of such companies, or of associated companies of such companies, arising, expended or situated as the case may be outside that territory and which has been prescribed under subsection (7) of that section as a unitary state for the purposes of that section; but no such province, state or other part shall be so prescribed which only takes into account such income, receipts, deductions, outgoings or assets—

(a) if the associated company was incorporated under the law of the territory, or

(b) for the purpose of granting relief in taxing dividends received by companies.

(2) For the purposes of this Schedule and section [Withdrawal of right of certain non-resident companies to payment of tax credits] of this Act—

(a) section 533 of the Taxes Act (connected persons) applies; and

(b) section 302 of the Taxes Act (meaning of "associated company" and "control") applies with the substitution of the words "six years" for "one year" in subsection (1) of that section.'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

Schedule 25

REPEALS

Amendments made: No. 159, in page 203, line 32, column 3, at beginning insert

'In section 263(4), the words "as respects more than one surrendering company".'.

No. 160, in page 204, line 25, at beginning insert—

'The repeal in section 263 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 has effect in accordance with section [Group relief: modifications] (2)(b) of this Act.'.

No. 112, in page 207, line 4, at beginning insert—

'1970 c. 10.	The Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.	Section 270(3).
1975 c. 45.	The Finance (No. 2) Act 1975.	In section 58(12), the words from "(other" to "that Act)".'.

No. 113, in line 4, column 3, at beginning insert—

'In section 65, in subsection (1)(b), the words from "and this" to the end and in subsection (7)(b), the words from "subject" to "above".

In section 66, in subsection (4), the words from "and in" to the end.

Section 67(2) and (3).

Sections 68 to 70.

In section 84, in subsection (3)(b)(ii), the words "if the disposal is within" and "that section".

No. 114, in line 5, at end insert—

'1981 c. 35.	The Finance Act 1981.	In section 41, in subsection (1) the words "or gains or losses" and in subsections (2) and (3) the words "gains or losses".'.

No. 115, in line 5, column 3, at end insert—

'In Schedule 7, paragraph 2(2) and in the Table in paragraph 9, the second entry relating to section 58(12) of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1975.'.

No. 116, in line 6, column 3, at beginning insert—

[Mr. Davis]

'In section 58, in subsection (5) the words from "including" to "gains" and subsection (6)'.

No. 117, in column 3, leave out lines 14 and 15 and insert—

'In section 88, in subsection (1) the words "and section 89 below" and "section 89 below", paragraph (b) and the word "and" immediately preceding it; and subsection (5A). Section 89.'.

No. 118, in line 32, at end insert—

'1984 c. 43.	The Finance Act 1984.	In Schedule 9, in paragraph 11 (1) the words "and 89". In Schedule 13, paragraph 4 and paragraph 9*(b)* and the word "and" immediately preceding it.'.

No. 119, in line 34, at beginning insert—

'The repeals in section 270 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, section 58 of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1975, sections 65 to 70 and 84 of and Schedule 7 to the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, section 41 of the Finance Act 1981, section 58 of the Finance Act 1982 and Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1984 have effect with respect to disposals on or after 2nd July 1986.'.

No. 120, in line 39, leave out from '1983' to 'have' in line 40 and insert

'the Finance (No. 2) Act 1983 and Schedule 9 to the Finance Act 1984.'.

No. 121, in line 42, after 'Act', insert

'(other than those mentioned in paragraph (bb) below)'.

No. 122, in line 43, at end insert—

'(bb) in the case of gilt-edged securities as defined in Schedule 2 to the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 and qualifying corporate bonds as defined in section 64 of the Finance Act 1984, with respect to disposals on or after 2nd July 1986, and'.—[Mr. Peter Rees.]

12.46 am

Mr. Peter Rees: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is the final stage of a long and intricate legislative process. I ventured to say at the beginning of the debate on Second Reading that it was a good Bill, but I am ready to admit that it has been improved in Committee and on Report. There have been valuable contributions from Government and Opposition Members in Committee and on the Floor of the House.

The Bill may not have quite the same dramatic impact as last year "s Finance Bill and it has not had the same dramatic passage through the House. However, the Bill has been considered in Committee rather better than last year's Finance Bill. It has one inestimable quality, which I am sure will command the approbation of the entire House. Although it amounts to 98 clauses and 27 schedules, the repeals in schedule 25 remove many measures from the statute book and we are not making a net addition to the statute book.

More significantly, the Bill sustains the momentum of fiscal reform. The abolition of development land tax did not entirely command the approbation of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), but it is one of the features of the Bill. Other features are the indexation provisions for capital gains tax, the exclusion of gilts and certain corporate bonds from capital gains tax, which goes far to simplify an unduly complex tax, the simplification and modernisation of many of the stamp duty provisions and the unitary tax measures, which were debated in the early hours of yesterday morning and for which we are indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) and other of my right hon. and hon. Friends. I am sure that that measure will make a valuation contribution to the development of thought on both sides of the Atlantic on that complex issue.

Finally, I turn to the recommendation of the Keith committee on the administration of indirect taxes. I paid a tribute, which I shall not repeat, on Second Reading to the labours of that committee. It has produced a thoroughly painstaking and admirable piece of work. The fact that we have adopted more or less most of the recommendations in legislative form is eloquent testimony of our regard for the committee's work. I am sure that it will improve the administration of the taxes for which Customs and Excise is responsible while maintaining a fair balance between the interests of the administration and those of the taxpayer.

The provisions were inevitably long and complex and they have been properly subjected to close scrutiny in Standing Committee and on Report. It can be claimed that it was quite a feat that the recommendations of the Keith committee should have been implemented in legislative form within two and a half years of the first report, especially when it is borne in mind that there have been extensive consultations and the publication of draft clauses. That is indeed the way that this Administration likes to proceed in complex legislative fields. I also remind the House that it should be the prelude to further provisions next year in regard to direct taxation.

I assure the House and the country that the Government have not lost their appetite for tax reform. As further evidence of that, we shall be publishing in due course a Green Paper on personal allowances and other related subjects.

It was, I believe, a well-conceived, well-constructed, well-criticised and well-considered Bill. It has been improved by our various debates. On that basis, I have no hesitation in commending it to the whole House.

12.50 am

Mr. Terry Davis: The Chief Secretary will not be surprised to learn that we take a different view of the Bill. I think that his reference to the Bill as having been well criticised was intended as some sort of compliment. I see that he is nodding, so I take it as such. We are critical of the Bill in its overall strategy and also in its detailed provisions.

Whereas the Chief Secretary, understandably, regards the abolition of development land tax, at a cost of £50 million to the Exchequer, as a good thing, we regard it as something to be criticised. Similarly, we were and still are critical of the changes in capital gains tax, and of a measure tht I think the Chief Secretary overlooked in his contribution a few moments ago. He did not refer to the extension of VAT to newspaper advertisements—I am sure that it was an oversight—even though it was debated at length in the House. We regard that as one of the serious extensions of the taxation system and we seriously object to it.

There were other features of the debates which are worth putting on record. In Committee, we discussed the increases in the excise duties on spirits, beer, wine, made wine and cider, and it became clear that there was no logic in the Government's approach to those duties. There were different increases in the duties on different drinks and there was no logical explanation for them; at least, there was no logical explanation given to the Committee.

Similarly, we had the benefit of a Minister from the Department of Transport during our consideration of vehicle excise duty. It was the unanimous conclusion of Opposition Members—and, I suspect, the conclusion of some Conservative Members—that there was no logic behind the Government's approach to vehicle excise duty. Again, there were different increases in the rates of vehicle excise duty for different vehicles. It was kindness that led us to terminate that debate, because we were getting no satisfaction whatever from the Minister who had been brought to the Committee to explain what was supposed to be the Government's thinking.

The Opposition regard the Bill as being particularly badly drafted. The Chief Secretary referred to the fact that the Bill consists of 98 clauses, yet during the past two days we have had to deal with 106 Government amendments at this late stage in our proceedings. We dealt with a considerable number of Government amendments in Committee, and since then there have been 106 amendments and new clauses tabled by the Government. I do not object to all of them; indeed, we welcome some of them, and are grateful for amendment No. 129, dealing with the problem of Cyprus sherry. In our earlier exchanges, I paid tribute to the Minister of State, Treasury, for the way in which he approached the problem. That expression of gratitude was sincerely meant.

Nevertheless, putting those very few concessions on one side, the large number of amendments to a Bill with only 98 clauses is significant. Indeed, it compares with only a slightly larger number of amendments that were tabled last year to a much longer Bill. It suggests to us that the draftsmanship on this occasion has been below the standard that we expect from the Treasury and from the Chief Secretary.

A large number of the amendments were moved formally by the Government tonight, showing that they were regarded by the Government as technical amendments. At the same time, we also object to the very short notice that has been given of some amendments tabled for consideration on Report. A few minutes ago my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) protested about four amendments that were tabled on Monday. Four more amendments were tabled less than a week ago. Those amendments are significant and change the basis for calculating the value of a disposal for capital gains tax purposes. We regret the Government's treatment of the House in that way.

However, it would be unfair of me not to say that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in particular has made a great effort to be flexible and co-operative and to consult the Opposition. The Chief Secretary responded to my request in Committee that the Treasury should consult the Opposition in more detail about proposed amendments that affect taxes on the heritage. The Chief Secretary responded to other points that were put to him in Committee. On this occasion, we were provided with a much more detailed explanation of amendments that were made on the nod on Report. I hope that this precedent will be followed next year.

In putting forward their amendments on Report, some at very short notice, the Government have ignored two or three obvious loopholes, among them the abolition of development land tax. It is unfortunate that the Government have not seen fit to seek our assistance and consult us about the way in which those loopholes could be closed.

Last year, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) pointed out that the price of the Finance Bill 1984 was £9·75. This year's Finance Bill, which is much shorter, costs £10·20. The increase cannot be justified.

12.57 am

Dr. Marek: The Bill can be criticised for not including what it ought to include, a point which I cannot develop on Third Reading. I can only refer to what it contains. This year's Finance Bill is much less damaging to the country than last year's. I support what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) about vehicle excise duty, which varies according to the number of axles on a lorry. The Treasury has not consulted the Department of Transport because there is no set of principles whereby lorries with different axles are taxed.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has my hon. Friend received the correspondence that I have received from hauliers about these new rates of tax? The Government are a net beneficiary, after expenditure on roads, from the tax on heavy goods vehicles. The road haulage industry is most aggrieved. In Committee we dealt in detail with the regional implications of the Government's taxation policy for heavy goods vehicles. If my hon. Friend has received any such correspondence, will he draw it to the attention of the House, in particular the comments of hauliers in North Wales who are most aggrieved by this year's Budget.

Dr. Marek: I should like to oblige my hon. Friend, but unfortunately I have received no correspondence from hauliers in north Wales, or anywhere else, for that matter. However, I have received serious complaints from the county surveyor of Clwyd county council. Heavy lorries are damaging the surface of Clwyd roads particularly the bridges. Local authorities are in difficulty over strengthening these bridges, with very serious consequences. Their difficulties should be reflected in the Finance Bill. Thirty-two tonne vehicles with four axles damage the roads very much more than vehicles with five axles, or light vehicles.

My impression in Committee was that the Government did not know what guidelines they should adopt to ensure that vehicles covered their track costs. It was not clear how the Government defined track costs and I believe that a Minister said at one point, "It is a bit of a mess and we are just starting to put it right."

I hope that the Treasury will insist that the Department of Transport should examine the issue over the coming year and provide details on how the vehicle excise duty tables can be put in order so that there is some fairness in the system and so that lorries cover road costs and the cost of ancillary services such as bridges and street lighting. The costs of accidents and environmental damage should also be included.

[Dr. Marek]

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hodge Hill that we were disappointed that there was not a brisk response from the Treasury. Ministers should at least have given the impression that they knew where they were going. We might have argued about that, but we never found out where they were going. I hope that a different attitude will be displayed next year.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I do not know whether my hon. Friend grasped the point that I made in my previous intervention. I am sure that he wishes to do so, because he comes from an outer region.

The cost of heavy goods vehicle licences bears unnecessarily heavily on hauliers outside the major conurbations. Whenever a manufacturer in my hon. Friend's constituency wishes to supply goods to a major conurbation, he has to pay for haulage and those costs depend greatly on the cost of diesel and the price of a licence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions should be brief.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I hope that my intervention can be kept as brief as possible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It has not been very brief so far.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Transport costs must have implications for regional policy. Wales is as much a region as is Scotland, the south-west or Manchester. These matters should be taken into account by the Government when they set taxes for what are, in effect, infrastructure services in our areas.

Dr. Marek: I do not want to talk about matters that should have been in the Bill, but I assume that the Treasury is taking account of the point made by my hon. Friend. We all have our views about whether diesel should be cheaper and excise duty abolished, with the extra cost being put on petrol.

The Bill includes a comprehensive set of tables. If one compares the rates in the Bill with those in previous Finance Bills it seems that much that was raised was ad hoc. Some things might have been raised in one year and others in another year. The top of a column might have been raised by £25 for the first five entries and by £45 for the next five entries. With reference to page 99, Table C(1) the bottom five entries might have been raised by £60 or £70 but no coherent strategy is evident as to what the Treasury was trying to get at.

The Bill is before us, and there is nothing that we can do about it now. I am not happy about it because I do not understand the system. I hope that the Treasury will be able to liaise with the Department of Transport to produce a set of principles by which we can be guided.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is my hon. Friend aware of the special procedure with regard to the introduction of some Bills whereby evidence can be taken prior to a Bill being considered in Committee? Would that not have been a good area in which to proceed on that basis?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not pursue that matter on Third Reading. He knows that the House is required to consider what is in the Bill, not the procedures that led to it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If I may complete my intervention——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thought that I had indicated to the hon. Gentleman that he was out of order.

Dr. Marek: If my hon. Friend wishes to be in order, I will of course give way in due course.

I deal next with VAT on newspapers, which I regret. This is not the type of thing that Labour would have done if they had been in Government. The newspaper industry was very worried about the provision. It forced it into two sections, the national press on one side and the local press on the other. The local press is not particularly healthy. It survives, and we have a very good local press, but it lives on shoestrings and cannot afford a large increase in cover price. Before the Finance Bill was published, it was feared that VAT might be put on the cover price of newspapers. It was not, for which I am thankful. However, VAT has been put on advertisements.

I cannot object very strongly to the imposition of VAT on advertisements, but I do object to the imposition of VAT on classified advertisements, by which people announce the birth of a son or daughter or a death, or an article for sale. The article offered for sale often is worth only £2 or £3, and the advertising cost must be about 80p which, with VAT 92p. If to that amount has to be added another 15 or 17p for the cost of a stamp, the exercise is made that much less economic. I am somewhat mollified by the fact that the Government, having put VAT on classified advertisements, are not receiving letters from newspapers, including local newspapers, to the effect that they will close down because they are experiencing serious problems. However, newspaper people are unhappy about what is happening.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend might want to extend the argument because he will recognise the major switch from direct to indirect taxation in the last five years. In 1979 the Conservatives went into a general election——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are discussing the Third Reading of the Finance Bill, not its historical background.

Dr. Marek rose——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend made a statement and I was referring to the historical background because it was in order for me to suggest that there is a link between the Government's decision to raise indirect taxation and to reduce direct taxation, which is what they have been doing, although both types of taxation have increased. Will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that little things like VAT on fish and chips introduced in the last Budget, which was referred to——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not comment upon last year's Budget. We are discussing this year's Finance Bill and we must stick to that.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. During discussions on this matter repeated references have been made to Government decisions on VAT, and in particular to the imposition of VAT on fish and chips. Reference was made to that because damage was inflicted on a particular sector. The argument about——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. On Third Reading debate is restricted to what is in the Bill. Discussions at previous stages are not relevant. The discussions to which the hon. Gentleman refers are not relevant. Debate must be about the content of the Bill.

Dr. Marek: The Bill has been discussed at length so I do not want to detain the House much longer, but I want to make one or two further points as briefly as possible.

There has been a shift to indirect taxation away from direct taxation. The income tax bands and personal allowances have been raised over the inflation rate so that those people who are at work benefit—over 4 million are not at work and cannot do so. However, the benefits are taken away because of the absurdly high interest rates caused by the Government's idiotic monetarist policies. The advantages for people with mortgages are nullified by the Government's economic policies.

Despite the shift from direct to indirect taxation, overall taxation has gone up under this Administration.

The capital gains tax changes were made by the Government late in the day. The provisions making those changes were tabled so late that I saw them for the first time only yesterday. I did not understand them when I read them then, and I do not fully understand them now. Time did not permit hon. Members to examine those provisions carefully or to take professional advice. Thus, we do not know if they are defective or if we could have improved them. It would have been better for the Government to have left such a change until, say, next year. Alternatively, they should have thought the matter through earlier, and tabled the necessary provisions in good time.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend may recall that in recent years there have been repeated capital gains tax reductions. In each case we have pressed Ministers to say how many people would be affected by, and the value of, the reductions. On each occasion when figures have been given, the Government have underestimated the revenue loss. When moving their amendments today, the Government refused to say how many people or how much revenue would be involved. They only said that the effect on the revenue would be negligible. Does my hon. Friend agree that next year we should table questions before the Finance Bill——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. One Finance Bill at a time, please. We are dealing with this year's, not next year's, Finance Bill.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend has, in part, made my speech for me. I shall not comment further on what he said or I would be out of order. The Chief Secretary said, I am sure sincerely, that he was unable to give an estimate of how much additional money would stay outside the Treasury's net as a result of the capital gains tax changes. Because the amendments to make those changes were tabled so late, we have had no real chance to form an opinion, and that is a major reason why the Opposition voted against them.

We have had this year a Budget for the rich. It is not designed to benefit the unemployed, single-parent families, pensioners or the disabled. Much of the Finance Bill is concerned with tax reliefs and incentives for a small minority of people. However, it does not do as much damage in that it does not go as far down that road as last year's Budget. Nevertheless, it takes a similar line and, because of that, I should like to vote against the Bill. But the hour is late and chances are that many hon. Members have gone away to sleep.

Opposition Members do not like the Budget and we would not have introduced such measures had we been in office. I am sure that within two years there will be a radical change in Budgets. Members of the present Administration will be sitting on the Opposition Benches and the Labour party will be producing its first Budget. I am confident that that will happen. Britain has almost been ruined under this Government. The Labour party will save it within two years.

1.20 am

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It seems that the House is most eager to hear what I have to say! Therefore, I shall speak briefly, although bluntly and to the point. The measure of the Budget is the assessment of it in my constituency by industrialists, trade unionists and the general public. Over the past five years, industrialists in the northern region, especially in the Workington constituency, have had what can only be described as a hell of a time. Throughout my constituency, factories have been emptied; whole industrial estates have been laid bare; new plants, opened under Labour in the 1960s, have been shut; and the 3,000 jobs created under Labour Administrations in the 1970s have been wiped out in net terms.

Dr. Marek: I apologise to my hon. Friend for interrupting him when he is referring to a serious set of statistics. I hope that he will not forget the extra 50 or so redundancies at Cinzano that the Government have declared tonight.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am glad that my hon. Friend said that the Government had "declared" those redundancies, because that reflects precisely my constituents' feelings about the loss of large manufacturing units in west Cumbria. They blame the Government.

The people, many of whom voted Conservative in 1979 and 1983 increasingly recognise that the Budget has failed to meet their expectations of what would come about with the election of a Conservative Government. In Brecon and Radnor a couple of weeks ago, I found that wherever I knocked on the doors, the people were talking about the uncaring nature of Government policy. I was stunned by their knowledge of the contents of the Finance Bill. They identified the Budget's deficiencies. They saw it not as a Budget for jobs, as the Government had presented it, but as a Budget for unemployment, and they were right. Every one who watches the Friday morning BBC programme and examines the net——

Dr. Marek: It is not only a Budget for unemployment. The national insurance changes mean that it is a Budget for low wages for those in employment. It is a doubly damaging Budget.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We all know that the Government intend to force wages down in many sectors of the economy. The argument about market forces placing pressure on wages is deployed only to reduce the wages in the regions, especially in areas such as mine in west Cumbria. We reject that approach. People in the north of England who have always voted Conservative also reject it, because they believe that it is unfair. They do not believe that people's lives should be played with as this Government have done in successive Finance Bills.

[Mr. Campbell-Savours]

My constituents wanted a Budget that would open new factories, increase demand, stem the flow of imports, create new jobs, increase wages, raise living standards and fund additional social services and public provision generally. They have seen the reverse. Those things will not happen this year, and, if what the Chancellor said last Sunday is to be taken at face value, not even the Brecon and Radnor by-election result will change the course that the Government have set for themselves. The Opposition can only appeal for a re-examination of what is happening and a re-examination of the Government's future policy. Unless the Government move on that important front, all we can see is more and more misery in our constituencies.

Dr. Marek: This will be my last intervention, but my hon. Friend has made an important point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should be grateful if the hon. Member would address the Chair rather than present his back to me.

Dr. Marek: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend made an important point because this Administration have been in office and presented Budgets for six years. This Finance Bill contains nothing new. The Government are caught up in their policy of trying to bring down inflation, which they see as their first priority, maintaining high interest rates and cutting public expenditure. They are caught within their economic dogma. Their Budgets cannot therefore be any different. On reflection, it is what many of us expected. Will my hon. Friend argue for them to break out of their straitjacket, admit that their policies are failing and have new economic policies and a new Finance Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that hon. Members will not start talking about a new Finance Bill. One Finance Bill at a time is sufficient. Let us discuss the one that is before the House.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: We are discussing a Finance Bill that was rejected by a number of Conservative Members. They said that the Bill was inadequate and asked for reflation. That is my case.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Unemployment (Isle of Wight)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

1.27 am

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I feel that in some ways I could have continued the Third Reading of the Finance Bill, because, although I have crossed swords with the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on many occasions, I agreed entirely with the remarks that he made. I intend to make somewhat similar remarks.

I want to talk about the problems of the continuing rise in unemployment on the Isle of Wight. I welcome the fact that the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), who has suffered as I have until this late hour, is here to reply because, as is well known, he and his wife, the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), know my constituency and its problems well.

As the Minister will be aware, the Isle of Wight has consistently sought assisted area status. The local authorities helped by local businesses, made what they thought was an especially strong case only last autumn.

As predicted then, unemployment has continued to rise and it reached a peak of 17·3 per cent. in February this year. Since 1980, over 3,000 jobs have been lost in manufacturing in my constituency, and at the same time the tourist trade upon which we rely has fallen by about 25 per cent.

On the industrial front, the long-term trends have shown a continuing decline. More men and women were out of work in June this year than in 1984. That is when we are approaching the height of the season, when the rate decreases for about three months. It is currently—I know that this will be pushed back at me—running at 12·1 per cent. which is below the national average but still much higher than the average for the south-east as a whole. We have the highest unemployment in the south of England.

Last winter, male unemployment in Ryde reached 26·7 per cent. and in Shanklin it was no less than 32·4 per cent. Those figures are reminiscent of Northern Ireland and no one should be complacent about them. Worse is about to descend upon us, because on or about 16 August '50 more jobs will go at Fibre Resin Developments in East Cowes when the firm closes its doors, despite a full order book, mostly from television manufacturers and the motor industry. I quote from the Portsmouth Evening News of 3 July last:

"160 lose jobs as buy-out collapses

Hopes of a jobs lifeline for a doomed Isle of Wight factory have been dashed.

The management of Fibre Resin Developments, of East Cowes, has confirmed that hopes of buying-out the plant have vanished and it will close next month with the loss of 160 jobs.

While Fibre Resin had a healthy order book its parent company, the Unitech Group of Reading, claimed fierce competition ruled out profit in the production of moulded components, particularly for televisions."

I understand there is only one other manufacturer of these products in the United Kingdom. The article goes on:

"Fibre Resin Managing Director, Mr. John Hand, and colleagues originally hoped they could find a way of turning the work into profits but now say there is only the possibility of a venture that would provide work for 'a few' employees.

They ruled out the possibility of a management takeover for the same reasons that the parent company decided to pull out of the Island—high transport costs and less demand for some of the company's TV products."

A company which is not Isle of Wight-based but which is a subsidiary of a larger company, either American or United Kingdom, and which operates on an offshore island, when it retracts, looks to see what plant it has in diverse areas of the country, particularly an offshore island, and we always suffer. To bring component parts or basic materials to the island and take them back again to the mainland costs a great deal of money. It costs something like £100 for each vehicle that comes across from the mainland.

To add insult to injury, the Desmond Norman aeroplane company is moving its base from Sandown airport to Cardiff with the aid of loans totalling £2·3 million, including £500,000, subscribed in ordinary preference shares, from the Welsh Development Agency. I note from last Friday's Financial Times that the agency is claiming that it has built a portfolio of around £27 million and by the end of this year it expects this will have risen to between £37 million and £40 million, invested in industrial concerns of one sort or another. Desmond Norman will, in the process, increase his current work force to about 134.

I am sure the Minister must agree with me when I say that we could have done with such a boost. We cannot offer the Desmond Norman's of this world attractive terms of that dimension. We wish him well. We are sorry to lose him, but we feel bitter about his departure, particularly as the skills are undoubtedly available to him on the Isle of Wight. The Firecracker, which we all know was one of the competitors for the replacement of the jet Provost, was designed and built on the Isle of Wight. Desmond Norman is well known as the designer, with John Britten, of the original Islander aircraft, the first 240 of which were built mostly by the British Hovercraft Corporation, but built on the island. On that self-same airfield, Mr. Richard Noble, the holder of the world land speed record, is also constructing a small plane and the county council, along with the Development Commission, have given him financial backing. But will it be enough? The aid that we have been able to provide pales into insignificance compared with the Welsh package for Desmond Norman. One can anticipate what Mr. Noble must be thinking as he sees his competitor on the other side of the airfield picking up such a large sum. It makes nonsense of the current assisted area designation.

As a member of the Select Committee on Transport, I know that marine pilotage is also under review. Some 28 of such pilots live on the islands, and some of their jobs could be in jeopardy. I could go on. The future, despite our efforts, which I believe to be praiseworthy—the Minister may confirm that, and his colleague, the Minister for Information Technology, who was on the island only last Monday thought so—is not bright. We have tried our best through both local government and local businesses to improve the position, but nevertheless, we seem to be losing.

I have only to finish by mentioning Westland, and its subsidiary, the British Hovercraft Corporation, to give an illustration of another firm that is causing us some concern. That company is our biggest industrial employer, and, as we know, is going through a difficult patch. I shall not say more, because the subject was duly aired only last Monday, but the importance of BHC to the economy of the Isle of Wight cannot be over-emphasised.

We long ago came to the conclusion that tourism and leisure are our natural growth areas, but to make this a reality, we desperately need a carrot to offer the specialist investors. Small grants from the English Tourist Board to hoteliers and others are greatly to be welcomed, but the seaside resorts of Ventnor, Shanklin, Sandown, Ryde and the sailing centre of Cowes need much more than that.

I have to return to the Principality, because when we look at what is given to places such as Rhyl and Cardiff through the EEC, we are made envious. No completely new hotel has been built in my constituency since the war. While we now have some excellent leisure centres, one or more must become of national importance if our summer season is to be substantially extended.

Cowes was again this year the home of the prestigious Admirals cup racing, but it particularly needs to upgrade its shore facilities. Representations on this subject have been made to me by senior officials in yachting, and I know that it is true. We must try to get developers with experience in leisure to take an interest in the island and invest there, but to do so we have to be able to offer them some encouragement. They will not come unless there is a carrot. Last year, our rate support grant settlement was the worst of any in the country, so local Government has even less room for manoeuvre than before.

Some will say that I have said all this before and made little progress, so why do I go on about it? The answer is, "What else can I do?" Politics is the art of the possible, and it is perhaps true that if one says the same thing often enough and long enough—I have learnt that in politics one has to go on saying the same thing over and again, however boring it may be—it will eventually attract the attention of somebody who matters. I am putting down another marker on behalf of my constituents. I hope that the Under-Secretary will do all that he can to persuade his colleague of the urgency of our case, and the need for a more sympathetic approach to our economic well-being.

1.38 am

The Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I welcome the opportunity to listen to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross). I take seriously his final remarks about the need for persistence, and about politics as a process. If any Minister responded to the case that he outlined with a pat answer, that would do politics a disservice. I am talking not about party politics, but about the natural process of politics, which is that matters are raised in the House, through deputations and to Ministers when they visit constituencies such as the Isle of Wight. It helps to develop Government policy and approach, not only to legislation, but to other things that the Government can do, such as transferring money from one set of pockets to another. The hon. Gentleman referred to some of the incentives in Wales. Like the hon. Member, I would have liked this debate to take place earlier in the evening. I do not agree with him that the remarks of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) were that germane to the previous debate or to this one.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Admirals Cup. Perhaps it is a good omen for Britain and the Isle of Wight that one of the competing yachts was called Rubber Duck and has been re-named Phoenix. The House will recognise the efforts the hon. Gentleman has put into his constituency. Perhaps what is needed for the Isle of Wight is a resurgence of what was achieved in the early 1970s in a slightly different economic climate, when the manufacturing base expanded. It expanded because small and medium-sized firms came to the Isle of Wight. They came there for the sort of reasons outlined in the county council's case, which it put forward last year for assisted area status. It talked about the kind of people on the Isle of Wight and the kinds of skills they have. I should like to refer the House to the biography of Uffa Fox. During his early life he changed from one job to another, and that shows the sort of adaptability that is characteristic of the Isle of Wight.

[Mr. Peter Bottomley]

In these summer months of July and August, it is important not only to talk about the unemployment in the area, but to talk about the good sides of the island. The hon. Gentleman courteously referred to the links that my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) and I have with his constituency. The numbers of people who read the County Press and the other newspaper in the Isle of Wight grow enormously during July and August. I hope that the headlines following this debate and other headlines which will appear in the island's newspapers during the weeks when Cowes is full of people who may be able to bring in investment into the island, will be about the adaptability of the work force in the Isle of Wight, about the successes of the Isle of Wight's schools and the kind of environment that makes people very keen to live there if they could find jobs. I hope they do not just talk about the difficulties of transportation and use the word peripherality, which is somewhat new to me. Perhaps we could look at the Isle of Wight as the place it could become, the Silicon Island of Britain. People talk about Silicon Glen and about the high-tech corridors down the M4. There are many products connected with new technology where transport costs become less significant, and where the attractions of a place like the Isle of Wight can get people not only to build their own firms there, but to put into the island some of the manufacturing and development and design processes that are so important to the modern industry of the future.

Employment in the island rests on what used to be called the three legs, but I suppose that there are actually five. The traditional ones are tourism, light industry and agriculture and fishing. To those I would add the two greatest areas of employment, which are public administration and retail distribution. It is worth noting that many of the developments in the area have made it possible for more people to do their shopping on the island. They do not have to go to Portsmouth or Southampton for that purpose. I will not answer the hon. Gentleman in detail on the pattern of unemployment during the year, because it is obvious to anyone who knows the island that it suffers severe unemployment during the winter months, and the reduction to below the national average during the summer is a seasonal trend.

I will pass on to my right hon. Friends in Government some of the points which are more properly directed to them. As one example of politics being not only the art of the possible but the art of making possible what is right, may I say how much I welcomed the response from the Isle of Wight county council to the Government's White Paper last year on changes in regional aid and assistance, gearing much more to job creation, extending aid to include parts of the service sector as well as manufacturing, trying to go for increased selectivity and a review of the assisted area maps. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the Isle of Wight has not been successful in getting its application approved in this process. As he and I know, politics is a moving business, and the representations made by the county council are important. Having had the chance of looking at the video film that was shown to my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology, I know that the Isle of Wight does manage to demonstrate many of the things that make it attractive not only in a physical sense but in a manufacturing sense. It is for that reason that the island boasts, even with the intended move of the manufacturing of NDN planes to Wales, more aircraft manufacturing businesses than almost the whole of the rest of the country put together. That shows that there are people on the island, most of them who have been there for a long time but some who have come in, who believe that it is a place where they can get their acts together and start developing their own businesses.

I add my weight, for what it is worth, to the efforts of the Isle of Wight tourist board which manages—much of the money being raised on the island—to have a budget larger than the Southern tourist board which covers a far wider area. I know from personal experience how much many of the people involved in the hotel, catering and tourist industry put in to promoting the Isle of Wight. There is much more that they can do, and my right hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio, whose portfolio, if it does not sound too paradoxical, includes looking at tourism, will be coming forward with plans and proposals and he has been providing a focus for Government efforts, because the development of this side of the service sector is extremely important to the Isle of Wight.

As for the Development Commission, the hon. Gentleman said characteristically that rural development area status for the Isle of Wight had been important. It is also worth recognising that the island can go further. Without straying into the areas of responsibility of the local authorities on the island, I may say that it is worth people thinking whether they are always gearing their decisions towards the promotion of employment and tourism as much as they might. I am not an expert, but I recall an example two years ago of a proposed hotel development in Cowes which, it was said in public though there may have been other reasons, could not go ahead because inadequate car parking spaces had been provided. If much of the hotel accommodation needed in Cowes is tied to yachting, many people may be arriving by boat and wanting to sleep on land, and they will not bring their cars stuck on the fronts of their Admirals Cup yachts.

Mr. Stephen Ross: There were other reasons why that proposal did not meet with everyone's approval.

Mr. Bottomley: I am sure that is right. I used that as an example of how people not only can ask the Government to reconsider how they can help but can continue themselves to look for an environment for the promotion of tourism and industry.

I quote from the Isle of Wight's case for assisted area status. It says on page 14:

"Within the broader national policies for encouraging industrial development there is scope at the local level to further these aims. The Isle of Wight County Structure Plan, as approved by the Secretary of State in March 1979, laid particular emphasis on the need to increase employment opportunities. The County Council, in conjunction with the Borough Councils, the Development Commission and CoSIRA, have been vigorously implementing the strategic employment policies through land-use planning, the active promotion and encouragement of industry and the provision of sites and buildings and also by establishing a single centre for advisory services to small firms."

I do not think that anyone would claim that people on the Isle of Wight are not doing the best they can, and I know from my own experience that both in the voluntary sector and at the local authority level people do their best to work together and, while having occasional differences of politics, dedicate themselves to the wellbeing of the Isle of Wight. It is one of the advantages of being a self-contained unit that people actually live and work in the same place rather than the difficulties faced in so many other constituencies where some of those involved live some way away from where they work.

The Development Commission has helped by funding a number of projects on the island, including an imaginative project to bring Souter's boatyard at Cowes back into productive use with a potential to accommodate more than 400 jobs. The commission, with the local authority, is also preparing a rural development programme for the Isle of Wight, which will offer a way to co-ordinate local and Government assistance to the island during the next 10 years. The hon. Gentleman referred to rate support grant. One of the areas in which the Isle of Wight has done better than other areas, has been transport grants. The island has had some of its special needs recognised, which I hope is welcomed there.

I pay tribute to the work done by CoSIRA, which works closely with the island's enterprise agency. During the past 12 months it has helped 21 firms to obtain more than £1 million in loans, and has done much to support community development. On the wider scale of the European social fund, a welcome recent development is granting the island priority status for support for training and employment schemes from 1 January 1986. Now many more types of scheme can receive funding than previously. The Department of Employment has already made contact with the Isle of Wight County Council about that. I hope that the Council and other organisations can make applications to, and benefit from that fund.

I am not saying that sufficient has been achieved, but many of the developments that the Government have been promoting are of assistance in the Isle of Wight and throughout the country. The enterprise allowance scheme helps people who have been on benefit for some time to set up in business. It is a powerful stimulant to the creation of new small businesses, and I recommend anyone who has been on benefit or under notice of redundancy for some time—if a person has been on benefit for 13 weeks, he or she will qualify if he or she can show £1,000 of his or her own, or access to that sum — to apply for that scheme, under which he or she can receive an allowance of £40 a week for a year. Our experience shows that 75 per cent. of businesses set up under the scheme still exist 15 months after they started — that is, after the allowance has run out—and that more than half of them have created jobs, not all full-time jobs, for others. Sixty jobs for every 100 businesses operating after 15 months shows that a great well of enterprise is waiting to be tapped. The enterprise allowance scheme is one way of doing that.

The scheme has been expanded by a further 25 per cent., and the Isle of Wight will share in the extra places being made available. Examples of the scheme from the island include hand-made pottery, windsurfing promotion, the sale of second-hand classical records, a magician, a successful tea room and a hairdresser. I am not suggesting that everyone should compete in those fields, but that shows the range and breadth of ideas being brought forward.

The hon. Gentleman does not need me to talk about the youth training scheme. It is vital that young people, who are important to the Isle of Wight, are not forced to emigrate, but can build up their skills and work experience on the island, and be available to take jobs that become available. YTS provides a rung on the employment ladder. The developing quality training will help them, as will the move towards a two-year YTS. It is pleasing that last year 70 per cent. of those leaving YTS on the island went into jobs. Our experience throughout the country shows that it is a valuable way for people to build up their experience and ability to be employed. The same sort of story can be told about adult training.

The community programme provides special help to the long-term unemployed. When the House goes into summer recess I shall visit the Isle of Wight to follow up some of the hon. Gentleman's remarks and for my own pleasure and education. I shall do my best to promote some of the ideas to which I have referred when meeting people on the island. I shall do what I can to encourage the advertising of the island, especially during the peak summer months. It seems ridiculous that so many people, when they have the chance, go shooting off abroad for their holidays when the range of pursuits for families on the Isle of Wight is so great and the attractions so well known. There is net immigration to the island of those aged 50 years and over, and if the island is attractive to members of that age group, many of whom are returning to the island after a working life away, it should be attractive to those who have the opportunity of taking a business to it or developing a business while there.

None of this is to deny the possibility that some of the aid that the Government provide to other areas is harming the Isle of Wight. Much of the diversion of public revenues to special assistance in certain areas costs jobs because of the nature of taxation and tends to divert jobs. The hon. Member has rightly drawn attention to an example that may be of benefit to Wales but may be of harm to the Isle of Wight.

I recognise the points that he made briefly tonight but at greater length two nights ago about the possible impact on the island of developments at Westland. I pay tribute to the staff of BHC for the way in which it has helped to diversify the work that it has managed to achieve and its order book. I hope that the company will prosper and that its example will help others to do the same.

I recognise the importance of what the hon. Gentleman said at the beginning of his speech. I attach importance also to my initial comments. The hon. Gentleman has asked that his arguments be considered properly and I shall do that within Government. I hope that it will be possible in a year's time to have a similar debate so that we can discuss some of the successes as well as some of the problems that remain to be tackled successfully. The Government will do the best that they can on the Isle of Wight and throughout the country to raise the levels of employment and economic activity and to ensure that we represent the people whom we are here to serve in the best way possible.

[Mr. Bottomley]

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes to Two o'clock.

House of Commons

Thursday 11 July 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

BERKSHIRE BILL [Lords] (By Order)
Order for Second Reading read.
To be read a Second time upon Tuesday 16 July.

BRITISH RAILWAYS (TROWSE BRIDGE) BILL [Lords] (By Order)
Read a Second time, and committed.

YORKSHIRE WATER AUTHORITY BILL (By Order)
Order for Second Reading read.
To be read a Second time upon Tuesday 16 July.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Security

1. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation.

2. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security position.

13. Mr. Molyneaux asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on security in Northern Ireland.

